THE TWO-FACED SHIELD.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

[First Paper.]

IT is with unfeigned reluctance that I have undertaken to write upon subjects which have been so recently and exhaustively treated by contemporaneous pens and pencils; to pass over ground which has been illuminated by the calcium light of the American press; or to touch on questions which have been subjected to the intelligent scrutiny of Congressional Committees; yet I am encouraged by the hope that views taken from an original and somewhat peculiar stand-point may still possess sufficient attraction to justify their publication, and that a personal narrative, with all its incidental trivialities, errors, inconsistencies, and egotism, may find an acceptable apology in the superior interest of the grand historic drama with which it is interwoven.

A native of the valley of the Shenandoah, I have passed the greater part of my life on the Northern border of Virginia—a region which, from its geographical position and mixed population, has always been debatable ground between the contending opinions of the age, and which eventually became a most important theatre of the war, resulting from these opinions. It is thus that I became, almost from necessity, an interested observer of many of the opening scenes of the contest, and subsequently an active participator in its armed solution.

During the winter of 1860–61 I was residing at my father's house in Martinsburg, occupied with my private affairs and arranging plans for a future of peace and seclusion. These dreams were disturbed from time to time by the indications of the approaching storm, but I resolutely closed my eyes and stopped my ears, determined not to be disturbed. I had never taken any active interest in the party politics of the day, and was the less disposed to mingle in the present strife, as I sympathized with neither of the extreme factions which, from opposite quarters, seemed to be mutually intent on breaking down the Government and destroying the peace and prosperity of the country. I saw nothing in the contest but the rage of adverse dogmatisms, sharpened by the baser lust for official plunder—that party spirit, which, Addison says, “robs men, not only of all honor and decency, but of every particle of common sense.”

In the rapid progress of events, however, it became manifest that the questions before the country were not to be put aside with this cynical and superficial observation. Under a monarchy a subject may be permitted to seclude himself from the political storms that shake thrones and menace dynasties. Even amidst the fury of war he can calmly pursue some favorite science with reasonable assurance that his motive and character will be respected. The citizen of a free Republic can claim no such privilege. "The price of his personal liberty is eternal vigilance." Under whatever pretext he may seek to hide himself or evade the responsibilities of his condition, when the storm rises he is sure to feel his neighbor's hand upon his shoulder, and hear the cry of warning and reproach: "What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise and call upon thy God."

It was, indeed, high time that the Border Virginians should awake, for the gulf that was opening between the adverse sections yawned beneath their very hearths; and the sword which was drawn to divide the nation must also cut their hearts in twain. When, at length, impelled to the serious consideration of the impending crisis, I can not boast, as many do, that I clearly appreciated the merits of the quarrel or foresaw its results. Preferring to preserve a reputation for frankness to the doubtful honor of being enrolled among the ex post facto prophets, I am fain to acknowledge (in the phraseology of tobacco planters) that I had very few opinions "ready cut and dry" for the occasion. I heard nothing but a confusion of tongues such as followed the destruction of Babel. I saw nothing but political chaos which seemed about to swallow up government, law, life, and property together. There had been a prevalent and growing conviction among what were called Conservative men, especially at the South, that the experiment of popular Government was a failure. Macaulay had written a letter to some one prophesying that the American system would break down on the first serious trial. I shared this belief to some extent. The revolutionary anarchy which was spreading like a fire from State to State, the seeming helplessness of the General Government, the chaos of opinion—all combined to convince me that the predicted day of trial had arrived, and that it needed no Daniel to interpret the handwriting on the wall.

Impressed at the same time with the belief that we were entering upon an era which would figure in history, I determined to take advantage of my position to observe the progress of events and to keep a Diary.

This promise, however, was but negligently performed at first. During the winter of 1860-61 I find nothing recorded beyond an occasional comment, opinion, or anecdote suggested by the current news, and these jotted down hastily, without date or continuity. In time my journal became more methodical, and after I entered the military service was as full and accurate as possible under the circumstances.

In preparing these notes for the press I have endeavored to preserve all the freshness and personality which pertain to the original manuscript. If some things have been omitted (that might be worth the telling, in place and season), and certain obscure passages made clearer by the light of after-knowledge, in the main the recorded facts and opinions of the day remain unchanged. There will appear the uncertain gropings, the vacillations, the inconsistencies of opinion, the errors of hasty and partial observation, the vain hopes, the causeless fears, the embittered prejudices, and excited passions which necessarily accompany the progress of a political revolution, so radical and comprehensive, accomplished through a social war so bloody and vindictive as that which has recently ended.

It will be also seen that in writing these individual experiences it is not proposed to emulate the dignity and comprehensiveness of History, but to give closer and more detailed views of characters and events, a series of photographic pictures hastily caught, during the action of the changing drama. Scenes where the greatness of little things, and the littleness of great things, will sometimes be strikingly illustrated by juxtaposition, where tragedy and comedy, laughter and tears, frenzy and farce walk arm in arm together. And it may be that a more thoughtful class who would look behind the creaking machinery and tinsel actors of the drama, may find in these crude and unskillful observations suggestion of queries which will be found as difficult to answer as those of the poet laureate:

— "Shall error in the round of time
Still father truth? O shall the braggart shout
For some blind glimpse of freedom work itself
Through madness, hated by the wise, to law,
System, and empire? Sin itself be found
The cloudy porch, oft opening on the sun?"

Having thus indicated the geographical and political stand-point from which my opening views of the war were taken, I commence transcribing from my Diary.

.....South Carolina has actually seceded! and what of that? South Carolina is a great way off, and has been threatening Secession for thirty years or more. The Toryism of 1776 has never died out in South Carolina, nor have her gentry ever fully acquiesced in our republican form of government. It is high time the questions between her and the country were settled. I wish she had made up her mind to try conclusions with Andrew Jackson, when she had her hand raised to pluck the forbidden fruit. Does she think it more nearly ripe now? or that the present "Old Man" won't throw stones? I'll vouch for it, that if he does not, somebody will.

.....I am rather glad South Carolina has taken this decisive step. Her arrogance and rashness have arrayed even her Southern neighbors against her. She will not be supported by a single State. I have not heard a voice raised in her behalf. Even those who have heretofore been most vociferous about Southern rights unite in condemning her premature presumption. A ship of war in the harbor of Charleston, and a battalion of national troops thrown into the forts, will quench South Carolina as briefly as one may snuff out a tallow dip with his thumb and finger.

....."Sedition is like fire, easily extinguished at the commencement, but the longer it burns the more fiercely it blazes."

.....South Carolina is not quenched, and there seems to be no disposition on the part of those in power to put the extinguisher on her.

.....As she pursues her course of presumptuous madness with impunity other States are following her example.

.....Each day brings tidings of fresh outrages and humiliations heaped upon the Government, seizures of arsenals, arms, forts, dockyards, and vessels—of traitorous officers surrendering their charges without defense—of faithful officers arrested and thrown into prison, besieged in forts where they are cut off from supplies and assistance—our national flag hauled down and trampled in the dust, with all its glorious historic memories, to be replaced by some tawdry rag flaunting an obscure device known only to local office-holders and militia-men.

The effect of this state of things is distinctly perceptible in the tone of opinion around us. State Sovereignty dogmatism is becoming daily more open and arrogant. County court metaphysicians are modifying their Unionism with ifs and ands and proceedures—small anglers in the mud-puddle of village tavern opinion are drawing in their lines and changing their bait—petty politicians are craftily trimming their sails that their cock-boats may run with the rising wind. But while the weak-kneed are thus tottering, and trimmers fluttering in the breeze, the storm serves to fan to fiercer flame the indignation of all true men. All eyes and hearts are now turned toward Washington, expectant, eager, hopeful. There centres the power which in its infancy has met and twice foiled the giant of Great Britain, which in the very wantonness of its lusty youth made a holiday frolic of throttling poor Mexico. What will the Government do in this crisis?

.....Is it secret sympathy with treason or mere driveling that tells the American people "the Government has no right to coerce a State?"—a nation that for more than eighty years has maintained fleets and armies, has waged wars and made peace, has collected customs and coined money; whose commerce covers the globe, whose flag is known and honored wherever the sun shines; whose power and civilization are acknowledged by the proudest and most enlightened peoples; whose future promises to surpass in grandeur all that history has yet recorded. Such a nation has not the right to suppress domestic insurrection! So vast an aggregation of power, prosperity, and hope must submit quietly and unresistingly to perish at the bidding of a local faction, a confederacy of visionary schemers, conceited dogmatists, self-deluding and self-stultifying economists—base huxters, who unblushingly pretend to barter the national honor and safety for the advantage of cheap negroes and a good cotton market; unprincipled politicians, whose vulpine instincts have warned them that the power and places which they have so long abused and so deeply corrupted are about to be withdrawn from their keeping!

Is nothing lawful or constitutional but the outrages of revolutionary mobs, the violation of solemn oaths, the plundering of national property, and the babbling of seditious orators?

Is the Government we have loved and trusted indeed so pitiable and impotent a sham? Have the founders, whom we have been accustomed to regard as wise and good men, really put such a scurvy trick upon us? Have we built houses, laid up wealth, begot children, acquired honors, and recreated in boasting and self-glorification under the delusion of a Political Idea that would disgrace a council of Pottawatomies?

Such are the questions that loyal Virginians in the bitterness of their humiliation now ask each other, as the daily mails bring in the accumulating details of rebel outrage, arrogance, and menace, responded to only by governmental acquiescence, deprecatory remonstrance, and despicable compromise.

"Ah, God! for a man with heart, head, hand,
Like some of the simple great ones gone
For ever and ever by—
One still strong man in a blatant land,
Whatever they call him, what care I,
Aristocrat, Democrat, Anarchist—some Who can rule and dare not lie."

.....The proposition to call a Convention in Virginia is opposed by all discreet men. The people of the State are opposed to Secession, or even to the consideration of the subject. This idea of a Convention is only a scheme of certain Richmond conspirators to get the representative power of the Commonwealth under their hands into a more compact and convenient form for manipulation.

.....In the recent election for members of the Convention the people of Virginia have expressed their determination to remain in the Union by an overwhelming majority. Gloriously has the good old State vindicated her honorable traditions and the memory of those noble sons whose effigies fill the chief places in the National Pantheon.

We have been wrong in doubting the solidity of popular government. Solomon says: "Many are in high place and of renown, but mysteries are revealed to the meek." So it seems in our day—while our statesmen are turned drivellers, our honorables colloguing with treason, the wise and crafty mazed in a labyrinth of foolishness, the simple faith of the people is steadfast, and is alone sufficient to save us. While those learned in the law and subtle expounders of constitutions are choking us with the metaphysical doubts and twaddle, comes forth the plowman from his field, the grimy artisan from his shop, the meek, unlettered citizen, without Latin enough to translate "E pluribus unum," and barely English enough to decipher the vernacular "United we stand, divided we fall." This comprises all his knowledge of statesmanship. He never has read any Constitutions, or Bills of Rights, or Resolutions of '98, or Congressional Debates. It is well for the country, perhaps, that he has not, or they might have addled his brains as they have those of many others; yet, though his political creed is so simple, he understands it, not so clearly with his head as with his heart. He learned it from his father, who fought under Jackson in 1812; who learned it from his father, who marched with Washington in 1776. He has taught it to his bare-legged boy, who tends the plow or blows the bellows at the forge. He has faith in it, and will stand by it when the day of trial comes. We, the people of these United States, will not be divided. I have never seen our people so serious on the occasion of an election. They seem to have had an instinctive warning of coming evil, and, distrusting their old political leaders, have spurned the party trammels and personal prejudices which have heretofore influenced them. They seem every where in the State to have chosen the best men that were offered. Virginia is safe. I thank God for this signal rebuke to those degenerate Virginians who would have sold this glorious old Commonwealth as a convenient tool to the weak and selfish schemers of the Gulf States—a tool to be worked with, ruined, and scorned.

.....We have vexatious news from Richmond. The tone of the Convention seems to be giving way. The pressure brought to bear against the Unionists is said to be very heavy. The oily blandishments of a wealthy and polished society are spread to catch the lighter flies; the weak and conceited are taken with wordy subtleties; the venal are bought by promises; the timid assailed with insult and menace. Hired bullies and howling mobs besiege the Convention in its sittings, and follow the Union members to their lodgings, threatening assassination and lynch law. Some have yielded with a facility which indicates that their treachery was premeditated. Simultaneously with these proceedings at Richmond I perceive the State is flooded with letters, printed documents, and oratorical emissaries, circulating the most brazen impostures, backed by the most insolent threats, intended to bring the people over to the support of the proposed action of the Convention in favor of Secession.

It is declared that if the State can not be carried out by an ordinance of the Convention it shall be by armed revolution, and woe to those who oppose it!

It is frankly asserted, moreover, that of the voting population of Virginia not more than thirty thousand are uncompromising Secessionists, against about an equal number of decided and unconditional Unionists; the souls, bodies, and estates of the remaining one hundred thousand conservative, vacillating, and undetermined citizens would belong to the victors in the contest, serving to swell their triumph and assure their power. They boastfully claim that the Secessionists have in their ranks all the active fighting element, all the available political ability, arms, organization, and a determined purpose, besides complete control of all branches of the State and municipal government. The domineering insolence of their tone seems to give assurance of triumph before it is actually achieved.

The Unionists, they say, on the other hand, are conservative, timid, unprepared, deprecatory, without organization or positive purpose. They must therefore succumb or leave the State. This is Richmond opinion; but Virginia is a State of imperial boundaries, and these James River people will find out ere long that "There are hills beyond Portland And streams beyond Forth."

.....I have just returned from a visit to Charlestown. The politicians and tavern loungers are very full of Secession talk, but, as far as I could learn, the more solid men and rural gentry are decidedly adverse to it.

In returning I called at Park Forest, the birth-place of my father. The white family was from home, but the clouds of high-bred poultry which surrounded the establishment gave an idea of the bountiful and succulent hospitality of rural life in Jefferson. All the surroundings betokened easy and plenteous living. In the kitchen I found the cook—a picture of abundance, shining with greasy contentment, all unconscious of the coming wars, and unambitious of the glorious future destined for her race.

With hospitable alacrity she brewed me the needful cup of coffee, and I pursued my solitary way. The road I took was through a wooded and secluded region traversing the Opequan pine hills, so my time was occupied with melancholy musings: "There will be war. Thirty years of political wrangling have made war inevitable. 'As the smoke and vapor of the furnace goeth before the fire, so reviling before blood.'"

There must be war. Four-score years of unchecked and unexampled prosperity has made the nation drunk—"Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked."

There must be war. These convulsions are essential to the political as storms and tornadoes are to the physical world. We have gone a very long time without one. That of 1812 was superficial. The war with Mexico a mere joke. The restless and growing energies of our people have for eighty years been turned toward the subjugation of nature. The continent has at length succumbed. Our pioneers return disappointed and checked from the shores of the Pacific. The continuity of the nation's dream has been interrupted. There are no more El Dorados to explore, to waste and cast aside like broken toys. These vast and ungovernable energies are now thrown back upon us like a distemper driven from the surface into the blood. They are about to break out in civil war. A great foreign war would answer the purpose much better. What a pity we can not get up a foreign war! Yet Uncle Sam for some years past seems to have been trying (like the hero of Donnybrook Fair) to induce somebody to tread on his coat-tail. But other people know him better than he knows himself.

When this war comes we are to be the borderers; whether it takes the form of a regular and organized contest between governments and sections, or the more dreadful shape of social and anarchic butchery, this region will be the debatable ground. These fair and fertile fields will be laid waste. Bleak chimneys rising from an ash heap will mark the site of these pleasant homes. Kindred will be divided by the sword. Ancient friendships changed to bloody feuds; peace, security, and plenty give place to war, watchfulness, and famine. And yet no upright and sound-thinking man can give a human reason why this war should be. There is not an interest involved which will not suffer shipwreck by a resort to arms. There is not a moral or political principle insisted on by either party which can not be more advantageously settled by reason and forbearance—

"We are puppets, Man in his pride and Beauty fair in her flower, Do we move ourselves, or are we moved by an unseen hand at a game?"

.....The party press of the country is helping on the quarrel famously, while our gray-beards at Washington are tapping their venerable cocoa-nuts with the hope of extracting a few drops of the milk of human kindness wherewith to assuage the flames. The newspapers are standing at either end of the furnace heaving in tar, pitch, rosin, petroleum, and bacon-sides, with most indefatigable and intelligent industry. Chateaubriand, who had seen revolutions enough to give his opinions some weight, was asked the cause of the periodical revolutions in France. He replied, "Journalism."

This is certainly an efficient and virulent agent in the revolution which is brewing here.

.....The New York papers speak of the Southern people as "effete;" and there seems to be an impression prevailing generally in the North that the physique of the Southern people is deteriorated by a life of luxurious and dissolute idleness. If the dapper ideologist who entertains such an idea should happen to come in contact with some hardy Southern mountaineer carrying a hundred and fifty pound buck on his shoulder—some stark and sinewy swamper with his swivel of a ducking-gun—some hard-riding Tony Lumpkin of the rural gentry, the preux chevalier of tournaments, cock-fights, and quarter-races, he would presently find out who was "effete."

There is probably not a population to be found who, by their habits of life, occupations, and amusements, are better fitted for soldiers than that of the Southern States. Horses and fire-arms are their playthings from childhood. Impatient of the restraints of school-houses and work-shops they seek life and pleasure in the soil, and thus early learn the topography of nature, the ways of the fields and forests, swamps, and mountains. Their social and political life, but little restrained by law or usage, develops a vigorous individuality. For the most part, ignorant of the luxuries and refinements of cities, they prefer bacon and whisky to venison and Champagne. Tall, athletic, rough, and full of fire and vitality, the half horse, half alligator type still predominates in the lower and middle classes of the South, while a more elegant but equally vigorous physique characterizes the polished, proud, subtle, ambitious, warlike, domineering class who will lead them.

The Southern editors, on the other hand, jealous of assumed Northern pre-eminence in silly and brazen imposture, make haste to assure their readers that the people of the late United States are now a frantic mob of Yankees and abolitionists, manufacturers of wooden nutmegs and patent apple-peelers, seedy pedagogues and brain-sick ideologists, and won't fight. Now if these adverse utterances are any thing more than the ravings of partisan passion—if the people of the sections do entertain such opinions of each other, it is high time they had a war. It will then be shown satisfactorily to both parties whether or not the hardy pioneers who have subjugated a rugged continent to the sons of the Vikings, who have driven the whales from the high seas, will fight, and whether or not the domineering lords of Southern soil and serfs are effete.

.....Although this people has been chiefly occupied in talking politics for eighty years or more, I can not perceive that they have made any advance toward enlightenment on the subject. Not one man in ten of those I meet seems to have the slightest idea of where his duty or allegiance lies in the present crisis. This condition of things reminds me of Italy in former times, when popes, emperors, dukes, freebooters, municipalities, miracle-mongers, and dogmatists disputed for empire and the right of fleecing the distracted masses. Our people choose sides positively enough sometimes, but they seem to be decided more by passion, prejudice, or interest than by any clearly-defined principle. The masses are certainly adverse to the secession movement, yet they seem to be yielding to the revolution—yielding to arrogant assumption, terrorism, rather than a sense of right.

.....Fort Sumter surrendered; the President calls for seventy-five thousand men to suppress the insurrection. This is a great relief, as it brings the question to a decision, and puts an end to foolish speeches and arguments. It is at least a consolation to know that the Government will not perish ignobly of inanition.

There is a great amount of sentiment about brothers imbruing their hands in each other's blood, as if it was not the most invariable of natural laws that both love and hate attain their fullest measure by reason of propinquity. One who loves his neighbor's daughter and hates his rival over the way attains to a sublimity of passion which could never be awakened by remoter objects.

.....A border war at home—we have romance and ruin staring us in the face. Ten years ago I should not have thought it so great a misfortune. For me it comes too late; I have nothing left but to let the world wag—

"I shall bury myself in my books,
And the devil may pipe to his own."

PROPINQUITY.

.....I had hoped the decisive results of the recent election would have quieted the ferment about secession in Virginia, but it seems not. The people appear uneasy and distrustful of those they have chosen to represent them. The reports from Richmond are unfavorable, they say. The Union delegates are parleying with their adversaries, arguing questions of States rights, and considering compromises. This does not satisfy the people. They wish the Convention to vote down the question of secession conclusively—to emphasize the adherence of Virginia to the Union under all circumstances—then to adjourn and come home. They insist that unless this is done presently they will be betrayed and sold.

.....It is reported that certain Secessionists in a neighboring county are arranging a plot to seize upon the Government arsenals at Harper's Ferry. Several members of the Union Association at Martinsburg have applied to me to take command of five hundred volunteers, who are ready to march to the defense of the place against any unlawful attempts whatsoever. I assured them that the United States, forewarned, would certainly take care of the place. It would also require a large sum to provision and maintain so many men for an uncertain time; and it would be more judicious to hold themselves in readiness and not attempt to act until called on by the Government. In that case I promised to command them.

April 18, 1861.—This morning I took the cars at Sir John's for the purpose of visiting Charlestown on personal business. A stranger from the West who sat beside me opened conversation on the all-absorbing subject: Would Virginia secede? I replied, somewhat dogmatically perhaps, "That she would not, and could not." I then went on to explain to him the grounds for my assertion, the immense popular majority in the State opposed to it, the decided majority in the Convention against secession under any circumstances. The high personal and political character of that body. The impossibility of their betraying their constituents. Their pledges, their interests, their common sense forbid the supposition. They would never dare to face the people of Virginia with the stain of so dark a treachery on their souls. By the time the train reached Harper's Ferry I had quieted the apprehensions of my fellow-passenger, and had argued myself into a very contented frame of mind.

As we passed the Armory shops I observed they were closed. And the United States soldiers there on duty (fifty or sixty men) stood in groups about the grounds apparently awaiting orders. As the train stopped opposite the hotel I missed the mob of idlers that usually crowded the platform, but remarked a collection of half a dozen gentlemen standing near the steps which led to the telegraph office. While engaged in getting my baggage I heard my name called by one of the group, and on approaching recognized several acquaintances, whose presence there at that time struck me as ominous. Among them were Captain H. Turner Ashby and a stranger whom I afterward ascertained was Mr. J. A. Seddon of Richmond. I felt assured, from the anxiety expressed in their faces and the restlessness of their manner, that some extraordinary occasion had assembled them here; but I was not allowed much time for speculation, for as Ashby advanced to shake hands with me he said,

"We are here in the name of the State of Virginia to take possession of Harper's Ferry. Three thousand Virginians are marching to support us, and I am expecting their arrival every moment. They should have been here ere this. An Ordinance of Secession has been passed by the Convention, and the Navy-yard at Norfolk is already in our hands."

I was so stunned by these revelations that I had scarcely breath to utter the usual and appropriate ejaculation of astonishment—"The Devil!"

Ashby further stated that he had taken possession of the telegraph office, and then walking to and fro and looking at his watch at every turn, gave vent to reiterated expressions of impatience at the non-appearance of the expected forces.

As I rallied from the surprise into which I had been thrown by these sudden developments I began to wonder what the authorities at Washington were dreaming of, and why the Government troops were lying idle in their barracks. I saw but half a dozen men who seemed to be arranging their plans and awaiting reinforcements at their leisure. Why were they not immediately arrested or shot down?

I also began to feel annoyed at finding myself the recipient of these quasi-confidential communications from persons with whom I had formerly had agreeable social relations and some affinity in political sentiment, but whose present position was abhorrent to me. The frank and unreserved manner in which they detailed their plans seemed purposely designed to implicate me, at least by approval, and I was glad when a direct question afforded me the opportunity of undeceiving them.

"R—— asked, "How many men can we bring from Martinsburg to sustain them?"

I answered, "None at all; we are all Union men at Martinsburg." This reply appeared to startle them, and was followed by an interchange of significant glances among the party.

Ashby then said that he had always been a sincere Union man heretofore, but as the action of the General Government had already destroyed the Union he now felt bound to stand by his State.

R—— said that he too always had been a Union man, and was one now, but felt himself driven into the present movement as the only means of preserving the Union. Although I could not perceive the adaptation of the means to the end, I wished him success.

The whistle of the Charlestown cars terminated a conversation which had become embarrassing, and I took leave of my acquaintances with decidedly less of cordiality than had been exhibited at our meeting.

In passing around to the platform of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad I became aware for the first time that the street in front of the Armory-yard was crowded with people, a number of whom were engaged in a rough-and-tumble fight, accompanied with the usual noise and hubbub appertaining to this Democratic amusement.

A by-stander informed me that the crowd was composed chiefly of Government employes, citizens of the town at large and from the surrounding country. Lieutenant Jones, in command of the United States troops, had been endeavoring to enlist the Armory men in the defense of the place, while Barbour, late superintendent and member of the Convention, was there with other secession demagogues, endeavoring to induce them to join the State troops, or at least to remain neutral during the expected attack. The artisans in the employ of the Government had for several years past been organized and equipped for military service, and could have reinforced the guard to the extent of three hundred men well drilled and skilled in the use of arms.

As the great majority of these men were not native Virginians, but citizens of the country at large, depending upon the General Government for their means of support, and the perpetuity of the Armory for the continued value of any local property they might have acquired, it is natural to suppose they would have eagerly volunteered to resist a movement which menaced them with total and immediate ruin. But Harper's Ferry had been for a long time little other than a political stew, more occupied with the intrigues of district politicians than devoted to the objects for which it had been founded and maintained. The United States officer found that he could not rely on any considerable number of them for assistance. Division of opinion, drunkenness, confusion, and fist-cuff fights were the only results obtained. The sight of this tumultuous crowd, however, explained to me why the small guard was kept quiescent in the Armory grounds. Without delaying longer to unravel this entanglement I took the train and proceeded to Charlestown. Here there was as much excitement as at Harper's Ferry, but among a different class of people, and consequently less noisy and vulgar in its demonstrations.

The Jefferson Volunteer Battalion, organized and armed under pretexts founded on the John Brown affair, stood paraded in the street, in marching order. As almost every family in the county had one or more representatives in the ranks, there was a hurrying to and fro of mothers, sisters, sweet-hearts, wives, and children of the Volunteers, showing their agitation and excitement in the most varied and opposite forms. In a community so secluded, and so essentially Virginian, there could not be found many uninterested spectators on an occasion like this. Every body was neighbor and cousin to every body else, and political dissension had not yet reached the point where it sears hearts and poisons the fountains of social sympathy. Even the negroes were jubilant in view of the parade and unusual excitement among their masters and mistresses. Yet I thought I could discern in the eyes of some of the older and wiser woolly-heads a gleam of anxious speculation—a silent and tremulous questioning of the future.

There were also some among the white citizens who stood aloof in silence and sadness, protesting against the proceeding by an occasional bitter sigh or significant sneer, but nothing more. I recognized in the ranks some that I had known as Union men, whose restless and troubled looks seemed to question me as I passed.

I had scarcely got through greeting the friends I had come to visit when I was waited on by Captain Lawson Botts, an officer of the regiment, a citizen highly esteemed for his general intelligence and probity, and known as a decided and uncompromising opponent of secession doctrines. Calling me aside, in a manner which evidenced great and painful excitement, he asked "what I thought of the present state of affairs?" I replied by asking what was the meaning of this martial array, and why I saw him armed and equipped as a participator? He said that Ashby and Seddon had arrived that morning from Richmond, and, in the name of the Governor of Virginia, had ordered the regiment to which he belonged to assemble and march immediately on Harper's Ferry, to take possession of the United States armories and arsenals there, and hold them for the State. I then gave him an account of my conversation with Ashby and his colleagues, and what I had seen at Harper's Ferry.

As these gentlemen had unadvisedly, perhaps, communicated their plans to me, I might under ordinary circumstances have felt averse to saying or doing any thing calculated to thwart them. I had determined not to meddle with public affairs, and did not care to exhibit any officious zeal in a matter respecting which the Government was doubtless better informed than myself. Yet there was a nearer view of the subject. If any thing I could say would prevent Captain Botts, or any of my young friends and kinsmen whom I had seen under arms, from taking a step which I was assured would be fatal to them, I certainly would not permit any trifling punctilio to interfere with a full expression of my views. I told him that I considered the whole movement an atrocious swindle, contrived by a set of desperate and unprincipled conspirators at Richmond, who, fearing that their treasonable schemes would be denounced by the people at the polls, had determined to plunge the State irrevocably into a war with the General Government without allowing an opportunity for the expression of popular opinion on the question.

I did not believe the statements made to me at Harper's Ferry in regard to the passage of an act of Secession by the Convention and the seizure of the Norfolk Navy-yard. There was no public information that either of these events had occurred, and it was impossible that these gentlemen, who had come by the inland route from Richmond, could have knowledge of occurrences at Norfolk in advance of the telegraph. On the other hand, it was clearly evident that they were agents of the Revolutionary Committee, whose business it was to precipitate the events referred to by accomplishing the seizure of Harper's Ferry. Moreover, what does it signify if all the agencies of the State—Governor, Legislature, and Convention combined—should order you to draw your sword against your country. Can you feel yourself in any manner bound to obey such an order? Does it not rather prove to you that those whom the people have intrusted with the management of their State affairs have themselves turned traitors and are conspiring against our common Government? So far from feeling it my duty to obey under such circumstances, I would, if I had control of these troops, march them to Harper's Ferry and, without hesitation, arrest and imprison every man I found there engaged in this infernal business, and then offer my services to the United States Government for the defense of the place. I believed that such action would be not only right and justifiable in itself, but would be highly applauded by the people of Virginia. Unless this rebellious movement was immediately met with some such decisive counteraction we would presently find both our State and country involved in revolutionary anarchy, with a future of irretrievable ruin.

Without hoping to obtain his acquiescence in my extreme views, I was nevertheless gratified to perceive that what I said made its impression upon Captain Botts. Educated at a Southern college, the narrow political ideas so sedulously inculcated at those schools still combated the more liberal and national teachings of his maturer life. His social sympathies and soldierly pride were also enlisted in the struggle against his clearer and higher sense of duty to his country. Thanking me courteously for my frankness he left me for a time, and I saw him engaged in earnest and excited conversation with some of his brother-officers. Presently he returned and asked if I would repeat to the field-officers of the regiment what I had said to him.

I consented without hesitation, and accompanied him to a private room, where I met Colonel Allen and some others. I here repeated substantially what I had said to Captain Botts—with somewhat more of reserve in language, however, as I was not so well acquainted with the gentlemen present. I was heard with respect and evident emotion. A printed proclamation, which had been circulated by the Richmond emissaries, was brought in and subjected to critical discussion. It was a call upon the volunteer military and the people generally to rise and protect their honor, their property, and their rights, by seizing the national arsenals at Harper's Ferry. It recited the passage of the Secession Ordinance and the seizure of the Norfolk Navy-yard, and was signed by Turner Ashby, claiming to act by order of the Governor of Virginia. On examination it was pronounced unsatisfactory, and Colonel Allen declared that unless he had some better authority his regiment should not move. He, moreover, became excited at the suggestion that there was an attempt to practice deception by the State agents; and declared that if they had dared to deceive him he would hold them to personal account.

Acquaintances of Messrs. Ashby and Seddon insisted that they were honorable men, and that their personal statements had been more clear and conclusive than the printed circular.

I asserted broadly that I did not believe either what they had said or what was published, and that in times like the present I would trust no man's word or honor who was acting with the revolutionary junta, whatever might have been his previous character.

After some further discussion it was determined by the Colonel that the regiment should move to Halltown, the appointed place of rendezvous, but they should go no further unless he obtained more satisfactory authority from the State Government.

I was disappointed at this conclusion, for I felt assured that, once at the rendezvous, influences would be brought to bear which would carry Colonel Allen forward in spite of himself; and as he was disposed to acknowledge the validity of an order from a State officer commanding him to make war on the United States,

I did not doubt he would be speedily furnished with such authority.

Although apparently acquiescing in the Colonel's decision, I could perceive that Captain Botts was as much disappointed as myself, and before parting he urged me to accompany them to the rendezvous, with the expression of a vague hope that I might use some influence, even there, to avert the commission of a deed which he abhorred from his inmost soul. I promised to follow them. The regiment moved off, and after dinner I walked down the turnpike to Halltown, four miles distant from Charlestown. Here I found the troops halted, awaiting reinforcements, which were reported on the march from various quarters to join them.

By this time I had satisfactorily weighed the elements by which I was surrounded, and concluded not to meddle further with the business unless formally called upon for counsel. So I sat apart and amused myself sketching the animated and picturesque scene. In the course of the afternoon several of the expected companies arrived. Captain Ashby and Mr. Seddon had come up from Harper's Ferry, while Dick Ashby, a brother of the Captain, had arrived from Fauquier with a small squad of cavalry. An earnest and excited discussion among the leaders was kept up for a long time, and while some countenances appeared vexed with doubt and indecision, others lowered with anger and dissatisfaction. I was not invited to join the council, but could easily divine the trouble. Ashby, who had greeted me so frankly in the morning, now passed with averted face. As we supped together at a neighboring farm-house he studiously avoided exchanging words or looks with me. I was glad that we had understood each other without the scandal of an open quarrel. This seed, however, bore evil fruit at a future day.

While we were at table a courier arrived from the direction of Winchester, man and horse bespattered with mud and reeling with fatigue. On opening his dispatch Ashby's cloudy brow cleared, and rising hastily from his chair he handed the paper to Colonel Allen. As he read it Allen also sprung to his feet, and turning to me said, cheerily, "Now I can act with a clear conscience. Here is a paper I can recognize, a peremptory order to seize Harper's Ferry, with the official indorsement of the Adjutant-General of the State."

The arrival of this paper seemed to have satisfied all scruples and dispelled all doubts. Spurs jingled, sabres rattled, horses neighed, and the voices of officers were heard in every direction marshaling their troops. The men, flattered with the idea of being foremost in the enterprise, sprung to arms and formed their column with alacrity.

It was quite dark, and as I passed out of the house Captain Botts took my arm, and in an agitated manner inquired what I thought now of the posture of affairs.

I asked if he was sure the order which had arrived was not a forgery. He was fully assured of its authenticity. I then went on to repeat the views and arguments I had exhibited in the morning, urging them with still greater vehemence of manner, and, if possible, in stronger language.

Admitting that he chose to recognize a right which I did not—the right of the Convention to pass an act of secession—this act could have no validity, even under the assumption of legality upon which it was based, until accepted and confirmed by a formal vote of the people. That vote had not been taken. It could not lawfully be taken for thirty days after the passage of an ordinance of secession by the Convention. The people of Virginia would never confirm such an act by their vote. The proposed movement on Harper's Ferry was therefore not only a treasonable attack upon the Government of the country, but it was also a most atrocious outrage and fraud upon the people of Virginia. In electing the Convention the people had demanded the right to consider and pronounce upon its action. By this rash and unauthorized move the people were betrayed, their rights trampled upon, and by those whom they had trusted with their guardianship.

"Yet I hold my commission from the State, and am bound to obey the orders of the Governor," said the Captain. "What would you have me to do?"

I answered with heat: "Can any miserable local functionary have the right to order a free citizen to commit a crime against his country? Can you feel bound to obey an order which involves so flagrant a violation both of State and National law; of all faith and honor both to Government and people? Does your commission bind you to this extent? If so, you should tear it to shreds and throw it to the winds."

My friend listened without essaying to reply, but sat with his elbows resting on his knees and covering his face with his clenched hands.

When I concluded he rose, and in a voice of anguish exclaimed: "Great God! I would willingly give my life to know at this moment what course I ought to pursue, and where my duty lies!" With this he hurried to join the column, which was already in motion.

I had intended to go no further than Halltown, but the entrancement of curiosity and interest was irresistible, and I continued to follow the march of the troops at a short distance. The stars twinkled clear and chill overhead, while the measured tread of the men and an occasional half-whispered word of command were the only sounds that broke the stillness of the night. It was an awful opportunity for reflection.

The column was suddenly brought to a halt by the peremptory and startling challenge of a sentinel in the road. It was too dark to see what was going on, but I presently heard the order given to load with ball-cartridge, followed by the ringing of ramrods and clicking of musket-locks. The leading company then fixed bayonets, and forming across the turnpike, swept forward at a double quick. The challengers had retired, and the column resumed its march. At the toll-gate near Alstad's they were again challenged and halted, with the same result.

Here I overtook an acquaintance who was following the column in a buggy, and feeling fatigued from my walk, accepted the vacant seat beside him. He professed himself greatly distressed at the proceedings, and said he had done all in his power to stop them, but without avail. I told him I had "said my say," and did not intend to meddle further with the business, yet, from present appearances, it was possible there would be a fight. I suggested that during the tremor which immediately precedes decisive action men are sometimes more willing to accept reasonable counsel, and conjured him to use his influence (which I knew was great) to stop the movement.

He said it was useless to attempt further interference, as every thing had been ordered and determined by high authority. He was doubtless better informed than I, at that time, of the power and deep design which directed the movement.

The troops were now marching up the southern slope of the hill, since called Bolivar Heights, the crest of which was covered with pine woods and dense thickets of undergrowth, and furnished a favorable position from which to resist their advance. From certain unmistakable symptoms I concluded that very little force would have been required to drive back the raw soldiers and morally irresolute men who composed the advancing column. I expected momentarily to hear the opening volley from the summit, and advised my companion to drive his wagon aside from the line of fire. To my surprise the march was unmolested, and they moved on to the cemetery at the forks of the road above the village of Bolivar. Here another challenge halted them for the third time.

Meanwhile emissaries from the town had brought information that the Armory employes and citizen volunteers had joined the United States troops, and would assist in defending the place. Taking advantage of this unreliable report I again urged my companion to attempt some interference which might avert the impending calamity. The defenders would now have the advantage in numbers as well as in the superior skill and hardihood of the men. An attempt to seize the national property must surely result in bloodshed and disaster, filling our whole district with mourning, and entailing upon those engaged the double dishonor of unsuccessful treason. While we were talking a group of the leaders came riding to the rear, engaged in high discussion. I heard Colonel Allen say, in a peremptory tone, that his men should not move another step.

It appeared that instead of three thousand men expected by Ashby, only three hundred and forty had been assembled, including the cavalry and some artillerists, with an old iron 6-pounder from Charlestown. At Halltown the paucity of numbers was overlooked in the eagerness to seize the virgin honors of the enterprise. Now, when within musket-shot, more prudent counsels were entertained. A little less glory and a few more men would answer the purpose quite as well. It was not a fight they were seeking, but the possession of Harper's Ferry, with its supplies of arms and valuable machinery. If this purpose could be better accomplished without bloodshed, why not wait for the reinforcements now on their way? Colonel Harman, of Augusta, who had arrived since dark, reported them to be hastening forward from all points up the Valley. Mr. Seddon said, as he was not a man of war he could not advise in the premises. But as Allen's command comprised nearly the whole force present his decision was generally acquiesced in. Ashby alone seemed impatient and dissatisfied with the proposed delay. While the officers were thus discoursing and looking toward the town there was a sudden flash that illuminated for miles around the romantic gorge where the rivers meet. Then followed a dull report, reverberating from mountain to mountain until it died away in a sullen roar. The flashes and detonations were several times repeated; then a steadier flame was seen rising from two distinct points, silently and rapidly increasing in volume until each rock and tree on the Loudon and Maryland Heights were distinctly visible, and the now overclouded sky was ruddy with the sinister glare. This occurred, I think, between 9 and 10 o'clock P.M. For the moment all was excitement and conjecture. Some thought they had heard artillery, while others declared the Potomac bridge had been blown up. The more skillful presently guessed the truth, and concluded that the officer in command had set fire to the arsenals and abandoned the town. Ashby immediately dashed down the hill at the head of his cavalry to reconnoitre and ascertain the facts. The idea that there was to be no fight seemed to afford very general relief. My sympathy with this feeling was mingled with a deep sense of humiliation, in knowing that my Government had yielded so rich a prize to the revolution upon so feeble a demonstration.

Quietly withdrawing from the circle of acquaintances with whom I was conversing, I walked down to the town alone, by the Bolivar Road. The Old Arsenal buildings on Shenandoah Street and several of the shops in the Armory inclosure on Potomac Street were in full blaze. The road was alive with men, women, and children hurrying to and fro, laden with spoils from the work-shops and soldiers' barracks. There were women with their arms full of muskets, little girls loaded with sheaves of bayonets, boys dragging cartridge-boxes and cross-belts enough to equip a platoon, men with barrels of pork or flour, kegs of molasses and boxes of hard bread on their shoulders or trundling in wheel-barrows.

Taking advantage of the first opportunity that had offered during their lives perhaps, these people seem to have entered upon the work of sacking and plundering as promptly and skillfully as veteran soldiers could have done, wherefrom I conclude that this propensity is inherent in the human character, and only awaits opportunity for development. The ground around the burning buildings was glittering with splinters of glass which had been blown out by the explosion of gunpowder used to ignite the fires. The streets in the vicinity were silent and vacant, the train of plunderers from the shops avoiding the route. I took my seat upon a barrel and commenced sketching the scene by fire-light, when a man called to me from a distance advising me to leave, as the whole place was mined and would presently be blown up. I thanked him, but concluded to take my chance, as I thought all the powder was already burned.

This impression accounted for the loneliness of the neighborhood when I arrived. As I kept my position in apparent security the dread of a general explosion gradually disappeared and the reassured inhabitants began to swarm around the fires. Some of the workmen got out the engines and succeeded in extinguishing the flames at the stock factory.

The people were for the most part tongue-tied with terror. Overwhelmed with ruin, they either did not know who was responsible, or were afraid to speak their thoughts. Occasionally a woman would use the privilege of her sex and open her mind pretty freely, abusing Yankees and Southerners alternately, and consigning both parties to the bottom of the river.

When at length it seemed to be definitely ascertained that there were no mines to be exploded a noisier and more demonstrative company of actors appeared on the stage. These were the chronic loafers who used to crowd the bar-rooms discussing local politics and strong drinks, who were regular attendants on the platform on the arrival of the passenger trains, and prominent men about elections. These fellows were armed to the teeth, and ran hither and thither in high excitement, threatening blood and thunder against whomsoever it might concern. Chief among them was a late civil functionary of the county, well known in former times. Reeking with dirt and whisky this worthy paraded the streets armed like a war mandarin of the Celestial Empire, carrying a rifle with sabre bayonet on either shoulder, and girt about with a belt containing several additional bayonets of the old pattern.

For some time I was in doubt as to which side of the question these fellows had espoused, but at length the tendency of their sympathies was developed by a furious discussion as to whether they should pursue Lieutenant Jones, who was said to be retreating with his men toward Hagerstown, or whether they should go down to Washington forthwith and "jerk old Abe Lincoln out of the White House." The majority in council having determined on sacrificing the Lieutenant, they started for the Pottomac bridge with frightful yells and many formidable gesticulations.

A by-stander happening to suggest that the bridge might possibly be mined, they considered the question and concluded that Jones was not a bad fellow after all, and had only obeyed the orders of his rascally Government. Whereupon they retired, in search of more ammunition perhaps.

As the night advanced the streets became more crowded with people from the town and neighborhood, but up to the hour of midnight no troops except Ashby's squad of horse had made their appearance. By one o'clock the fires had sunk in ashes, when, gloomy, chilled, and fatigued, I sought a bed at the house of an acquaintance.

As I ascended the hill I met Colonel Allen's regiment coming down. From over-exertion and excitement I did not sleep soundly, and was frequently disturbed during the night by the sound of drums and the tramp of passing squadrons.

April 19.—On going down into the town this morning I found that there had been considerable accessions to the State forces, seven or eight hundred having arrived during the night and morning, while as many more were reported on the way.

Confusion reigned supreme, ably seconded by whisky. The newly-arrived troops having nothing to eat, consoled themselves as usual by getting something to drink. Parties were detailed to search the houses for the arms and public property which had been carried off the evening before. This search was stoutly resisted by the women, who skirmished after their fashion with the guard, with tongue and broomstick, holding them at bay while their husbands endeavored to conceal the spoils they had acquired.

A rough estimate of the night's work showed that about sixteen thousand muskets had perished by the burning of the arsenals, and that one building (the carpenter shop) of the Pottomac Armory had also been destroyed.

On the other hand, several thousand new rifles and muskets complete, with all the costly material and machinery of the National Armory, had passed into the power of the revolution without a blow.

Such were the visible and material results, but the social and political consequences who could estimate?

I must confess that I felt this morning like a man wandering in a maze. The future exhibited but a dim and changing vista. Was the experiment of popular government indeed a failure, as our conservatives had been predicting from the commencement? Was Macaulay right when he said that our system would crumble into anarchy upon the first serious trial?

If the present Government of the United States, as many maintain, and as its own attitude of late seems to admit, has neither the right to punish privy conspiracy, nor the power to defend itself against factious aggression, then why should we regret its overthrow? Let the impotent imposture perish, and the American people will speedily establish a more respectable and manly system on its ruins.

While indulging in these speculations my attention was directed to the flag-staff which stood in the yard of the Old Arsenal. The national standard had been lowered, and in its place floated the State flag of Virginia.

It would be difficult to describe the mingled emotions excited in my mind by this simple incident.

Once in my early youth I visited the crater of Vesuvius, and, venturing down the interior slope for some distance, I found myself upon a projecting cliff of lava. Here I stood for a time looking curiously down upon the sea of smoke that concealed every thing around and beneath, when a sudden breeze rolled the clouds away and for a moment my eyes beheld the hideous gulf that yawned below. A pit whose sulphurous horrors and immeasurable depth were revealed only by the glare of lurid flames and boiling lava—whose appalling aspect paralyzed the senses like the grasp of a nightmare. A sight which memory never recalls without the shudder that accompanied its first revelation.

So it seemed that the sudden gust of emotion, excited by the lowering of our starry flag, had swept away the mists of speculation and revealed in its depth and breadth the abyss of degradation opened by secession.

Yesterday I was a citizen of the great American republic. My country spanned a continent. Her northern border neared the frigid zone while her southern limit touched the tropics. Her eastern and her western shores were washed by the two great oceans of the globe. Her commerce covering the most remote seas, her flag honored in every land. The strongest nation acknowledged her power, and the most enlightened honored her attainments in art, science, and literature.

Her political system, the cherished ideal toward whose realization the noblest aspirations and efforts of mankind have been directed for ages. The great experiment which the pure and wise of all nations are watching with trembling solicitude and imperishable hope. It was something to belong to such a nationality. Something to be able, in following one's business or pleasure, to travel to and fro without question or hindrance, to take red-fish in the Mexican Gulf or trout in the great lakes, to chase deer in the Alleghanies or adventure among grizzly bears in the Rocky Mountains, and every where to remember, as you inflated your lungs with the free air, "This is my country!"

It was something, when questioned of one's nationality in foreign lands, perhaps by the subject of a petty monarchy or obscure principality, the impoverished and degraded fraction of a once powerful empire, ruined by the madness of faction, local ignorance, and secession. It was something, in replying to such inquiry, to feel one's heart swelling with imperial pride such as moved the ancient Roman in the days when he could quell the insolence of barbaric kings with the simple announcement, "Civis Romanus sum."

This was yesterday. To-day, what am I? A citizen of Virginia. Virginia, a petty commonwealth with scarcely a million of white inhabitants. What could she ever hope to be but a worthless fragment of the broken vase? A fallen and splintered column of the once glorious temple.

But I will not dwell longer on the humiliating contrast. Come harness up the buggy and let us get out of this or I shall suffocate.

On our way to Charlestown we met great numbers of persons afoot, on horseback, and on wheels, hurrying to the scene of excitement. Some attracted simply by curiosity, others armed and demonstrative, eager to claim a share of the glory after the danger was over. My friend and I discoursed mournfully of the prospect before us and the country. Indeed there was nothing in the subject calculated to promote cheerfulness. He hoped that the great change might be accomplished without war. I neither believed in the possibility of such a result, nor did I wish it. Of the great twin governing powers in human society—Fraud and Force—I decidedly preferred the latter. I was wearied and disgusted with the reign of subtle phrasemongers and empty babblers, and hailed the dawn of an era which promised to develop the latent manhood of the nation, and sweep away the cobwebs of tricky and compromising politicians with sword and fire.

April 20, Charlestown.—To-day we received confirmation of the passage of the ordinance of Secession by the Virginia Convention. This was followed by news of the riots of the 19th in Baltimore, and the destruction of the Navy-yard at Norfolk.

Under these accumulating proofs of the inability or unwillingness of the General Government to defend itself the arrogant confidence of the Secessionists continued to increase, while the Unionists exhibited a corresponding depression. Every hour brought accessions to the forces at Harper's Ferry. The volunteer companies from the adjoining counties were gathered in without the slightest regard to the political views of officers or men. The Border Guard of Martinsburg, a fine company, whose Captain and seven-eighths of whose members were decided Union partisans, at first made some difficulty about obeying the Governor's order; but at length, mystified by subtle counsels, they agreed to march to Harper's Ferry with the United States flag flying. As may be supposed the flag was soon furled after their arrival; but the opinions it typified rankled for some time after and bore troublesome fruits.

On Sunday, April 21, in pursuance of important private business, I went from Charlestown to Harper's Ferry, and thence by the train to Baltimore. As Maryland was at that time supposed to be one of the elect, and Baltimore, by the acts of the 19th, had earned the right to be regarded as a true Southern city, the railroad communication was uninterrupted.

At the stations near the city we heard the wildest rumors of fights going on and battles impending. The conductor told me that a large body of Pennsylvania volunteers were advancing on the town by way of Cockeysville, and that the Baltimoreans, six thousand strong, had marched out to meet them.

At the Camden Street dépôt I met Captain K— of the United States navy, with whom I exchanged salutations. He seemed in a good deal of perplexity, and, after some hesitation, told me he was about going to Washington, and asked if he could trust me with a message?

I replied with warmth that he might rely upon me, even if the message involved a question of life or death.

He frankly apologized for the implied doubt, but said that every thing was in such confusion that he did not know who to trust. He went on to state that the city was in the hands of a revolutionary mob, and he wished to send a message to the officers in charge of the Naval Dépôt not to display the United States flag as usual on the next morning. There was no force to protect it, and, if displayed, it might bring the officer into trouble and would be torn down by the rabble.

The Captain's eye flashed and his lip quivered as he spoke: "If I had any means of defending it it should wave in the face of the whole city; but as we are helpless I do not wish the flag exposed to insult." We clasped hands, and I promised the message should be duly delivered. As I walked up street carrying my traveling sack I was accosted by men and women who, perceiving I was a stranger, beset me with questions and repeated the most startling rumors. Harper's Ferry was occupied by fifteen thousand Virginians, with thirty pieces of artillery. Lee was on Arlington Heights preparing to bombard Washington; while Jeff Davis, at the head of fifty thousand men, was marching on that doomed city—these were the jubilant gobemouches: others in mortal terror followed me to learn when the Virginia army was coming to relieve Baltimore, now threatened by a hundred thousand Abolitionists, determined to sack and burn it in revenge for the affair of the 19th. I said what I could to chasten the hopes and soothe the fears of these good people, and kept on my way.

Throughout the town every thing evidenced alarm and excitement. Men and boys were running wildly about armed with swords, horse-pistols, fowling-pieces, bowie-knives, and every imaginable weapon of offense. At first I saw them singly or in small parties, anon they marched by in organized companies and even battalions. On Baltimore Street crowds were collected in front of hardware stores and shops, where fire-arms are sold, crushing in the doors and helping themselves to every thing that would answer for a weapon. Axes, scythes, hatchets, sword-canes, pitchforks, were distributed to the eager and half-frantic mobs. In addition to the weapons and utensils thus violently obtained there was a reasonable amount of promiscuous stealing of matters pertaining to the commissary rather than the ordnance department. Tobacco, whisky, jewelry, and, an article which in all civilized countries is recognized as the main-spring of war, money.

To these proceedings the city police appeared to make but a demonstrative resistance, occasionally firing a volley from their revolvers in the air, which only served to increase the turbulence of the mob, and evidenced that these guardians of law and order were either too timid to act, or were themselves in sympathy with the rioters.

In following up Captain K——'s directions for the purpose of delivering the message with which I was intrusted, I at length found myself at the head-quarters of the volunteer medical staff, hastily improvised to succor those who were expected to fall in the great battle that was to be fought. There were two or three wash-tubs full of lint, a barrel or two of rolled bandages, splints, tourniquets, and cases of baleful knives, hooks, and probes lying open and all ready for use. The cruel and cold-blooded aspect of these apartments was softened by the presence of tables covered with sandwiches, cold fowls, sliced tongue, and pickles, flanked by decanters of whisky and baskets of Champagne.

Ignoring the patent lint and scientific cutlery I took a young surgeon's advice, gratuitously proffered, and helped myself to Champagne and sandwiches. I here learned that all communication with the North had been cut off by the burning of the railroad bridges, and that the city had risen in arms to drive back the Pennsylvanians "en route via Cockeysville" for Baltimore and the Federal Capital. No collision had yet been reported, but the surgeons waited in momentary expectation of a call for their services.

After some further search I at length found an opportunity to deliver the message with which I had been intrusted, and thus ended the adventures of the day.

Owing to the condition of the city, and the stoppage of communication with the North, I found it impossible to conclude my business as speedily as I had hoped. I therefore took quarters at the house of a friend, determined to bide my time, and meanwhile to amuse myself observing the march of events.

On Monday, 22d of April, the excitement still continued, the mobs occasionally breaking into shops in search of arms.

The battle of Cockeysville did not take place as was expected. The Pennsylvanians, who were for the most part unarmed and altogether unprepared for a warlike encounter, had received warning of the proceedings in Baltimore, and prudently halted. The Baltimoreans suspended their attack until the result of certain negotiations with the authorities at Washington should be known. It was finally conceded that these troops should turn back and reach the Federal city by another route. The immediate cause of the popular outburst having been removed by this acquiescence, the excitement began visibly to subside; and although the revolutionary faction had still absolute control of the city, symptoms of a sweeping reaction had begun to manifest themselves. Nevertheless, during the week that followed, the national flag was nowhere displayed, and on the street every body talked secession if they expressed any opinion at all. Around Barnum's were congregated a number of sinister-looking fellows, who publicly boasted of the part they had taken in the affair of the nineteenth. Among these I recognized several border ruffians of Kansas notoriety. Volunteer companies still paraded the streets under the State flag of Maryland, yet it was evident that more discreet and methodical heads were directing affairs. Disorder and violence were repressed. The wild volunteers were organized and shut up in barracks where they could do no immediate mischief, and where their superfluous enthusiasm might be cooled off by hard drilling, guard-duty, and uncomfortable beds. For this judicious management of these dangerous elements I believe Maryland was somewhat indebted to Colonel Huger of South Carolina, then of the United States army.

Meanwhile the under current of loyal feeling was becoming every day more decided. The best men in Maryland were known to be unswerving in their determination to support the nationality, while hundreds, who, under the sudden excitement and confusion of ideas incident to the times, had seemed to acquiesce or had actually joined in the late movement, believing they were called upon to defend the city from attack, now, upon reflection, perceived the ruin to which they were inadvertently hastening, and turned their backs on it. The leaders of the movement began to be alarmed at this aspect of affairs. One of them, a local politician, meeting an acquaintance from Virginia on the street expressed himself thus despairingly, "Damn it, the excitement is going down, they are all caving in; if something is not done to keep it up we are all ruined. Can't you tell me some exciting news? something that I may publish to keep the people moving? I don't care a damn whether it is true or not—if it is only sufficiently stimulating."

It was thus easy to perceive that Baltimore was in the hands of the same sort of people who had played so successful and so fatal a game in Virginia and other Southern States; and notwithstanding these indications of a popular reaction, it was evident that the Maryland conspirators did not intend to relinquish their grasp upon the authority which they had seized by surprise and violence, or slacken in their efforts to drag their State into the vortex of secession. Shortly after the affair of the 21st a quantity of small-arms were forwarded to the city from Harper's Ferry. The revolutionary forces were strengthened by volunteer companies from the rural districts, and imposing reviews were held daily; while the most absurd and incredible reports of the conduct of the national troops moving through Maryland via Annapolis were industriously circulated to keep up the irritation of the popular mind.

On the 27th of April I met a friend who was on his way to Annapolis for the purpose of visiting his son, then a cadet in the Naval Academy. I was easily persuaded to accompany him, and at an early hour we took the steamer for that place.

As we passed Fort M'Henry the national flag was displayed from the boat in response to that which floated over the fort, while three cheers were given and returned with unction. The emotion excited by this incident awakened historic memories. It was the sight of the flag floating over the ramparts of Fort M'Henry during its bombardment by the British that suggested to Frank Key the verses that have since become our national anthem, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Arrived at Annapolis, we found that city occupied by the national forces under the command of Major-General Butler. The Navy School had been shipped bodily to Newport, Rhode Island, while its premises were used as barracks and drill ground for the volunteers arriving daily by ship loads. My companion, on ascertaining that the motive of his visit was removed, returned immediately to Baltimore. Finding in the quaint antiquity of the city, and in the military activity of the rendezvous, an attractive field of observation I determined to remain for several days.

Through the politeness of Captain Rodgers, of the navy, I obtained a permit from General Butler to visit the academy grounds at pleasure. Here the work of organizing and equipping the troops hastening to the defense of the national capital was going on with all the promptness and efficiency that the occasion demanded. Vessels were continually arriving with supplies, arms, and recruits in the raw. These recruits generally had to be renovated from the epidermis outward, and then drilled into soldiers all in a few days. So far as external appearance went this was satisfactorily accomplished. Outside the military inclosure the city of Annapolis was as quiet as a New England village on a Sabbath morning. A few officers and curious country gentlemen hung about the hotels. A few meek-mannered volunteers (fellows who had never borne arms) dawdled about on their good behavior, trafficking at stores and candy-shops, and slyly sounding for forbidden stimulants. Few citizens were seen on the streets, and a number of the best residences were closed, the inmates having abandoned the town in terror or disgust. While strolling about the streets of rural aspect I frequently fell into conversation with citizens of the plainer class, and found them generally in sympathy with the rebellion, and stuffed with underground rumors of the most marvelous character. One man told me that since the advent of the Yankee troops several of his acquaintances had disappeared mysteriously, and he had satisfactory information that they had been kidnapped and hung by Butler in the academy grounds. For himself, he averred that he never went to bed at night with any certainty as to where he would find himself hanging in the morning.

From conversations here with officers of the army and navy I became satisfied that the National Government fully intended to assert and maintain its supremacy by arms, and for the first time since the commencement of our troubles I felt elated with a hope for the future of my country.

April 30.—In the afternoon I took passage on the steamer Balloon, and after encountering a severe gale on the bay arrived at Baltimore about ten o'clock at night.

On my return here I found the tide of revolutionary opinion decidedly ebbing. The national flag had reappeared in some places, communication with the North had reopened, and men no longer boasted in public of their complicity in the proceedings of the mob.

Having at length succeeded in concluding the business for which I came, on the 2d of May I returned to Charlestown, Virginia.

In returning through Harper's Ferry I found the plot had thickened considerably during my absence. The militia general, Harper, had been suspended in command by a Colonel T. J. Jackson, formerly of the United States Army, and latterly a professor at the Virginia Military Institute. There were probably at this time five thousand men assembled here, including regiments from several of the Southern States. A regiment of Kentuckians, under a Colonel Duncan of Louisville, had arrived, while detached companies and individual sympathizers from Maryland were being organized into a battalion. Several field-guns were in position commanding the railroad approaches, while batteries were exhibited on the neighboring cliffs in localities which struck me as more picturesque than judicious. Although still very imperfect in organization and discipline, and deficient in arms, ammunition, clothes, and equipments, the troops already showed the presence of a military head. Among the volunteers from Berkeley and Jefferson I perceived a good deal of discontent and disaffection. Two weeks of soldiering had already told on the enthusiasm of the feeble, while many of the more thoughtful, who had been decided Union men, found themselves in an awkward position between their political views and interests and their implied military engagements. Some with whom I conversed hoped to be delivered from their difficulties by the rejection of the Act of Secession by the people, and expressed their determination to vote against it if the opportunity was allowed them.

I talked freely to a number of acquaintances, and earnestly advised several young men, in whom I felt an especial interest, to get out of it while there was yet time.

Captain Botts looked haggard and care-worn, like a man who felt the force of the classic epigram, "volentem trahunt fuita." He evidently avoided conversation with me, and I did not press it.

May 6.—This morning the business which had taken me to Charlestown was concluded. I was married to a lady of that place, and immediately thereafter started for Berkeley Springs via Duffields Dépôt.

At Berkeley we found the Judge and lawyers assembled to hold the spring term of the Superior or District Court. Amidst the turmoil of arms on all sides it was consolatory to find this vestige of established forms. The court was thinly attended, however, and there was little or no business transacted, it being painfully apparent to every one that the reign of civil law in this region was approaching its end, and the elements of social order rapidly resolving into armed anarchy.

Practically the revolution had not yet reached Morgan County. Except a few petty politicians, and some who held civil or military commissions from the State, the people of the county were almost unanimous in their loyalty. In maintaining their position against the entangling influences of State and county organization they were counseled, encouraged, and assisted by my father, who from the beginning had exhibited the most uncompromising and defiant opposition to the secession movement. In oral or written arguments he asserted without reserve the paramount authority of the National Government. He maintained that he was born, and had always lived, a citizen of the United States, and regarded as insolent presumption the action of any local assembly which pretended to dispute this claim or absolve him from his true allegiance.

He scorned all ideas of compromise or concession to such local assumption, and scouted at every suggestion of doubt or timidity in regard to the result of the approaching contest. While elsewhere every thing seemed to be yielding, deluded by the specious falsehoods or overawed by the terror of armed treason, all within the influence of this strong spirit seemed to partake of his courage and steadfastness. At Berkeley loyalty still enjoyed freedom of speech in public places, while it was secession that sneaked about, silent, apologetic, eaves-dropping, and meditating treachery.

For my own part I had become disgusted with the course of public affairs. I had been disappointed both in Government and people. All my prognostics had failed. The delay and indecision still manifested at Washington chafed my impatient zeal, and I turned resolutely to the accomplishment of the personal plans which I had formed. I had been for some time engaged in fitting up a house at Berkeley and making arrangements for a future that pleased my fancy. These plans I developed to my wife as I brought her home and installed her in the cottage. For the present we have enough of social life around us, composed of the nearest and dearest of our kindred, while during the summer heats the baths of Berkeley will always attract a brilliant and cultivated society.

But the war?

The war will not reach us here. This region is poor, sparsely populated, and difficult of access. The armies will avoid so inconvenient and unprofitable a field, and fight it out elsewhere.

Literature and the beautiful arts will furnish me with interesting and remunerative occupation. Here is my library—a pretentious name perhaps for the few hundred volumes I have collected; but in a county where an almanac and a Bible are considered a very creditable literary aggregation I may be allowed to call mine a library. There are some rare and valuable books in the collection well worth the perusal, under the trees of a summer morning, or at the winter fireside by the light of a kerosene lamp.

But the newspapers will be filled with exciting news of the war? It is to be hoped the mails will be stopped, and we will get no newspapers; or, in any event, we need not read them.

Here is the parlor, decorated with paintings and furnished with musical appliances—piano, violin, and guitar, with choice selections of music from the classic composers of Italy, Germany, and France. A parlor organ is all my ambition covets in this direction. I will get one some day when—

Hark, was that the sound of cannon?

No—it was only a book that struck the piano by accident.

My studio is also well supplied with materials for work—crayons, oils, and water-colors. Here are drawers filled with sketch-books, papers, engravings, photographs, and a mass of unburned trumpery—the results of lazy beginnings, labor-saving conceits, and experimental failures, such as in time will accumulate upon the hands of every artistic amateur.

There are still some theories unexploded that haunt me—some sequestered paths in the paradise of Art yet unexplored. A few years of uninterrupted quiet will afford me the long-coveted opportunity of solving these problems.

Alas! before those years of quiet are attainable, there are other and greater problems to be solved. What is this?—a collection of engravings—"Battles of the French Revolution." That is ominous.

There will be no war. Civilization has advanced since that day. A people may rise against despotism, but not against a free government. The people of Virginia and the South will not be sold and trampled upon with impunity. The descendants of five generations of freemen can not be wielded like hereditary serfs.

Is that one of your unexploded theories?

Here are my trees and flowers. What more delightful relaxation from the weariness of books and pencils than the cultivation of flowers and the planting of trees!

The man who is trimming the borders thrusts his spade in the ground and relieves himself of the burden of his thoughts: "I say, Captain, what are we going to do if these secessionists want to force us to serve against the United States? I'll die first."—"They will hardly dare to push things so far in this region, Sam. If they do attempt it, you understand?"

A walk through the adjacent woods and along the hill-sides develops even now more floral beauties than the cultivated garden; but in June there will be an exhibition that will put to shame all exotic collections.

"WHAT NEWS OF THE WAR?"

But even these covert rabbit paths and secluded dells, where the pheasant hides its young, afford us no refuge from the omnipresent thought. Some axe-bearing mountaineer, sitting upon a prostrate log across our walk, propounds the inevitable question, "What news of the war?" We visit the village store to purchase a skein of thread, or stop at the post-office to inquire for a letter—at each place we find the little newsmongering conventions holding their daily sittings, assembling early and adjourning late, questioning all comers, and repeating the most exaggerated rumors.

Here is a room which seems to have been purposely avoided; mysterious and double-locked, like Blue Beard's fatal chamber. Ah! this room contains some rubbish; in truth, this room is my armory. That my health may not suffer from too much study I have arranged to indulge my taste for rural sports, for which the neighboring mountains and rivers afford ample opportunity. This neat English double-barreled piece is for birds, and this quaint and richly-ornamented jäger rifle is for deer and bear. Here, too, are several jointed fishing-rods, with a complete outfit of lines and flies.

And those grim-looking muskets in the corner—what are they for? They are for defense. When the worst comes—and perhaps it will come soon—we'll gather our mountaineers together and fight it out with these brazen tricksters who have dared to sell our native State to treason and dishonor; bullet for bullet, and life against life. And that will be war after all—civil and social war in its most dreadful shape.

And thus it was. Whether we looked upon the pages of a book or the petals of a flower, the steadfast features of a picture or the countenance of a sympathizing friend; whether studying the tender tints of the budding forests or the richer and more evanescent glories of the clouds, by sunlight or moonlight, alone or in company, sleeping or waking, there was the shadowy face of the Gorgon staring with its sleepless, stony eyes.

The cherished plan of philosophic seclusion was acknowledged a failure at the end of a fortnight, and I was glad when my wife proposed a visit to her friends in Charlestown.

May 21.—To-day we took the cars at Sir John's and returned to Charlestown. It was painful to remark the progress which the revolution had made during our absence. Joe Johnston had taken command at Harper's Ferry, and, it was said, had ten thousand men assembled there. Trains of cars loaded with troops were passing continually from Winchester to Harper's Ferry. The war spirit was in full blaze, and all traces of Conservatism or Unionism seemed to be rapidly disappearing before the terror of armed force and the irresistible current of social sympathy.

May 22.—I visited Harper's Ferry to-day. The adjacent hills are covered with camps, and all the work-shops and public buildings converted into barracks. There were regiments from Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Maryland, and from various sections of Virginia. States that have seceded and those that are still loyal are here represented. How does this appear to those who insist on State sovereignty? These troops seem to be well equipped and fairly armed. They drill most industriously from morning till night. I am informed that Maryland Heights is occupied by a regiment of Kentuckians, while a company of Ashby's cavalry is established on the Maryland side, guarding the bridge at the Point of Rocks.

I observe, however, that the construction of stockades and block-houses on the Maryland and Loudon Heights, commenced under Jackson's orders, has been discontinued, and that no further steps have been taken to mount and locate the heavy guns brought up from Norfolk. A farmer also told me that Johnston had made a requisition on the country for two hundred wagons. I also noticed that they were removing the armory machinery and material from Harper's Ferry as rapidly as possible—to be set up at Richmond, it was rumored.

It required very little military sagacity to interpret these signs, and I became convinced that Johnston would abandon the place as soon as the Federal troops moved.

Considering the character of the force thus hastily collected, the degree of order and discipline already attained is astonishing. Whisky-shops, those great enemies of social order and military subordination, were mercilessly suppressed. A sense of soldierly pride that would have been creditable to veterans seemed to govern the conduct of both men and officers. Indeed, the orderly and business-like earnestness of the camp, to those who still dream of peace or cherish hope that the thing will blow over, is far more disheartening than all the menace and bluster of the world outside.

It was worthy of remark, too, and contrary to our ordinary experiences with raw troops, that in all these camps one never heard the report of fire-arms by day or night. It was understood at the time that ammunition was very scarce; and I afterward found a letter from Colonel Jackson, wherein he states that they were at that date especially deficient in percussion caps. He had managed to procure thirty thousand from the North—about three rounds per man—and was much in need of money to purchase a larger supply.

May 23.—To-day the polls were opened for the purpose of taking the popular vote on the Ordinance of Secession. As the State is already at war with the Government this seems to be a work of supererogation. So far as the County of Jefferson was concerned the polling was a farce. Troops were sent to the precincts where the force of the Union sentiment was expected to display itself, and violent threats were made against the persons and property of those who should dare to vote against the Ordinance. The result was that about one-half the voters of the county did not appear at the polls at all. A respectable minority registered their voices against it in face of the threats, and, with the assistance of the soldiers' vote at Harper's Ferry, there appeared but a small majority in this county sustaining the Ordinance.

In the adjoining County of Berkeley the troops sent to overawe public sentiment had to be shut up in their barracks to prevent their being attacked by the infuriated populace; while out of two thousand votes this county gave a majority of eight hundred in favor of the Union. In Morgan, where my father was then residing, the Ordinance was repudiated by a vote of six to one.

Whether the act of the Convention was confirmed by the popular vote of the State I do not know to this day; nor did I ever think it important to know, it being evident that all the agencies of the State Government were in the hands of conspirators who hesitated at nothing which might serve to accomplish their ends. Without the knowledge or consent of the people the State was already involved in a war with the National Government. Under the pretense of asserting State sovereignty the Richmond junta had already violated all law and trampled on popular rights. Their usurped authority was maintained and enforced, not by Virginians, but by the bayonets of strangers gathered in from all parts of the South and West; from States that had seceded and those still supporting the Union; in short, from any quarter that could furnish the requisite supply of rash, reckless, adventurous material.

The proud and sensitive Virginian already saw the sacred soil of which he was so jealous trodden by the rude feet of strangers with whom he had no affinity, social or moral; the honor of his family, his property and person at the mercy of power without law; villages occupied by swarms of boasting and brawling Kentuckians; the oldest and most respected citizens insulted on the streets, for opinion's sake, by half-civilized Mississippians; civic rights at the mercy of the military telegraph; and free opinion covering under the menace of an Arkansas bowie-knife. Virginia, so boastful of her history, so jealous of her independence, so captious in regard to her sovereign rights, now lay subjugated by armed strangers, groveling at the feet of the Cotton Confederacy.

It is not surprising, therefore, that so little interest was felt in the result of the voting on that day; and when the Governor of the State, some time after, proclaimed a considerable majority in favor of Secession, very few persons thought themselves at all enlightened on the subject.

During the ensuing week I visited Harper's Ferry frequently, and amused myself sketching the picturesque scenery and the dramatic groups in which the camps abounded.

May 27.—To-day met an old acquaintance in a field-officer of one of the Alabama regiments, and took a camp dinner with him. When I came out of the dining-tent I found a dragoon waiting with orders for my arrest. Accompanied by my friend, I went to Provost Marshal's office to ascertain the nature of the charges against me. While awaiting that officer's arrival I had a view of the adjoining guard-house, densely populated with the sweep-ings of the camp. By reversing the ordinary acceptation of the phrase, it might have been termed a "select company," and very judiciously selected.

It appeared that I had been denounced by some fellow as a Union man and a correspondent of a Northern paper. I denied that I was a correspondent of any paper; stated that I was a native and resident of the district, and sketched for amusement, as had been my custom from childhood. I showed my sketches, and the Marshal, fully satisfied, released me, with many polite apologies.

I then resumed my drawing; but perceiving that I was still jealously watched, and being advised by some of the officers that I might be mistaken for a Yankee and get into further trouble, I put up my pencils and returned to Charlestown, determined to visit Harper's Ferry no more.

Another incident occurred about this time which indicated the direction in which we were drifting, and revealed the precarious tenure upon which life and personal liberty would depend hereafter. One morning General Johnston, at Harper's Ferry, received a telegram from Beauregard, at Manassas Junction, in these words: "Arrest Abraham Herr."

Mr. Herr was a citizen of Harper's Ferry, a wealthy manufacturer, and universally esteemed. His Union sympathies were not doubted; but as he was uniformly acquiescent and obliging, and seemed only interested in saving his property, the most truculent Secessionists respected his position. Johnston had him arrested immediately; but as no charges were preferred, and there appeared no reason for detaining him, his case was turned over to the civil authority. On his trial before a magistrate's court, although there appeared no charges written or oral, neither accusers nor witnesses, yet Mr. Herr was put under bonds for thirty thousand dollars, to answer generally to any thing that might turn up. Such was already the zealous subserviency of a civil tribunal to a remote military whisper.

When it came to be understood among the troops at Harper's Ferry that Virginia had been transferred to the Southern Confederacy the dissatisfaction was so serious that mutiny was apprehended. This feeling was especially strong among the Border companies, in which were found so many Union men who had been deluded and dragged into a false position.

They had hitherto clung to the desperate hope that a refusal of the people to confirm the ordinance of Secession would deliver them from their embarrassment. When it became apparent that there was no hope from this quarter, many threw down their arms and went home. It was said that one-half of the Border Guard from Martinsburg left their colors, declaring they would not serve in such a cause. As most of these young men went to their homes in Martinsburg, a force was sent to arrest and bring them back. For better assurance in finding them the order was executed at midnight, and the victims were dragged from their beds amidst the shrieks and protestations of their families. That night Martinsburg recalled the words of Jeremy the prophet, "In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning."

The prisoners were carried to Harper's Ferry and tried for desertion. One who was contumacious and defiant was condemned to be shot. This, however, was only intended as a menace. The time had not arrived when such extreme measures would have been judicious. Some of these men were persistent, and finally made their escape. Not a few finally joined the United States army.

In the midst of the difficulties, both civil and military, which surrounded him I could not but admire the deportment of the Confederate commander; his reticence, calmness, firmness in essentials, easy acquiescence in non-essentials, his avoidance of all needless irritations of hostile political sentiment, of all needless severity in dealing with men not yet accustomed to arbitrary rule. In short, his judicious management of a power, not yet secured by the habits of military discipline and continually disputed by adverse opinion, marked him as a man of uncommon ability, and one likely to be dangerous to the Government against which he had taken arms.

May 28.—This afternoon I received some information which filled me with alarm and distress. A young kinsman, an officer of the Second Virginia Regiment, told me that on yesterday, while in Martinsburg, he was accosted by a stranger who named himself Lieutenant Colonel Flagg, of the Morgan militia, and who boastfully informed him that he had just returned from Harper's Ferry, whither he had gone to denounce old Colonel Strother, of Berkeley Springs, charging him with having several hundred muskets in his possession, and inciting the citizens of the county to organize and take arms against the Confederacy. He further stated that, at his suggestion, a body of troops had already been dispatched from Harper's Ferry to crush the movement and arrest the traitors. My cousin, to whom these statements were made, did not disclose himself to his informant, but immediately on arriving in Charlestown related them to me.

In view of my father's age and feeble health I could scarcely believe it possible that he had committed himself by so rash and premature a movement. I was aware that not long before he had visited Washington and offered his services to President Lincoln. But as he was too old for active service, I construed this only as a public declaration of loyalty to the Government—a zealous demonstration, to show, amidst the general defection, that there was, at least, one Virginia gentleman who felt the dishonor done to his State, and the danger with which his country was menaced by the late proceedings.

Yet I knew the Western Virginians were organizing and arming, and seriously apprehended that my father had received arms and become involved in some movement from that quarter. Knowing the extent and quality of the force at Harper's Ferry, I felt that an attempt of the sort in Morgan, without external support, must necessarily be fatal to those who engaged in it.

An officer, just from Harper's Ferry, confirmed the report that troops had been sent to Berkeley Springs, but he was enabled to give no details.

May 29.—During a sleepless night I made my plans. Arming myself with a revolver I rode over to Duffields Dépôt, and there took the cars for Berkeley Springs. I determined first to take summary vengeance on the wretch who had denounced my father, and then to join him and share his fortunes whatever they might be.

At Sir John's I ascertained that the Confederate troops had actually visited Berkeley, and returned, carrying with them several hundred old muskets, which had been sent from Harper's Ferry two years before to arm the citizens during the excitement which followed the John Brown raid. There had been no collision between the troops and citizens, and no one could tell whether or not any arrests had been made. Arrived at home, I entered the house with breathless anxiety. My sister met me with her accustomed cheerfulness, and, thus reassured, I had the courage to inquire for my father. At the sound of my voice he entered from an adjoining room, looking well and calm as usual. He said the officer commanding the State troops had quietly marched over from Sir John's, got the arms which were stored in the court-house, and returned without questioning or interfering with any one.

I did not tell him what alarming information had brought me up, but felt altogether so much relieved that I modified my plan of vengeance. Having quietly prepared a written paper, I took a friend and went in search of my Lieutenant-Colonel of militia. We overtook him walking out with a companion. Ordering him to halt, I confronted him, and taxed him with his treacherous conduct. He responded by an absolute denial of the whole matter, declaring, on his honor, that he had not even visited Harper's Ferry. I silenced him, and went on to state when, where, and to whom he had unbosomed himself. He was struck dumb.

After heaping upon him every outrageous insult that could be expressed in language, I produced the paper previously prepared, containing an acknowledgment of falsehood and an humble apology therefor: presenting it on the top of my hat with a pencil, I ordered him to sign it. Laying aside a large club which he carried, the stalwart Colonel obeyed the order with an alacrity that was creditable to his military education.

I then told him that I intended to publish this note at army head-quarters and elsewhere, and would be content for the present with having disgraced him; but I assured him that if he offended again in like manner he would not be allowed the opportunity of purchasing his life by ignominy.

In the public square of the village I called together such persons as were in sight, and read the paper to them, after relating the circumstances under which it was exacted.

I took the trouble to enact this little comedy with the hope that it might protect my father from treacherous dealings, which I apprehended from other quarters.

From further conversation I learned that there was no foundation whatever for the reports which this pragmatistical scoundrel had set afoot. In full confidence that the General Government was preparing an adequate force to crush the rebellion, my father had been using all his influence to prevent local disturbance, counseling the elders to pursue their avocations quietly and the young men to join the United States army, where their fighting propensities might be lawfully gratified and their prowess turned to better account than it would be in private brawls.

Having satisfactorily disposed of this "ridiculus mus," the product of the mountains, I started next morning (May 30) to return to Charlestown. At Martinsburg I found every thing in confusion and excitement. The Second Regiment of Virginia Volunteers had been for some time stationed at a point opposite Williamsport to observe the National forces concentrating at Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, and whose advance already occupied Williamsport. Upon some alarming indications from the other side the Second Regiment was ordered to retire, and being composed of raw material, it passed through Martinsburg in a condition bordering on stampede. The Union citizens were jubilant in expectation of an immediate advance of the National army, while many Secessionists, in their terror, packed up their household goods and fled southward, with their families and negroes.

Owing to detentions from this and other causes, I did not reach Duffields until after nightfall, and was obliged to make my way to Charlestown, five miles distant, on foot, through mud and darkness.

FORAGING.

DEMONSTRATING THE VALUE OF LEDGES.

THE REESE RIVER COUNTRY.

I WILL not subject the reader to the perils of another trip across the mountains. The road is familiar to him by this time. He has seen it in winter, spring, and summer—by daylight and by moonlight—on foot and from the front seat of a pioneer stage.

On a pleasant morning in the month of May last, I took my seat in the stage for Austin. My fellow-passengers were a couple of Israelites in the ready-made clothing line; three honest miners, deep in ledges; and a motherly female, with five small children, including one at the breast. We were not to say cramped, but there were enough of us for comfort, considering the heat of the weather and the length of the journey. I do not wish to convey the idea that there is the slightest inconvenience in sitting bolt upright on a narrow seat between two heavy men, one of whom persists in telling you all about a patent amalgamator; and the other in smoking bad cigars, going to sleep at brief intervals, punching you with his elbows, and butting you with his head; or any thing to complain of in the boots of your opposite neighbor which have a propensity for resting on your toes, ranging over your shins, getting up on your seat, and airing themselves on the adjacent window-sill; or cause of mental disquietude in the suspicion of being greased all over the back of your only coat by a numerous family of children whose hopeless attempts to appease their appetites by means of sausage, bread and butter, and mince-pies, are constantly impressed upon you; or any thing short of agreeable sensations in breathing clouds of alkali-dust, and fighting whole armies of gnats. With special reference to stage-passengers who travel along the banks of the Carson in the early part of summer these afflictions are of too serious and complicated a nature to fall within the range of ordinary comprehension, unaided by an enlarged practical experience.

A trip to Austin is something to look back upon with pleasure in after-life. It is always a source of happiness to think that it is over; that there are no more gnats and alkali-clouds to swallow; no more rickety and forlorn stations to stop at; no more greasy beans and bacon to pay a dollar for; no more jolting, and punching, and butting of heads to be endured on that route at least. And yet it has its attractive aspect; the rich flood of sunshine that covers the plains; the glorious atmospheric tints that rest upon the mountains, morning and evening; the broad expanse of sage-desert, so mournfully grand in its desolation. The whole journey of a hundred and seventy miles from Virginia City may be summed up thus: Forty miles along the Carson, picturesque and pleasant, though rather dusty and somewhat obscured by gnats; station-houses built of boards, posts, and adobes where the horses are changed; occasionally bars and bad whisky; bacon and beans, with a strange dilution of coffee three times a day; excellent drivers and the best of pioneer stages; sage-deserts and alkali-deserts, varied by low barren mountains; teams with heavy wagons, heavily laden with machinery and provisions for Reese River, slowly tugging through the dust; emigrant wagons filled with women and children, wending their way tediously toward the land of gold, and empty freight wagons, coming back from Reese, such are the principal features of the journey.

Of the country I shall only add that it is the most barren, desolate, scorched up, waterless, alkali-smitten patch of the North American continent I have ever yet seen—a series of horrible deserts, each worse than the other. Parallel ranges of naked mountains running nearly north and south, with spurs or foot-hills running east and west, form a continuation of valleys through which the road winds. These valleys sink in the middle, where there is generally a dry white lake of alkali in which even the sage refuses to grow. Very little wood is to be seen any where on the route—none in the valleys, and only a few dwarfish nut-pines on the sides of the mountains. I know of no reason at all why any human being should live in such a country; and yet some people do, and they seem to like it. Not that they are making money either, for very few are doing that, but they get a sort of fondness for alkali in their food and water, and seem to relish flies, gnats, bacon, and grease as standard articles of diet.

After two days and a night of concentrated enjoyment in this kind of travel, our last driver cracks his whip, and our stage makes a dive into a little rut and out again. There is a faint show of water on the wheels. "What's that?" cries every body in astonishment!

"Gents!" says the driver, "I didn't like to alarm you; but that's REESE RIVER, and there's Jacobsville!"

No wonder we were startled, for Reese River is a source of astonishment to every traveler who passes over the road to Austin for the first time. It derives its name from an emigrant, who must have had a humorous turn of mind when he called it a river. That it is not so long as the Missouri or so majestic as the Mississippi is very generally understood; but when the expectant traveler comes to a sort of ditch in the desert about six feet wide, with the slightest glimmering of a streak of water at the bottom, he is naturally astounded at the frolicsome audacity of Reese. A jolly old Reese he must have been, to embark his name on the smallest river in the world, which sinks in the desert a few miles below the crossing, and thus undertake to float down the stream of life into an enduring fame! May you never be forgotten, Reese, while Reese River flows through the sage-deserts of Nevada! May you never be thirsty, even in the thirstiest region of futurity, when you think of that noble stream which bears your name forever onward over the upper crust of earth!

Seven miles more in the pleasant glow of a sunshiny afternoon takes us rattling up the slope of a cañon, near the mouth of which stands the famous city of Clifton, or rather its ghost; for Clifton was the father of Austin, and died a sudden death about two years ago. All that remains of it now is a broad street flanked by the wrecks of many frame shanties, whose lights are fled and whose garlands must be dead, for they are nowhere seen, unless the everlasting bunches of sage that variegates the scene should be regarded in that metaphorical point of view.

It is said of the citizens of Clifton that they were blind to their own interests when they started the city. With florid imaginations in reference to the future, they established florid prices for town-lots, and thus drove honest miners higher up the cañon. The nucleus of a new town called Austin was formed; but the way to get to it was hard—like the way of the transgressor—and the Cliftonites chuckled much, believing they had the thing in their own hands; when lo! the Austinites suddenly went to work and built a magnificent grade, and down went Clifton, as if stricken by the fist of a mighty pugilist, with a cloud of mourning around its eye!

But we anticipate history. It behooves us first to explain why Clifton and Austin ever came to be built at all, there being nothing in the general aspect of the country to encourage settlement from any indication it presents of social, agricultural, or commercial advantages over other parts of the world.

The present site of Jacobsville, seven miles from the mouth of the cañon, was an overland station prior to the discovery of the silver mines. Its principal feature was then, and still is, a fine spring of water, which is a notable attraction in that dry country. The town of Jacobsville was started on speculation after the Reese River excitement commenced; it being the only place within a hundred miles where whiskey could be had in any considerable quantity. Like Clifton, however, it received a black eye when Austin was started; and now stands a melancholy monument of human hopes frustrated.

In May, 1862, William Talcott, an employé in the Pony Express service, went to look for his ponies in the nearest ranges of mountains, which, as fortune ordained, was the Toiyabe range. He took with him an Apache boy, purchased by James Jacobs in Arizona for a jack-knife and pair of blankets. Talcott and the Apache thus became the pioneers of civilization. They struck for the nearest cañon—and they struck up this cañon in search of the ponies—and while they were looking about them they struck a streak of greenish quartz, which Talcott thought resembled some quartz he had seen in Gold Hill. It was of a bluish green color, with a strong suspicion of mineral in it, but what kind of mineral nobody knew up to that date—not even the Apache who was born in a mineral country, and whose range of observation had been confined almost exclusively to mineral deserts from the time he was born up to the date of his purchase by Jacobs for a jack-knife and pair of blankets.

It is a remarkable fact that Frémont might have distinguished himself by this discovery, many years before, had he not passed a little too far to the south. His route lay through Death Valley and the southern rim of Smoky Valley, crossing by Silver Peak to Walker's Lake, and thence up the Walker River Valley. He left some of his men at Owen's Lake and crossed the Sierras into California. The great Pathfinder, unfortunately for himself, took the wrong path and missed the Reese River Mines by about 170 miles. Of course no blame can be attached to him for that, though there are people in Central Nevada who, having availed themselves of other people's discoveries, rather incline to the opinion that Frémont ought to have gone the Reese River route and opened up the mines. If mining speculations be a test of merit, is it not enough to have opened up and sold out the great Mariposa estate? And yet there may be people in New York who could wish that the famous Pathfinder had missed the Mariposa trail by 170 miles north or south, east or west—so it seems quite impossible to select a path that will suit every body.

On the 10th of July, 1862, the first miners' meeting in the Reese River country was held, and the district of that name was established. William Talcott, James Jacobs, Wash. Jacobs, and a Mr. O'Neill located a claim on a ledge, which was called, in honor of the pony express, the "Pony Ledge." It is a mooted question whether Talcott or the Apache boy can justly claim so much as the ponies they were in search of, which were thus summarily disposed of with a name and the four feet they happened to carry about them. This company located three other claims in the lower foothills, but none of them turned out very well. The ores first discovered were chiefly antimonial. Mr. O'Neill had a ranch on Truckee River, where he lived when he undertook to live in any particular locality. On his return from Reese River he took home with him some of the ores from the newly-discovered mines.

Mr. Vanderbosch, an intelligent Hollander, who had some knowledge of minerals, happened to see these specimens at the house of O'Neill, and immediately pronounced a favorable opinion as to the "indications of silver" contained in them. They consisted, in great part, of the metals usually found in connection with silver—copper, iron, antimony, and galena. The traces of silver were but slight; still sufficient, with the indications mentioned, to encourage the idea that there were deposits of rich silver ore in the vicinity. Specimens were subsequently taken to Virginia City and tested by assay, with such results as to attract immediate attention.

In October, 1862, Daniel E. Buel, an enterprising miner and frontiersman, who had spent much of his life among the Indians of California, started for the Reese River country with two friends, William Harrington and Fred Baker. Buel was a man of indomitable spirit, great energy of character, and superior intelligence. He had served in various official capacities in California—for several years as Indian Agent in charge of the Klamath Reservation, where I first met him. And here let me say, as Ex-Special Agent of the Government, that I found Buel a remarkable man in more respects than one. He was an honest Indian Agent—the rarest work of God that I know of.

This party prospected about two miles south of the present city of Austin, in the foot-hills. Nothing that could be properly denominated a ledge had been found at that time above the Pony Ledge. The only work done was the running of a tunnel, called the Highland Mary, which failed to strike any thing except a good place for burying money. San Francisco parties, I believe, were engaged in this.

Buel and his friends made several locations, some of which turned out well. They had a hard time of it, without shelter and with but little food. The town of Austin was named by Buel, who, if not its only father, was at least its biggest and ablest father.

As an independent historian I am greatly at a loss on this point. During my stay of nearly three months in the Reese River country I think I saw the first man who started Austin (according to his own account) in fifty different aspects. Sometimes he was tall and sometimes short; sometimes thick and sometimes thin; occasionally old and occasionally young; sober by turns and drunk by turns; always with a different name, and never concerned about his own fame, but merely desirous of setting me right and preventing interested parties from imposing on me. As a stranger, of course I could not be expected to know who built the first house—there it was, built by my informant; which accounts for the fact that fifty different houses were pointed out to me as the nucleus around which the famous city of Austin sprang up.

Mr. Vanderbosch, having satisfied himself as to the value of the ores, started over from Virginia, and arrived in December, 1862, with a small party. Up to that date little had been done except in the way of prospecting. Wherever blue rock was found locations were made;

but their value had not yet been determined.

The first locations of importance were made by Vanderbosch and his party. On the 19th of December the Oregon Ledge was discovered and located, near the upper end of the cañon, where now stands that part of the town called Upper Austin. Ten days later the "North Star" and "Southern Light" were located. These were the first true discoveries of rich silver ores in the Reese River district. All that had previously taken place was uncertain and conjectural. Six miles south, in the so-called but now abandoned district of Simpson's Park, Andrew Veatch, an enterprising explorer, who had been all through the Humboldt country, had discovered and located a claim called the "Comet," which attracted some attention. Veatch and his party went vigorously to work to develop their ledge. It went up like a rocket, and then came down like its stick.

Vanderbosch obtained his first specimens of ore from the Oregon Ledge. They were found in a quartz vein three feet wide, with granite casings, showing silver chlorids, fahlertz, antimonial, and ruby silver. These specimens were sent to Virginia City to be assayed. The yield was so extraordinary—several thousand dollars to the ton—as to cause the most intense excitement. Nothing so rich had yet been discovered in our mineral possessions. Numerous as the frauds and disappointments had been in mining speculations, there could be no doubt as to the wonderful richness of these ores. There were the ores and there were the assays to speak for themselves. What if the veins were narrow? Nobody wanted a very wide vein, when a narrow one yielded six or seven thousand dollars to the ton. The Comstock was prodigiously big and wide, but it looked poor in comparison with this. These assays were made in the latter part of December. Immediately the news spread—it flew on the wings of the wind, north, south, east, and west.

THE PRINCIPAL MINES.

THE GREAT MAGNIEFF LEDGE.

Then came the great rush of January, 1863—the Washoe excitement over again! I flattered myself I had helped to put an extinguisher on these crazy mining speculations; but when will people learn any thing from experience? Kern River, Gold Bluff, Frazer River, Washoe—these were not enough! Time mis-spent and money misapplied only whetted the public appetite for the precious metals. Failure never yet disheartened the American nature, or quenched its individual members. General Grant was no more defeated by numerous repulses at the siege of Vicksburg than these hardy adventurers were by suffering, loss of means, loss of time, and constant failure to realize their expectations. Ever cheery, ever hopeful, they were up and at it again after every knock down—knowing no such thing as defeat.

I am sorry for this trait in my fellow-countrymen. It is so annoying to our neighbors across the water. Englishmen can't understand it, and won't believe it; and yet we do these things in our own self-confident style, as if the British Lion were of no consequence whatever. Even the London Times never stopped us from winning a battle or opening up a new country, or emptying our pockets in any new speculation that offered the slightest symptom of a "pay streak."

Ho, then, for Reese River! Have you a gold mine? Sell it out and go to Reese! Have you a copper mine? Throw it away and go to Reese! Do you own dry goods? Pack them up for Reese! Are you the proprietor of lots in the City of Oakland? Give them to your worst enemy and go to Reese! Are you a merchant, broker, doctor, lawyer, or mule-driver? Buckle up your blankets and off with you to Reese, for there is the land of glittering bullion!—there lies the pay-streak! So, at least, every body thought in the winter 1862-3. The weather was cold; the mountains were covered with snow; neither food nor shelter was to be had at Reese, but what of that? Did lack of food or lack of houses ever stop a Californian from going any where he pleased? Sage-brush was plenty, at all events, and bunch-grass; and if horses and mules and cows could live on sage and grass, men could live on meat. The only house in the cañon was a small stone cabin, situated near the Pony Ledge. Vanderbosch and party, Buel and party, and other leading pioneers, camped all the winter in open tents; and I am told they had a jovial time of it. Every body was wonderfully rich—in feet. Tents and wigwams of all kinds soon began to sprinkle the hill-sides. Then came great freight-wagons with lumber, and whisky, and food and raiment, which brought fabulous prices; and up went Clifton and Austin like magic. About five thousand people gathered in and around Austin during the spring and summer of 1863. They came from California, from Washoe, from Idaho, from Salt Lake, from every quarter of the compass—some with money, most without, but all with the brightest hopes of sudden wealth. Speculation soon reached a pitch of extravagance to which all previous mining excitements were tame. Lander Hill, Central Hill, and Mount Prometheus, soon became riddled with claims, looking like naked giants, lying on their backs, sprinkled with small-pox. Every man who had a pick or a shovel dug a hole two or three feet in the ground, and called it the "Grand Magniff," or the "Great Stupendous Ledge;" and thereupon he took to speculation. It was all feet—but little or no mining. Every body wanted to realize the grand result without delay.

This was the memorable period to which I alluded in a former article, when lodgings in a sheep-corral had to be paid for at the rate of fifty cents per night in advance; when no man could safely undertake to sleep under the lee of a quartz-boulder, in consequence of that claim being guarded by a prior occupant armed with a six-shooter; when it was a luxury to sit all night by a stove, or stand against a post behind a six-foot tent. I have heard of men who contrived to get through the coldest part of the season by sleeping when the sun was warm, and running up and down Lander Hill all night; and another man who staved off the pangs of hunger by lying on his back for an hour or so at meal-times with a quartz-boulder on his stomach. Of the wild speculations in mineral ledges it is needless for me to speak in detail. The subject is a sore one for some of my friends in San Francisco. A notable instance was related to me as characteristic of the spirit of the times. An adventurer, with nothing to sus-tain him but his own sanguine anticipations of the future, was one day engaged in digging a post-hole, when he struck something blue. It was a ledge—rich in mineral. He at once perceived that the ore was the best kind of chlorid silver; and he staked off his ledge, putting down himself and numerous friends as locators. But speculation was too keen and too grasping for him to profit by the working of his mine. An immediate offer of $60,000 was made him for his discovery, and he was fool enough to sell out, pocket his money, and retire from the mining business. At least every body thought he was a simpleton, till an assay of the ore was made. It was not chlorid of silver, it was only chlorid of lead—which may be valuable some day, when lead rises to a dollar a pound. The “Post-hole Ledge” attracted much attention at the time. I am told the purchaser does not place much confidence in the honesty of the discoverer, whom he at first regarded as a singularly verdant man to sell out at such a price, but now considers a cunning rogue.

Foreseeing that mills would be necessary to work the ores, Messrs. Buel and Dorsey took time by the forelock, and in June and July, 1863, erected a five-stamp mill in the cañon, which is now known as the California Mill. During the same summer the Rhode Island, Union, Pioneer, and Clifton mills were built.

The Oregon Mill was commenced in May, but not finished and in running order till January, 1864. This and the Pioneer were ten-stamp mills. All the rest had but five stamps each.

The work of building mills in this new country was attended with enormous labor and expense. Suitable timber for joists and beams was exceedingly scarce. Labor of every kind was high. Lumber was from $250 to $500 a thousand. The cost of transportation from California was a heavy item—freight being eighteen cents a pound from Sacramento. To get the necessary machinery across the mountains was a most laborious and expensive undertaking. There was scarcely any thing in the country but the stones upon which to build the foundations. The mines had produced comparatively nothing as yet, and the greatest difficulty was to procure the capital for the prosecution of these enterprises. Besides, little was known of the quality of the ores or the proper manner of treating them. It was a mere experiment—but a very bold one.

ABORIGINAL CITIZENS.

ONE OF THE CANDIDATES FOR MAYOR.

By the rude process of crushing and amalgamation the wastage was great, and the result by no means encouraging.

Mr. Vanderbosch, finding from the working of the first ores that it would be a losing business, and that a different plan must be adopted, erected a roasting furnace in March, 1864, which was a perfect success. It was the great event in the history of Reese River. Many had begun to despair of getting any thing out of the ores; but the roasting process proved at once that they could be successfully and profitably worked. The experiment was made under the most discouraging circumstances. The weather was so cold that the bricks of the furnaces had to be covered with blankets to keep any heat in them; and the machinery was of the most primitive kind. Still it was a success. The yield was remarkable considering all things—ranging from $150 to $1750 to the ton. The first class chlorids averaged from $300 to $500; second class from $150 to $300; and the third class would have yielded from $100 to $150; but it was not considered profitable to work them so long as there was an abundance of superior ores. The cost of working was about $80. It is now, as announced, somewhat less.

During the latter part of 1863 the natural result of the wild speculations which had been going on during the year became apparent. Little or no work had been done on the ledges. Miners had expended all their means, and nothing was coming in to keep them in food and raiment. Outsiders began to feel their pockets and wonder if there was any thing in this Reese River country. The success of the Vanderbosch's mill, and the development of the Oregon ledges during the ensuing spring, had an encouraging effect. Things began to brighten up; and San Francisco capital began to flow in. About $2,000,000 were invested in mines, mills, etc. during the year 1864.

The total amount of bullion shipped to San Francisco in 1863 was $50,000; in 1864, $600,000. The shipments during the year 1865 up to August averaged about $100,000 per month.

Very little, so far, came from the outside districts.

Before the close of 1864 a panic took place in the Reese River stocks. Some of the leading mines, which had been opened to the depth of sixty or seventy feet, had reached poor or barren rock, and a general impression prevailed that the ledges were not permanent. A fearful state of depression followed. Money was scarce, and it was impossible to go on working without capital. The supplies from San Francisco stopped. Those who owned stocks became tired of paying assessments; and now that there seemed no hope of returns in the future, many allowed themselves to be sold out.

The miners themselves remained confident—never for a moment losing faith in the mines. Such of them as were able continued to work on the ledges, hoping in time to get through the barren streak.

It is a leading peculiarity of the American people that they carry with them into every new territory their municipal and political institutions. A "city" of two houses and half a dozen inhabitants must have its Mayor and Common Council, its primary meetings, and election excitements. An American could no more live without making speeches or hearing them, holding office or voting somebody else into office, participating in a torch-light procession, or flourishing his hat over it, than he could without his newspaper or his daily "tod."

Austin was not exempt from this notable feature in American life. The city charter was passed with due solemnity in April, 1864. Public rejoicings followed as a matter of course. There was immense excitement at this time touching the political issues of the day. Republicans and Copperheads were pretty evenly divided; and the state of feeling between them was exceedingly lively, if not hostile. A great deal of betting took place on the test questions, the chief of which was the election of Mayor. Every man felt not only a local and personal but a national interest in the result. The two candidates were well matched. On the Democratic side was my friend David E. Buel—"Uncle Dave," as his fellow-citizens familiarly called him—a man of imposing presence, six-feet-four, and large in proportion, without a fault save that of being always on the wrong side, and with a frank, generous, off-hand way about him that was wonderfully attractive to the honest miners. Buel was a miner himself, and enjoyed a high reputation for energy and honesty. A more popular candidate could not have been chosen to give strength and respectability to a bad cause. It was expected that he would carry a large portion of the Republicans, and doubtless he would have done so at any other time. The other candidate was Charles Holbrook, a young man of excellent character and fine business capacity. Holbrook had just erected a handsome store, built of cut granite, and was one of the leading merchants. His integrity was undoubted, his intelligence of a superior order, and his political faith ultra-Union. The gladiators went heart and soul into the fight. Betting was the order of the day. Each party was perfectly confident of success. Among the bets made was one of a somewhat eccentric character. Dr. H. S. Herrick entered into an agreement with R. C. Gridley to the following effect: If Buel was elected, Herrick was to carry a sack of flour from Clifton to Upper Austin, the distance being about a mile and a half, and the grade up-hill all the way. If Holbrook was elected, Gridley was to carry a sack of flour from Upper Austin to Clifton, having the advantage of the down-hill grade.

The battle was exciting, but it was bravely and honorably fought on both sides. Holbrook, the Republican candidate, was elected by a fair majority. The sentiment of the people was sound when it came to the great question of maintaining the Union.

Gridley, true to his engagement, was on hand at the appointed time with his sack of flour. An immense concourse of people had assembled in Upper Austin to witness the novel performance. Laughter and good-humor prevailed on all sides. The best feeling existed between the victorious and the defeated candidates. Winners and losers enjoyed the scene with equal gusto. A grand procession was formed, headed by an excellent band of music. The newly-elected officers, including his Honor the Mayor, followed the musicians, mounted on horseback. Next to them came the hero of the day, the redoubtable Gridley, with a sack of flour on his back. On each side marched a standard-bearer, carrying high in the air the flag of the Union. Gridley stood up to his task like a man, never flinching before the glorious emblem of liberty. If the truth were known, he worshiped it in his heart, though he had an eccentric way of showing it. Friends, citizens, and strangers followed. Never was there seen such a lively crowd in Austin. "Go it, Gridley!" "Stick to it, Gridley!" "Never say die, Gridley!" were the encouraging words that cheered him on all sides.

Arrived at Clifton, it was suggested by some enterprising genius, whose speculative spirit kept pace with his patriotism, that the sack of flour should be sold for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission. The proposition was received with unbounded applause. In a moment an empty barrel or a dry-goods box was found, and an auctioneer mounted upon it. The bidding was lively; but the crowd were not quite warmed up to the joke, and the flour only brought five dollars.

It was then determined that there should be another auction held in Austin. The sack of flour was taken up again, and the procession started back with it—this time marching to the tune of "Dixie." The most uncompromising Copperhead was won over; and all united in common sympathy for the suffering soldiers. It was a clever stroke of policy for the Republicans. The procession halted in front of the store owned by his Honor the Mayor. By this time the crowd was immense. Every body turned out to see the fun: miners from their holes in the ground; Reese River capitalists from their shanties; business men from their stores; women and children from their cottages and cabins.

The sack of flour was once more put up at auction with a general hurrah. This time the bidders were in earnest. They bid by the hundred, and by fifties and by twenties, many bidding against themselves. Republicans and Democrats bid without distinction of party. The best feeling prevailed; and $3000 was the grand result! The last purchaser always donated his purchase back to the Sanitary Fund. A third auction was held on the following day. The result on this occasion was $1700. The nucleus of so large a fund thus formed aroused the patriotic fire in the soul of Gridley. It was a glorious cause that could thus win the sympathies of every party. Henceforth Gridley was with it, body and soul. He would make an institution of this sack of flour. He would immortalize it—make a magnificent donation to the sick soldiers and a reputation for himself. So Gridley set forth with his sack of flour. It was sold at Virginia City for $8000; at Sacramento for $10,000; and at San Francisco for about $15,000. I was witness to the procession in San Francisco. It was the memorable event of the times. Never did Montgomery Street present a more imposing appearance. The beauty and fashion of the city were there; and so was Gridley, decked out in glorious array, the observed of all observers. Who would not have been Gridley then—gazed at as the great man of the age? What would Grant or Sherman have amounted to when Gridley was in view? Thus did Gridley draw the surplus cash from the pockets of the generous public; and thus did he do good service in the cause of freedom. All honor to Gridley!

Of the career of this distinguished gentleman on the Atlantic side I have read wonderful newspaper accounts. He was fêted, and gazed at, and admired, and hurrahed, and printed in weekly pictorials, and puffed, and joked—was the irrepressible Gridley; and the grand finale was $100,000 to the Sanitary Commission! Ever praised, ever sung in song be Gridley! It was a noble speculation, based upon a sack of flour and the popular sympathy for a noble cause. It commenced in Austin and ended with a net profit of $100,000 to the suffering soldiers, and immortality to the name of Gridley.

On the strength of his fame Gridley became interested with Mr. John W. Harker and other experienced financiers, and raised sufficient capital in New York to return to Austin and start a bank. The great banking establishment called the "First National Bank of Nevada" is now one of the prominent institutions of the country.

Buel, after his defeat for the Mayoralty of Austin, concluded to run for the Governorship of the State. He was nominated by the Convention at Carson—alas for Buel! The State was gloriously Republican. My worthy friend was sanguine to the last; he had many votes, but failed for want of votes enough. May he have better luck in his choice of party next time! He is a good fellow, and deserves to win in a good cause. Morally, he still lives; politically, he is a dead Buel.

I now come to a stand-point, from which I think we may take a general view of the country with special reference to its resources and future prospects. The elaborate reports of Professors Silliman, Jackson, and Adleberg, who visited Reese River during the year 1865, leave me but little to say, even if I were competent, in relation to its geological features; and the admirable detailed reports of Mr. Clayton on the individual ledges have quite exhausted that branch of the subject. A summary of what I saw myself in my unlearned way, with what I gathered from practical miners and experts, may enable the general reader to form a more vivid and comprehensive idea of the country than could be derived from purely scientific reports.

The district of Reese River lies on the western slope of the Toyahe range of mountains, and is distant from Virginia City, by the Overland Mail Route, 170 miles. It embraces a tract of hilly country some eight miles in length by four in width, bounded on the north by the Yankee Blade Cañon, on the west by the Reese River Valley, on the south by Simpson's Park, and on the east by the summit of the Toyahe range. Within these limits are situated, in close proximity to the main cañon which runs from Reese River Valley to the summit, those spurs or hills of the Toyahe range known as

"Lander Hill," "Mount Prometheus," and "Central Hill," in which the principal discoveries of silver-bearing veins have been made. Austin, the chief town and county seat of Lander County, lies high up in the cañon, extending along it for a distance of more than a mile, with a broad main street, intersected by cross streets running up to the left over the lower slopes of the hills. It contains at the present time (January, 1866) a permanent population of about five thousand. The buildings are principally frame, well constructed, and ornamented in front by rows of scrubby pines stuck in the ground. Among them are some pretty cottages, evincing a growing taste for the comforts and even the luxuries of life. The best private residences, such as Mayor Hanson's and Mr. Rankin's, are substantially built of stone.

MR. RANKIN'S HOUSE, AUSTIN.

In the business part of the town, on the main street, are many fine brick houses; also several handsome stores and saloons built of stone. The general aspect of Austin is cheerful and picturesque. During the period of my sojourn—from May to August—it presented every indication of prosperity. The population is one of the best I have seen in any mining town—active, industrious, hospitable, and orderly. In point of morals I do not believe there is a better condition of society in any community of equal number on the Pacific coast. This is mainly attributable to the fact that a larger proportion of the population consists of women and children than in most new mining towns; and in part to the prevailing scarcity of surplus means. Every man has to labor for a living. There is not much chance for gamblers or idlers; consequently there are few of them.

The Toyahe range of mountains, in which most of the discoveries of silver ledges now attracting attention have been made, commences near the Humboldt River, about 100 miles north of Austin, and extends in a southerly course, trending slightly to the west, a distance of 175 miles, where it terminates in the high desert plateau, which forms the southern rim of the Great Basin. Formerly the Overland Telegraph and Mail Routes crossed it a few miles to the north of Pony Cañon; but since the building of Austin both telegraph line and overland stages pass directly through that city and across the head of Big Smoky Valley.

The characteristic appearance of the Toyahe Mountains is that of extreme barrenness. The cañons and a few of the open slopes are dotted with a scrubby growth of nut-pine, juniper, white-pine, and a hard, scraggy kind of timber called mountain mahogany. In the vicinity of Austin most of the wood has been cut away for fuel and other purposes in the progress of mining; but north and south, from eight to ten miles distant, there is still a sufficient supply to last for several years, probably five or six. In the Smoky Valley districts the quantity of wood is much greater; and it will probably be many years before any difficulty will be experienced on that score. The barren aspect of the mountains arises more from the extreme dryness of the climate than from any want of fertility in the soil. During the rainy season bunch-grass flourishes all over the hill-sides, affording a fine pasturage for stock; and wherever there is water for irrigation the land is highly productive. The valleys are entirely destitute of timber, presenting a singularly desert-like appearance, except in those portions which are sufficiently moist to give a tinge of green to the everlasting sage-bushes by which they are covered.

Although it is not my purpose, as before stated, to attempt an elaborate description of the geological features of the Toyahe range, the great interest felt throughout the East in the development of the Reese River and adjacent districts, will justify me in making a brief summary of the prominent points. In doing this I take pleasure in acknowledging my indebtedness to Mr. W. C. Prescott, who has done more perhaps to encourage the introduction of Eastern capital than any person who has yet visited the country. Mr. Prescott is well known throughout the East, not only from his connection with the family of the distinguished historian—the late lamented William H. Prescott—but from the high reputation which he has achieved by his reports on the mineral resources of Central Nevada. As representative of the “Sterling Mining Company” of New York, whose possessions lie in Smoky Valley, he first visited that region in January, 1865, and subsequently made a thorough scientific reconnoissance of all the adjacent districts.

Mr. Prescott is of opinion that the rocks composing the Toyahe range belong to the earlier geological periods, as in all productive argentiferous regions. The ore-bearing ledges repose in these rocks, all of which are highly metamorphic, and many of them stratified. At and around Austin the numerous parallel veins are well disposed, with smooth and fine lateral faces, separated by a clayey seam of variable thickness, from a wall rock which is popularly called granite, and which has been received as such by some geologists. One theory is, that this district is a granitic basin, rupturing the transition series, and affording the anomaly of rich silver veins reposing in primitive or Plutonic rocks. Mr. Prescott thinks this granitic rock is transition in character, being the product of older granite, which has been pulverized and re-cemented, forming a highly metamorphic and altered granite, akin to gneiss and the earlier slates and schists of the Azoic period, and conforming fully to the series in which is found most of the other minerals of the range, of which, in addition to the slates, porphyry, gneiss, transition limestone, calc-spar, sandstone, and a variety of magnesian rocks, are the most important. Considering the granite deposit in this light, the geology of the Toyahe range is not only harmonized, but also in agreement with the corresponding Mexican ranges. The veins in Lander Hill, Mount Prometheus, and Central Hill, and in fact throughout the district of Reese River, are narrow, ranging generally from fourteen to twenty inches in width, and rarely exceeding three feet. This characteristic has given rise to the term “razor-back ledges,” so much in vogue among the Washoeites, who profess a contempt for the Reese River ledges as compared with the great Comstock. Their exceeding richness, however, compensates in a great measure for their lack of width. I have taken out ores myself from a mine in Lander Hill which assayed upward of $7000 to the ton; and I saw an assay of ore made which yielded at the rate of $10,000 per ton. One, two, and three thousand dollars are results which scarcely attract attention. The Austin ledges seldom show distinct or prominent croppings on the surface as in neighboring districts.

In that part of the Toyahe range which slopes into Smoky Valley, the quartz ledges lie boldly above the surface, in compact form, showing great width and strong traits of depth and permanency. As a general feature they have no clayey or slaty partitions, but lie in direct contact with the smooth faces of the granite formation already described. These silver-bearing veins at times protrude far beyond the slates, and at the surface are much leaner than below.

One of the advantages claimed for the ledges near Austin is the facility with which they can be worked. The granite formation in which they lie is soft, and blasting is but little required in getting out the ores. They are all true fissure veins, with well-defined casings. The clay seam between the quartz and the casings renders the excavation of the ores comparatively easy.

The chlorid ores reach from the surface to a depth of 60 or 70 feet. Then comes a lean or barren streak, extending down from 20 to 30 feet to what is called the water-level. It was this unproductive stratum which caused the extraordinary depression of mining stocks in 1864. But experience has demonstrated, in every case where the excavations have extended below the water-level, that the vein continues unbroken, and with every promise of permanency, to an unknown depth. The experience of the Oregon, North Star, Southern Light, Diana, Savage, Morgan and Munsey, Washington Irving, Providentia, Scottish Chief, General Hooker, St. Louis, Hubbard, and other leading mines which have been worked to any considerable depth, is sufficient evidence of the richness, depth, and permanency of the ledges. Splendid ruby and antimonial ores are now being taken out of all these mines, the lowest grade of which seldom falls short of $150 to the ton, while from $300 to $500 is a common yield. Insufficient machinery for pumping and hoisting has hitherto been the great drawback to the profitable working of the mines. The miners, who have held on to their claims through all the fluctuations and alarm of the past two years, are now reduced to the necessity of calling in the aid of capital. This, in part, accounts for the extraordinary number of claims now flooding the markets of New York.

NEW YORK SPECULATORS.

That many swindles have been perpetrated, and many worthless claims palmed off on a credulous public, is beyond dispute; but it is both unreasonable and unjust to condemn the whole country because dishonest men engage in nefarious speculations detrimental to its interests. If there are no good mines in the Reese River Country, where can we look for them? The man who is cheated in a horse would be laughed at if he complained that there are no good horses. Mining speculations are much on a par with speculations in horse-flesh. Brokers and horse-jockeys generally make their profits from the credulity of their fellow-men. If every purchaser personally examined the mines offered to him, or availed himself of the services of an experienced agent, there would be less disappointment in the investment of capital.

The general direction of the veins in the Toiyabe range is north-northwest and south-southeast, with a dip to the east. The pitch is from 30° to 70°, the average inclining from 35° to 45°.

From May to October the climate is mild; seldom too warm, and the sky almost invariably bright and clear. The extreme rarity of the atmosphere at this elevation, 6500 feet above the level of the sea, and the absence of moisture, give rise to a peculiar form of intermittent fever, called by emigrants and miners the mountain fever. Otherwise it would be difficult to find a more healthy climate. The winters are cold, though sometimes open and pleasant. On the north side of the hills the snow usually lies from November to May. In the valleys it seldom remains more than a few days at a time, and rarely interrupts communication by the public highways.

Some idea of the wonderful progress of Central Nevada may be formed from a glance at the number of mining districts which have been established since the discovery of the Reese River mines. Austin may be considered the central point from which these districts radiate. Mills have already been erected in many of them, and active operations in the way of developing the mines are now going on in most of them. The following are the principal districts, located within the past three years, with the distances from Austin, viz.: Yankee Blade, 4 miles; Amador, 6; Big Creek, 12; Geneva, 15; Santa Fé, 22; Bunker Hill, 30; Summit, 20; Ravenswood, 20; Washington, 35; Marysville, 45; Union, 63; Twin River, 65; Mammoth, 63; Diamond, 80; Cortez, 60; San Antonio, 100; Silver Peak, 125; Ione, 75; E. Walker River, 120; Egan Cañon, 160.

These do not by any means comprise all the valuable districts which have been opened throughout the interior, and on the confines of Nevada. I refer to them as having intercourse with Austin, and contributing in a great measure to the importance of that place as a market for the trade of the mines.

An important step toward the encouragement of investments from the East was made in September, 1864, by the Midas Silver Mining Company, of New York. Colonel J. V. Robbins came over to Reese as agent of the Company, and commenced the erection of a large mill on the left side of the old Telegraph Cañon, about three miles distant from Austin. In three months and nine days it was completed and in running order. The building is of brick, with a handsome brick smoke-stack, and contains a battery-room with fifteen stamps; an amalgamating-room, with eight Freiberg barrels and the necessary pans, separators, retorting furnaces, etc., and a large roasting-chamber, with the best fire-brick furnaces, all admirably arranged for convenience of access and economy of labor. The Midas Mill is, in all respects, one of the most perfect establishments of the kind in the State of Nevada. The machinery is of the latest and most approved kind, and works with wonderful steadiness and precision. It is no unusual thing to crush, roast, and amalgamate ten tons of rock per day. Under the careful management of Colonel Robbins, the result has been an average yield of $300 to $400 per ton of first-class ores; $150 to $200 of second-class; and $80 to $100 of third-class. The Midas Company own several valuable ledges in the vicinity, chief among which is the Midas, situated near the entrance to Yankee Blade Cañon. The yield of this mine has of late been such as to give great confidence to mining enterprises in this region. Already the Company have declared a handsome dividend; and the probability is, still larger dividends will be declared during the present year.

The success of the Midas Company's operations has demonstrated the value of good mill and mining property. Recently a magnificent mill has been erected on the southern slope of the old Emigrant Cañon, within a mile of Austin, by some Pennsylvanian capitalists, under the title of the Keystone Silver Mining Company. The work was done under the personal supervision of Captain Addison L. Page, Superintendent of the Company, and is admirable of its kind. The mill is of brick and stone, with the latest improvements in machinery. It contains a splendid battery of twenty stamps.

an engine and boiler-room, an extensive roasting chamber, and an amalgamating department second to none in the country. The Keystone Mill has sufficient capacity to crush and amalgamate twenty tons of ore per day. The Company owns three or four mines in connection with its mill property. Among these the "Scottish Chief," situated on Lander Hill, is at present the most promising. The ores from this mine run from two to five hundred dollars to the ton.

Another wealthy and enterprising Eastern company has erected a fine mill, about three miles farther to the north, at the entrance to the Yankee Blade Cañon—known as the "Confidence Mill." This is of the same capacity, and built upon very nearly the same general plan as the Keystone. Situated near the centre of a belt of rich mineral ledges, several of which are owned by the Confidence Company, it enjoys the prospect of an unlimited supply of ores. Two gentlemen from New York, Mr. Fearing and Mr. Boyden, have greatly distinguished themselves throughout Central Nevada by their able management of this enterprise. The "Confidence Ledge," upon which the principal work has been done, outside of the mill, is now yielding some excellent ores. A powerful engine, well protected by a frame building, has recently been erected at the entrance of the main shaft for pumping and hoisting purposes. I can see no reason why, under judicious management, the Keystone and Confidence properties should not yield handsome returns to the owners during the present summer. Each of these mills cost over $100,000. Add to this $20,000 for offices and outbuildings; and $130,000 for the cost of ledges, and the investments will not fall short of $250,000. I make this estimate upon my own judgment, and not from any information derived from the parties concerned.

The Parrott Mill, on Big Creek, nine miles south of Austin, furnishes another instance of the growing interest felt in this region by Eastern capitalists. Mr. John Parrott, the San Francisco banker, was the chief originator of this enterprise. The Company is known as the "Reese River Mining Company"—and Messrs. Duncan, Sherman, and Co., bankers, Messrs. Hitchcock and Darling (of the Fifth Avenue Hotel), Treanor W. Parke, Esq., and John Parrott, are supposed to be the principal owners of stock. The mill has just been completed under the superintendence of Captain Gager. It is a magnificent building, with strong wood frame-work and boarding, substantial stone foundations, and all the conveniences for working the ores by the most approved system. The Reese River Company owns a number of ledges in the adjacent hills, a large tract of wood-land, and a fine saw-mill, which has already paid for itself. Among the valuable ledges also owned by this Company in Lander Hill is the Providentia, in which some extraordinary "strikes" have recently been made at a depth of 300 feet. The vein is not wide—ranging only from two to three feet—but the ore is wonderfully rich. I saw average specimens taken out which assayed at the rate of $2000 to the ton.

the Parrott, is another specimen of the improved class of mills. The battery consists of ten stamps, and the furnaces and amalgamating department are of corresponding capacity. Connected with the mill is a fine town property, possessing the advantage of a plentiful and never-failing supply of water. Cañon City is situated at the entrance of the cañon, and Watertown immediately below. Two years ago there was an extraordinary degree of activity in town lots at this place. Every body thought it was the proper site for the great mining capital; and forthwith a town sprang up, with an express office, numerous stores and saloons, and a branch telegraph line. When the town was built and filled with inhabitants the question arose—What was it all about, and what were they to do? No valuable ledges had yet been discovered in the vicinity. Water was plenty, but the citizens could not live exclusively on water. So the town was as quickly abandoned as it was built; and now it stands—a long street of empty houses. The truth is, people were insane about that time. The property is really valuable. It embraces the best water privilege any where in the neighborhood of Austin. Within a few years, when the country becomes settled, it is destined to be the centre of an industrious farming and manufacturing population. It is one of the few places where vegetables can be abundantly raised, and where mills can be run by water-power—a valuable consideration in a mining country.

The high cost of reducing the ores has hitherto been a great drawback to the prosperity of the mining interests. While the Washoe mills can make handsome profits on ores ranging from $20 to $100 per ton, the Reese River mills are compelled, in consequence of the additional cost of roasting, to charge from $80 to $100 per ton. None but very rich ores can bear such costly working. A large amount of the labor and expense of working the mines is lost. Mills that could reduce $40 and $50 ores, with advantage to themselves and the miners, would soon make handsome fortunes. There is plenty of that grade of ore now lying waste over the hills.

In this connection a brief description of the process of reduction, under the improved system, may not be uninteresting.

When the ore is delivered at the mill, it is placed in a kiln and the moisture evaporated. It is then crushed dry in the batteries and taken from them in cars, upon a railway leading to a series of hoppers in the furnace room. From the hoppers it is shaken down into the ovens, where it is roasted. While the process of roasting is going on, it requires to be constantly stirred so that the most minute particles may be subjected to the action of the heat. This is continued from four to eight hours at a charge, according to the quality of the ore. Rich ores and heavy sulphurets require a longer time than poor or light ores. Salt is added, according to the greater or less amount of sulphurets to be reduced to chlorids. The per-centage of salt used is from eight to twenty, varying with the quality of the ore. Its effect is to develop through the heat a chlorine gas, which has a strong affinity for silver, and forms after desulphurization a chlorid of silver. The base metals are mostly volatilized, and thus separated from the silver. As soon as the ores are sufficiently roasted they are removed from the ovens to the cooling and screening room, where they are sprinkled with water to prevent wastage in the transportation to the amalgamating room. The next process is to collect the silver by amalgamation. Some of the mills use the Freiberg or barrel process, which is conducted by means of revolving barrels. Wheelers pans are also extensively used. Differences of opinion exist as to the relative advantages of the various methods of amalgamation. A common practice is, to precipitate the chlorid of silver by means of copper arms revolving in tubs. Steam is injected through small holes in the bottom of each tub, disseminating the quick-silver through the revolving mass. The silver chlorids, by contact with the copper arms, are precipitated in the form of metallic silver, leaving as a residuum a chlorid of copper, which flows off into the tailings when the tubs are discharged. This process usually lasts from three to four hours. The silver thus collected is then placed in retorts and smelted. The best mills produce bullion ranging from 900 to 1000 fine.

A brief reference to the great mining enterprise of the "United Reese River Company" must close my remarks on the present condition of Austin and its neighborhood. This Company was organized for the purpose of securing leading interests in the best mines. The main principle upon which it is based is, to concentrate capital upon the development of all meritorious ledges, and furnish the mills with a steady and ample supply of ores. The Company have already leased a mill at Austin, and are now working it on their own account, besides furnishing work for custom mills. Where machinery is necessary for hoisting or pumping, or new shafts or drifts have to be run, they co-operate with other stock-holders in the labor and expense of development, giving the weight of their influence and capital to the prosecution of the work, with the aid of reliable experts, and drawing a pro-rata share of the proceeds. Mines that would otherwise be unproductive are at once placed in a paying condition. The Company starts with a capital of two millions of dollars, of which sufficient has been paid in to secure the practical control of some of the best mines in the Reese River district. By drawing their supplies of ores from so many different sources, under the general supervision of an experienced agent, any failure in a particular ledge is not apt to affect the average result. At this time active operations are in progress on several ledges of established reputation. Valuable interests are held in the Diana, North Star, Oregon, Apollo, Jo Lane, Blue Ledge, Black Ledge, Governor Seymour, Chicago Southern Light, Whitlatch Union, and many others well known as productive mines. The Whitlatch Union enjoyed for a time an extraordinary reputation. The width of its ledge and the richness of its ores gave it a speculative value beyond all reasonable estimate. Last year the vein suddenly broke off, and the stock-holders expended $40,000 in trying to find it again. All other stocks became depressed in consequence of this unexpected event. The utmost confidence, however, prevailed among experts that the ledge was somewhere near. It had not "petered out," but seemed to be cut square off by some convulsion of the earth. Recently a remarkable discovery was made. The dislocation, instead of causing the ledge to drop down, had thrown it up, and all the explorations had run below it—in some cases following it, in a parallel line, within three feet! It is now opening out as rich as ever, with unquestionable evidences of permanency. The Board of Managers, under the control of Mr. Harker as President, and Mr. N. C. Fasset as Secretary, have their office in San Francisco. Mr. Raymond is general agent at Austin. The business of the Company is conducted with fidelity and judgment, and there can be no reasonable doubt as to the success of this important enterprise. Large interests are held in New York. There is a sufficient surplus of earnings now in hand to commence the payment of dividends; but the experience of the Washoe mines has deterred the managers from undertaking to pay dividends until there is a sufficiency of ore ahead to insure the continuance of payments for at least twelve months ahead without abatement. Such enterprises as this, judiciously and economically managed, can not fail to promote the best interests of the district, and encourage investments in mines of demonstrated value throughout the State.

In summing up my impressions of this portion of the Reese River country, I must not omit to mention a few of the leading mines, which have already yielded large results, considering the limited amount of labor and capital expended in working them. The "Diana" is down 118 feet by perpendicular shaft, with an incline of 40 feet below. It now averages in antimonial ores and sulphurets $200 to the ton. A new engine of 30 horse-power has been erected upon it. The "Morgan and Munsey" runs parallel with the Diana at a distance of 150 feet, and is considered one of the best ledges in Lander Hill. This mine is down 250 feet by incline, has a 3 feet vein, and has yielded over two hundred thousand dollars. The Savage, Oregon, North Star, and Southern Light are all splendid ledges, yielding the richest class of ores. The General Hooker, St. Louis, Governor Seymour, and Washington Irving are in active operation with excellent results. The Hubbard, a rich ledge in Central Hill, near Upper Austin, has not only paid for the labor and capital expended upon it, but within a few months returned, in clear profit, the snug little sum of $19,000 to the owners. The Eagle Mill and its mining property is paying handsomely.

After nearly three months of hard experience, during which I scarcely passed a day without exploring one or more of the mines, I am thoroughly convinced this is the richest of our mineral regions. Whether all the mining enterprises now in progress will pay is another question. I think Eastern people are too easily imposed upon by specious representations, and have too great a tendency to expend large sums of money in the erection of mills and offices before they fully develop their ledges.

This evil will cure itself in time. Undoubtedly there will be heavy losses in individual cases; but I am fully satisfied there will be a large average of success where capital is judiciously invested, and mills and mines economically managed.

Senator Stewart, on his way back from the States last summer, took occasion, in the course of a speech at Austin, to dwell upon the great advantages that would be derived from the speedy construction of the Pacific Railroad. There was only one part of the honorable Senator's speech to which any of his auditors could take exception; and, as I happen to be specially interested in that, I will mention it. Mr. Stewart said the people of the East had no idea of Nevada except what they derived from certain caricatures in Harper's Magazine. Every body read Harper's, and, as a matter of course, every body thought the mines were a humbug; the miners a race of savages, armed to the teeth with pistols and bowie-knives; and the climate so boisterous that it was necessary to cling to awning-posts to keep from being blown away! Now, Mr. Stewart knows very well Virginia City is not Nevada; but it was a good point to make before an audience of his constituents. He intimated that if the writer would be serious for once in his life, and devote his pen to the true interests of the country, he could do as much through the pages of Harper toward the building of the Pacific Railroad as any man living. Mr. Stewart will admit that there is a reformation in the present article, which, it is hoped, will be found serious enough.

CHATTANOOGA.

A KINDLING impulse seized the host
Inspired by heaven's October air,
Their hearts outran their General's plan,
Though Grant commanded there—
Grant, who without reserve can dare;
And, "Well, go on, and do your will,"
He said, and measured the Mountain then:
So master-riders fling the rein—
But you must know your men.

On yestermorn, in grayish mist,
Armies, like ghosts, on hills had fought;
And, rolled from the cloud, their thunders loud
The Cumberlands far had caught;
To-day the sunlit steeps are sought.
Grant stood on cliffs whence all was plain,
And smoked as one who feels no cares;
But mastered nervousness intense Alone such calmness wears.

The summit-cannon plunge their flame
Sheer down the primal wall;
But up and up each linking troop
In stretching festoons crawl—
Nor fire a shot. Such men appall
The foe, though brave. He from the brink
Looks far along the breadth of slope,
And sees two miles of dark dots creep,
And knows they mean the cope.

He sees them creep. Yet, here and there,
Half hid 'mid leafless groves they go;
As men who ply through tracteries high
Of turreted marbles show,
So dwindle these to eyes below.
But fronting shot and flanking shell
Sliver and rive the inwoven ways;
High tops of oaks and high hearts fall.
But never the climbing stays.

They roll the rallying cheer—
Vie with each other, brother with brother,
Who shall the first appear—
What color-bearer, with colors clear
In sharp relief, like sky-drawn Grant—
Whose cigar must now be near the stump.
While, in solicitude, his back
Heaps slowly to a hump.

Near and more near; till now the flags
Run like a catching flame;
And one flares highest, to peril nighest—
He means to make a name.
Salvos! they give him his fame.
The staff is caught; and next the rush,
And then the leap where Death has led Flag answered flag along the crest,
And swarms of rebels fled.

“ARE THERE OTHER INHABITED WORLDS?”*

ARE there on any of these globes which seem to be moving around us beings formed like ourselves, or animals, or any plants? Do people on the Moon contemplate our Earth, a glorious orb in their firmament, and spy out our actions through telescopes as we attempt to spy out theirs? Before the evening is finished I hope to be able to answer these questions in a satisfactory manner.

Let us examine, in the first place, the conditions essential to the existence of the organized beings with which we are familiar, and then we will try to discover whether such conditions are found on any other celestial body. It will only be necessary to investigate a few of these conditions, because if we find any that are absolutely essential to life, whether animal or vegetable, missing on other globes, our purpose will be fulfilled. They can not be inhabited.

To sustain the life of an animal three things are necessary. It must have air, water, and food. Why is this the case? We all know how soon life is extinguished if the supply of air to the lungs be cut off; the person turns of a livid blue, becomes insensible, and soon dies. Or by breathing the noxious gas that arises from the burning of charcoal the same result occurs. One of the elements of the air, a fifth part of its bulk, is a gas—oxygen. It possesses the power of sustaining the operation of burning. In a stove, for example, if we desire the burning to be accelerated, we increase the draught and let in more air—that is, more oxygen; if we desire to reduce the rate of combustion, we diminish the access of air. If we shut off the supply of air altogether the fire goes out.

So it is in a human being. A burning is continually going on in him, and this it is that enables him to keep warm in spite of the cold of winter or of the night season. No animal can possibly exist without a supply of air to carry on combustion in its body. When we are about to die, and our interior production of heat is ceasing, we grow cold. That air is essential to the life of even the lowest animals is shown by the fact that, if water be taken in which animalculæ are swimming, and cold applied so as to cause it to freeze, a drop remains unfrozen around each of these little animated forms for a certain time after the rest has congealed. Heat is being produced by the animal—to liberate that heat it must be consuming air and burning its body.

Again, in an instance with which many of us are familiar, the respiration of a small animal is shown. If on a cold day you watch a fly that has lighted on a dry window, a collection of moisture, the results of his respiration, will soon be seen in his neighborhood. It is the analogue of the larger condensation of vapor that would be produced were one of us to breathe on the same window. The fly is burning away and vaporizing water with the superfluous heat.

To illustrate the necessity of air to the well-being of animals, a bird may be put under a glass bell jar standing on the air-pump. By the aid of the pump the air can be removed to a large extent from the bell jar, and as soon as the exhaustion is commenced, the bird shows signs of discomfort and becomes more and more restless as the action continues. He would eventually die if kept under the exhausted jar.

To plants air is just as necessary as to animals, although we can not easily demonstrate this by a lecture-table experiment. The larger part of their substance is derived from the atmosphere by the aid of the Sun's beams; but a small portion comes in through the roots. Nature has so arranged the relations of plants to animals that they take out from the air the impurities that have been imparted to it by animals and replace the ingredients that are necessary to the latter. If in any planet we could detect the traces of vegetable life, it would at once be a strong argument for the existence of animals there, and vice versa.

But you may think that I have omitted the case of aquatic animals and water plants altogether. They seem to have no access to air, and might be fairly supposed not to require it. You will sustain yourselves in that opinion by citing the case of a man submerged in water who drowns, and by that of a fish brought out into the air that dies. Nevertheless air is necessary to all fishes; for if you boil water and so expel the air from it, and then when cool put a fish into it, he can not live. He is in the same condition as the bird in the bell jar.

The other case, that of a fish dying in the air, is as readily explained. A fish is not provided with lungs as we are, but breathes the air dissolved in water by the aid of its gills. When taken out of water the gills dry up, and the little tufts of blood-vessels, of which they consist, adhere to one another so as to be unable to act any longer. Some fish, as the eel, have, however, the means of keeping their gills wet by causing the mouth to remain partly filled with water, and these can be retained on land for many hours and yet live.

Water in its turn is just as essential as air. By its aid food is carried into the body and distributed, and it also acts as a regulator of heat. If we tend to become too warm, as in the summer season, water escapes rapidly from the lungs and skin, and by its evaporation keeps us cool. That such evaporating processes cause a cooling may be proved by an experiment with which many of us are acquainted. It is often desired, when in the woods, to ascertain the direction from which the wind is blowing. We may need it as a guide. There may not be sufficient air stirring to drift away a light object like a straw. Under these circumstances foresters, having wetted the finger, hold it upward at arm's-length. A gentle breeze causes the moisture to evaporate more rapidly on the side it first strikes, and the direction is at once indicated by the coldness of that side. So also in the case of the porous earthen-ware vessels used in southern climates for keeping water cool. The fluid that soaks through the earthen-ware, evaporating from the outside, keeps the temperature of the water much below that of the surrounding air.

* A Lecture delivered before the Young Men's Christian Association of New York by HENRY DRAPER, M.D., Professor Adjunct of Chemistry in the University of New York.

Lastly, as regards food but little requires to be said. All know from hard experience how necessary it is. If we do not eat we soon become emaciated and die after a short interval. What is the cause of this wasting away, and why can we not resist it by the will? We have already learned that air is essential to our well-being, because we must have a burning continually going on in the body. But we must also have a fuel to burn, and this fuel is either the food or portions of the body that have been made out of it. If we do not eat and resupply the parts that are consumed our weight becomes daily less and less, as we see in wasting fevers, until, when a certain point is attained, we die of cold.

The food we require is produced by plants, the remark applying even to meat, which has been extracted from plants by oxen, sheep, etc. That it is combustible can be proved by experiment. A piece of meat or bread, if placed in the fire, burns away, leaving only a little ash; the mass of it having united with oxygen and disappeared in a gaseous form. The same would have happened had it been eaten, though the burning would have been slower and without flame.

It is the combustibility of stimulants, such as whisky and brandy, that renders them valuable in low fevers. Nowadays the treatment in such cases is to give the patient as much liquor as he can bear without becoming intoxicated; it burns away within him to produce the animal heat he requires, and so saves him to a certain extent from the emaciation that would be produced by the burning of his body. For the healthful performance of the functions of the system a temperature of nearly 100 degrees must be maintained by man; if he becomes much cooler than this he will die of cold. The sensation of cold piercing to the very marrow of the bones, so keenly felt by those ascending high mountains, is due to the attenuated state of the air in such localities; not enough can be taken in by the lungs at each breath to keep the body burning at a proper rate.

We are now ready to glance for a few moments at the construction of the solar system.

Around the Sun, a sphere 880,000 miles in diameter, there revolve a number of globes; some, the more important, called planets; some the moons or satellites of these planets; and the rest asteroids, or else, if very small, aerolites or meteors. The planets are, of course, the bodies most likely to prove interesting to us, and they may therefore be profitably enumerated. The nearest to the Sun is Mercury, 37 millions of miles distant; next comes Venus, 68 millions of miles distant; then the Earth, 95 millions of miles. Outside of us, or farther from the Sun, are Mars, 142 millions of miles from that luminary; Jupiter, 485 millions; Saturn, 900 millions; Uranus, 1800 millions; and Neptune, 3000 millions.

An idea of the comparative size of these bodies and their distances from the Sun may be gained from a table constructed by Sir John Herschel:

The Sun, a globe two feet in diameter.
Mercury, a mustard seed, diameter of orbit 164 feet.
Venus, a pea, diameter of orbit 284 feet.
The Earth, a larger pea, diameter of orbit 430 feet.
Mars, a large pin's head, diameter of orbit 654 feet.
Jupiter, an orange, diameter of orbit half a mile.
Saturn, a small orange, diameter of orbit one and one-fifth mile.
Uranus, a cherry, diameter of orbit a mile and a half.
Neptune, a plum, diameter of orbit two and a half miles.
The nearest Fixed Star, distance fifteen thousand miles.

If we can succeed in rendering it probable that on any of these bodies there is life, we shall be led at once to extend the sphere of animated nature infinitely. For we know that each of the countless multitudes of fixed stars, which delight our gaze on a clear evening, is a sun, shining, as our sun does, by virtue of its own light. At distances vastly greater than these are collections of stars, which, though they may in reality be separated as far from one another as the nearest fixed star is from us, yet seem to be closely packed together. These, the resolvable nebulae, are stellar systems of prodigious extent. Many are not bright enough to affect the naked eye; and who shall say what immense numbers there may be invisible even with the telescope?

We may argue from analogy that all these suns, many of them larger than ours, are surrounded by trains of planets, revolving around them at various distances. If on any of the planets of our solar system life can be maintained, why not on those planets too? And does it not seem reasonable to suppose that all those bodies have been created for some other purpose than merely occasionally to illuminate our skies? Is this little speck in the universe where we are existing, and which is visible to only two or three of its immediate neighbors, the only seat of life?

"Each of these stars is a religious house;
 I saw their altars smoke, their incense rise,
 And heard hosannas ring through every sphere.
 The great Proprietor's all-bounteous hand
 Leaves nothing waste, but sows these fiery fields
 With seeds of reason, which to virtues rise
 Beneath his genial ray."

But you may say, How do you know that those other worlds are not composed of such materials that life is there impossible? Science has within the last few years stretched her hand across the almost immeasurable distances which separate us from the fixed stars, and told us that there are in them many of the substances with which we are here familiar. It would lead us too far from our subject to indicate the manner in which so grand a result has been reached. I can only tell you that we are able, by examining the light coming from the stars by a prism, to detect their composition, just as if we had fragments of them in our laboratories. Spectrum analysis has made the chemist's arms millions of millions of miles long.

Let us examine our planetary neighbors, and ascertain what are the chances of inhabitation upon them. The two planets that are nearer to the Sun than the Earth may be dismissed at once. The most reliable researches lead astronomers to suppose that Mercury and Venus are too hot to permit of either animal or vegetable life. Venus is regarded as being red-hot, and Mercury even hotter. If such be the case, we must of course presume that they are uninhabited.

The first planet outside of the Earth—Mars—is 50 millions of miles more distant from the Sun than we are. When it is favorably situated its surface can be closely scanned through the telescope. It seems to me to be by far the most interesting object in the heavens from its similarity to the Earth.

In the summer of 1862, when my large telescope had been completed, Mars was often observed, and showed appearances some of which are represented in the adjoining cut drawn by Professor Phillips. There was visible, in the first place, an expanse of water covering a large proportion of the Southern hemisphere, and of a greenish hue. The remaining parts, at the upper portion of the picture, are land of a reddish tinge, assuming the figure of continents. In addition—and this is a point of peculiar interest—at the north and south polar regions there are accumulations of snow, presenting appearances strictly analagous to those at the arctic and antarctic regions of our globe. The snow spot at the South Pole is here shown; the North Pole is invisible.

THE PLANET MARS.

Let us recall the condition of our Northern Hemisphere. In winter snow falls and covers it with a white envelope, extending for six months, to a latitude certainly as low as the northern border of the United States. If the earth were viewed from a distance, there would seem to be a white spot surrounding the north pole. As summer came on this white spot would begin to disappear, melting away at its southern border, and to the distant observer would seem quite insignificant at midsummer. Precisely a similar phenomenon is witnessed at the poles of Mars, and hence we see that he too has seasons similar in their nature to ours, a warm summer and a cold snowy winter. As his year is almost equal to two of ours, each season is twice as long as with us.

There is still another point of resemblance. On watching the planet Mars carefully through a large telescope, we observe that his surface is not always the same in appearance, but that dark spots occasionally are visible, and cover large parts of it. They are variable in extent and outline. These are obviously clouds floating in his atmosphere, the source whence falls the winter's snow and, doubtless, though we do not see it, the summer's rain.

There is then another body, revolving as the Earth does around the Sun, as far as we can judge suited to the abode of sentient beings. It has air, water, alternations of seasons, snow, rain, and, possibly, vegetation. It is, to be sure, half as far again as we are from the Sun, the source of light and heat, but is not cold enough to be perpetually frozen and therefore sterile.

The question at once arises, do you discover upon its surface any traces of the works of man, are there tokens of great cities and visible lines of road? As our telescopes are at present, we are too far off to see any of these things, even if they are there. No power yet applied would enable us to distinguish at this distance an object 50 miles square. What we may do in the future it is, of course, impossible to predict. One of the greatest obstacles to distinct vision is our own atmosphere. Its currents and motions tend to confuse the outlines of objects, and, according to my experience, a whole year may pass without the occurrence of more than one good night. The only remedy is to carry the telescope as high up on a mountain as possible, so as to leave below the more injurious portions of the atmosphere. It might be possible to work 15,000 feet above the sea in the neighborhood of the equator.

In the list of planets given, four large ones were placed outside of Mars, that is, farther from the Sun. But with these we have not time to deal. The only remark necessary to be made is, that on two of them, Jupiter and Saturn, there is reason to believe both air and water exist.

But you will say why is the Moon overlooked all this time? She is close to the Earth, and must possess similar conditions as to light and heat; are not the probabilities strong that she is inhabited?

A few years ago there was published in the daily papers of this city a description of pretended discoveries in the Moon which excited at the time a great deal of attention. It was stated that Sir John Herschel had taken to the Cape of Good Hope a lens of 24 feet diameter, and with it had seen a variety of objects, animals, buildings, and even a species of men. The human beings were described as having wings like a bat, but nevertheless they evidently conversed and were familiar with polite actions, such as peeling fruit for one another. This, "the Moon Hoax" as it is termed, imposed on very many persons, and when its falsity was discovered, left behind an unfortunate skepticism as to statements that are really true.

Let us examine the actual state of the Moon, and see what the probabilities of habitation are. We will ascertain the more prominent peculiarities, and then I will show you some of them by the aid of a photograph enlarged by Starr's calcium light and lens.

On looking at the Moon with the naked eye certain markings are visible, dark and white spots. Before the invention of the telescope the dark spots were called seas, the bright ones land. But we now know that there is not any large collection of water on the side of the Moon that is turned toward us. Why is that expression, "the side turned toward us," used? We only see one hemisphere of the Moon; one side is perpetually turned away from us.

A telescope of even moderate power shows at once, particularly if the Moon be only six or eight "days old," that her surface is very rugged and much broken. The northern part is less rugged than the southern, and we see that the so-called seas are great valleys many hundred miles across. They may be the basins in which seas formerly were, but they now contain no water. Nor do we find on any part of the visible side tokens of either air or water. Recalling the fact that no animal or plant can live without these essential materials, we are convinced at once that there is no use in searching for inhabitants there.

But there are strong reasons for believing that water must exist somewhere on the Moon. That fluid enters as an ingredient into the composition of rocks, and it is a cause of volcanic eruptions. The face of the Moon is largely composed of abrupt rocky pedestals, and volcanic action has been in past ages frequent on it.

We are sure that the water is not floating about in the shape of dense clouds, for we should see them easily enough through our telescopes, and collections of ice and snow would now and then make their appearance. Of late, however, it has been demonstrated mathematically, that the side nearest to us is farther away from the Moon's centre of gravity than the more distant side. It is, so to speak, down hill from this face to that, the amount of declivity being about 30 miles. So there might be air and water 30 miles deep on the opposite side, and we should not see them here. There may be inhabitants there, but our chances of making their acquaintance are small enough. It was at one time proposed by some enthusiastic astronomers to communicate with the inhabitants of the Moon by erecting on one of the great plains of Asia stone structures representing a certain geometrical problem, "in a right-angled triangle the square of the hypotenuse is equal to the sum of the squares of the other two sides." It was hoped that if there were intelligent inhabitants on the Moon who had discovered the truths of geometry they would answer by marking out on one of their plains some other problem in response.

We see from our physiological investigation of the subject how futile such an attempt would have been. The inhabitants on the far side of the Moon, if there are any such, never see the Earth unless it may be low down in the horizon and dimly. If they existed on the centre of this side, they would see her as a glorious globe, fourteen times as large as the Moon seems to us, shining with a pure light, variegated with clouds, and revolving like a gigantic clock directly overhead. Now Europe, Asia, and Africa would be visible; in a few hours they would set, and North and South America, in their turn, come into view. They would have no need of watches. Our large cities would be visible through a telescope, a spot 500 feet square being distinctly perceptible. But it is of no use to speculate on the appearance of things that are not seen.

So far from perceiving any visible traces of human habitation on the Moon through our telescopes, she presents to the eye only a desolate sterile waste. There are no tokens of activity. Even her volcanoes are extinct. We are able to determine now with precision their unchanged condition by the aid of photographs taken from time to time. They show no change though an interval of years may have elapsed. It is true, nevertheless, that minute changes may be occurring, for the difficulties of obtaining first-class photographs are so great that slight eruptions might be overlooked.*

The taking of a photograph of the Moon may be compared to getting the likeness of a man who is rapidly walking. We can not fasten her with a clamp as they do one's head at a photographer's establishment, it is necessary to neutralize the motion by another precisely similar. This fortunately we can accomplish by fine clock-work so contrived as to make the telescope by which the photograph is taken point steadily at the same part. But there is another motion we can not neutralize, arising from the tremors of our air. Any one who has looked across the top of a hot stove at objects beyond will have perceived that their outlines are confused, and that they seem to tremble or vibrate rapidly. Precisely such movements are taking place in the air above us, and these cause the mountains on the moon to twinkle like a star. During two years, in which I took photographs of the Moon every night that she shone, only three good nights occurred, and even on these there was some vibrating motion. Professor Bond, of the Cambridge Observatory, said that he had never in his lifetime seen a perfectly faultless night. If, then, it were desired to convey to you by our former simile of a man walking the difficulties of Moon photography, it would be necessary to superadd that the man was afflicted with St. Vitus's dance.

Besides all these obstacles others must be specified. A telescope of very large size is necessary in order that photographs may be procured with rapidity, and such an instrument is difficult to obtain. It must be either bought or made by the observer. In the latter case the time consumed in perfecting the lenses or mirrors is very great. I spent six years on my instrument, but had then the satisfaction of knowing that it was thoroughly adapted to its purpose. It has a mirror $15\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter, and a tube $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet long, and is mounted at Hastings on Hudson, 20 miles north of this city. The reason that so large an instrument is demanded—for this is the largest reflector in use in America—is, that a great amount of light must be collected to get a photograph of such a size that it will bear magnifying, and yet can be taken quickly. The problem is just the same as in portrait photography—the larger the lens the more quickly can a picture of a given size be taken. It was ignorance of this fact that led Daguerre, who invented the daguerreotype process, to declare that human portraits could not be taken photographically. According to his ideas, and with his apparatus, it was necessary to sit more than two hours, and that requires more patience or stolidity than most of us have. My father, however, overturned this idea, and in 1839 succeeded in the University of this city in getting the first portrait from life. One of the earliest is still in existence in the possession of Sir John Herschel, who states that it is as good as when first made.

In the enlarged photographic view which you are going to see upon the screen there are many points to which your attention might be directed. Of these we shall select only a few, as a full explanation of all would demand too much time.*

You will perceive, in the first place, that the whole circular face of the Moon is not presented to you; only one semicircle is visible. The photograph is taken from the Moon in her third quarter, when she was 21 days old, because at that time it better exhibits the more striking peculiarities than when full. You will remark that the semicircle is diversified with light and shadow: some parts are dark and others light. The interpretation that is put on this variation is, that the Moon, like the Earth, is composed of rocks of many different tints; that the large spaces I now indicate, and which used to be called seas, are made up of a darker rock than the volcanic southern regions. At the tip of the rod, the volcano Copernicus has ejected a lava whiter than the plains—over which it has flowed. Observe how far the stream running north has gone; let me give you a scale of miles: this picture is 12 feet in diameter; it shows the Moon as she would appear to us if we were 166 miles from her, instead of 240,000, as we now are. Every foot length in the picture is about 180 miles. You will see that the lava stream running north has gone not less than 600 or 800 miles.

I have said that this lava is running across a plain. Why do we not call it by the old name, a sea—the Sea of Showers? If you will look closely and reason a little, the cause will be apparent enough. If this dark spot were a sheet of water it would present a uniform grayish or greenish tint. But we see it diversified with mottlings of light and shade, bright points and streaks of white lava. It must be land.

* A facsimile of Dr. Draper's photograph of the Moon was published in Harper's Weekly for March 19, 1864.

* Here was exhibited an enlarged view of a photograph of the Moon. The picture was about 12 feet in diameter; the light and shade, craters, mountains, etc., were shown beautifully defined.

In the next place we will examine the straight or rugged side of the picture. On casting the eye along this part it will at once be noticed that it is irregular and seems to be thickly dotted with depressions of a saucer shape. It is sometimes said that the Moon looks as if she had suffered from an attack of small-pox. What is the nature of these marks?

Let me observe that there are not on the Moon a large number of mountains, truly speaking—that is, ranges of projecting peaks. The best example of them is this range, the “Lunar Apennines;” they are perhaps 400 miles long at this part, and 15,000 feet high.

You may ask how we know that one spot is a mountain, another a crater. It is by observing the direction in which the shadows are cast. The Moon does not shine by her own light, but is seen by light falling on her from the Sun and reflected to us. The Earth is just as bright to her as she is to us. When the Moon is at half, as she is represented in this photograph, the light falls obliquely on the part we have called the rugged edge, just as at sunrise on the Earth. Every object that projects is bright on the side toward the light, and in shadow on the opposite side, while every excavation or pit is in just the reverse condition—bright on the side from the Sun, and dark on the side toward him. Bearing this in mind, let us investigate some of these spots in the Moon. The Sun is away toward the left hand; in the Apennines the bright side is toward the left, and the dark toward the right. They are therefore, according to our rule, projections. But in this crater the dark side is toward the left, and the bright toward the right. It must be a pit.

In this crater, named after Aristillus, you will observe a peculiarity common to many of the craters. It has in the centre a small bright dot, resulting from light falling on a conical mountain. This same central cone is seen in certain volcanic mountains on the Earth, as in Vesuvius for example. Any one who has ascended it will remember that the cone which now emits lava occasionally is surrounded at a distance by an old crater, just as if in the centre of a saucer a small pile of sand should be placed; the latter would represent the cone, while the rim of the saucer would be the wall of the crater. Here I point out another named after Eratosthenes; here another, etc.

The various craters in the Moon have been named after distinguished men; this one, for instance, is Copernicus, who revived the doctrine that the Sun is the centre of the Solar System; this after Kepler, the discoverer of three great astronomical laws; this after Tycho Brahe, the Dane; this after Plato, etc. The dark parts are named from imaginary qualities they were supposed to possess; this is the Sea of Showers, or Mare Imbrium; this the Oceanus Procellarum, or Ocean of Storms; this the Sea of Vapors.

Along the extreme edge of the Moon many points are seen apparently altogether disconnected from her. These are the tips of mountains, or the rims of craters, on which the sunlight is falling while it does not reach their bases. On the Earth the Sun in rising illuminates first the peaks of mountains, and then the light gradually creeps down their sides until they are all lightened up. So it is in the Moon. If the photograph had been taken a little while later than it was many of these bright points on the edge would have disappeared, because this is a photograph of the waning Moon; they were depicted just as the Sun was setting on them.

Why is it that the parts on the left hand of the picture are of so uniform a brightness, and do not show craters and peaks too? It is because the light is there falling perpendicularly on the surface and illuminating all parts uniformly. If a person were suspended in a balloon over the Earth, and the Sun were overhead, he would find difficulty in distinguishing a mountain from the valleys around if similarly composed. But in the morning, when the Sun's rays strike the surface obliquely and the mountains cast a shadow, there would be no difficulty. The part of the Moon on the extreme left is here seen at mid-day, so to speak, that at the rugged edge at evening.*

And now what is to be said on the subject of Plurality of Worlds is about finished. We have taken a glance at the celestial bodies, and shown that on one of them, a near neighbor, Mars, the conditions exist necessary to animated beings. From it we may extend the observation to some of the rest. I could not offer you positive proofs, but have indicated how strong the probabilities are of inhabitation. In all such investigations it is necessary to be very careful in drawing conclusions from what we may see. The senses alone often deceive us, and results derived from them must be corroborated by our reason. Many instances could be adduced in proof of this assertion, and none more striking than those in connection with the body whose description has occupied so much of this evening.

It is generally supposed that the rays proceeding from the Moon are so cold as to produce refrigeration in bodies exposed to them. This property has been a favorite subject of comparison with poets, as a thousand quotations concerning her cold, pale light would prove. In the old mythology the lack of warmth of Diana was typified by this body. But what are the facts in the case? The Moon reflects to us a certain proportion of heat from the Sun, and by thermometers sufficiently delicate the amount may be measured. An ordinary mercurial thermometer fails entirely to show any rise, though the moonbeams be concentrated by ever so large a lens. But if two wires, one of bismuth and the other of antimony, be soldered together at the ends, an exceedingly slight warming at the junction will cause an electrical current to be developed. By appropriate contrivances we are able to measure the strength of the current, and as it bears a relation to the amount of heat employed, thus measure that heat. A number of pairs of such metals soldered together is called a thermo-electric pile. By the thermo-electric pile $\frac{1}{4000}$ of a degree may be indicated. The moonbeams warm us to about this extent. To be sure the amount is not great, but it is sufficient to overturn the idea of her cooling agency.

In another instance a deception of the eye is shown. When the moon is rising it is generally conceded that she is much larger than when near the zenith. She seems as large as a cart-wheel, while overhead the diameter is not greater than a plate. Any one who doubts this doubts the evidence of the senses. And yet measured with the telescope the size is seen to be the same on each occasion. Does not such a fact shake our confidence in the eye?

A still more common deception which astronomers have to combat is that connected with the apparent size of the Moon. When it was stated a moment ago that overhead she seems as large as a plate, no dissent was expressed, because almost every one feels convinced that such is the fact from repeated observation. But yet by two simple experiments our faith in that can be altogether broken. Many times the inquiry is made in my observatory, "How large do you take your photographs of the Moon in the telescope?" On returning the answer that they are magnified 15 times by the instrument, and then showing a specimen about an inch and a half in diameter, persons either say, "This is smaller than the Moon," or else express their disbelief in a yet more marked manner by a silent dissent. The size of the Moon as seen by the naked eye is about that of a pepper-corn. Now that I know this to be the case she has lost her former magnitude to my eyes. In order to convince persons it is only needful to cause them to hold up such a photograph (about as large as a half dollar) at the distance of distinct vision, 10 inches, and then look at the Moon through it. At once her size dwindles away; we have established a standard of comparison, and see how great the deception was.

In another way any one who has a spy-glass mounted on a stand can convince himself of the same thing. If the instrument magnify only 6 or 8 times, on looking through it at the Moon, she seems to be smaller than to the naked eye, possibly not larger than a penny. But if while one eye is still kept at the eye-piece of the telescope the other be opened, two moons are seen, a small one not as large as a pea, and another 6 or 8 times as great. By shutting first one eye and then the other, it can be shown that the small one is that seen by the naked eye. After repeating such an experiment several times the effect is permanent, the Moon looks always small, but if only once performed on going away from the telescope we again delude ourselves.

In producing this photograph on the table, 21 inches in diameter, a magnifying power of about 200 has been used, and yet it seems no larger than half the rising Moon. But why is it then, if the size is the same in both cases, that we do not see with the naked eye the craters and cones and other parts as we see them here. No one is apt to amuse himself with imagining the face of a man in the Moon depicted on this paper; his attention is too much occupied with a multiplicity of details far more interesting. Not much reasoning is required to satisfy the mind that the greater distinctness of parts must arise from the fact that the photograph is a magnified representation.

The Moon varies in her distance from the Earth considerably at different times. She should seem, therefore, on some occasions, much greater in size to us than on others. And yet who remarks the change in apparent diameter. A series of photographs taken on various occasions vary in size very materially, and bring this fact before us in a forcible manner. Yet the eye commits in this case a sin of omission.

In yet another instance the unreliability of the senses is shown when not corrected by reason. We see the Moon and Stars before they have risen and after they have set. We never see them in their true positions, except in the rare case when they are directly overhead. The refractive action of the air lifts them out of their places, and astronomers in measuring the position of celestial bodies have to make a correction for this disturbance. It is generally supposed that we see in a straight line, but in looking at these bodies the light has reached the eye through a curved path.

In reasoning then on such a subject as that which has occupied us this evening, we are admonished not to let our senses and imagination carry us away. Do not speculate on the nature of beings on other spheres as some have done, and attribute to them a variety of qualities corresponding to their supposed surroundings. Do not, with Fontenelle, give to the inhabitants of the hot planets, Mercury and Venus, characteristics in an exaggerated degree like those possessed by the inhabitants of our warm climates, doubting not that Venus is the seat of an empire where ardent affection rules, while in Mercury the vivacity of the inhabitants is so great that it is the Insane Asylum of the Universe; from the coldness of Jupiter and Saturn imagining that they are peopled with phlegmatic and slow-moving inhabitants. Do not propose for comets the function of penal settlements for the planets, their wretched inhabitants being whirled, for sins committed, through fierce extremes of heat, now approximating the sun and made two thousand times as hot as molten iron, now traversing space 100° below zero.

A calm consideration of the facts collected on this subject, after due weight has been given to the able arguments advanced on either side, would seem to lead to the following conclusions: First, we have reason to know that the various bodies of the solar system have a composition resembling one another; on the Sun, the most unlikely of all, many of the elements of the Earth are found, iron, sodium, etc. This remark may be extended to the fixed Stars.

Second, we feel satisfied that the same laws which rule the solar system rule the Universe; in the case of the law of gravity a demonstration can be easily offered, the binary Stars revolving around their common centre of gravity according to it.

Third, we may be sure that Nature, operating upon like substances by similar laws, will ever produce the same results. There is a unity of scheme pervading the universe, there are immortal types or exemplars, the Divine Ideas, according to which things are framed with an infinite variety of modifications, depending on the surrounding physical conditions.

I can not believe that on our little globe alone, among the infinity of worlds, life has been possible, because only on it surrounding circumstances have been favorable. It seems more in accordance with reason to believe that there may be on many other globes intelligent beings, formed on the same plan as we are, but differing, on some perhaps for the better, on others for the worse. On our own globe we see what an influence such conditions as heat, moisture, etc., have on the inhabitants of the various zones. At the poles, where man struggles with difficulty to procure a precarious livelihood, intellect is at a low ebb, and exhausts itself in efforts to obtain food; at the equator, amidst the bounteous provision on every hand, mind and body are oppressed by a languor that seems only broken by the passions. In the temperate zone, our own happy latitude, the seasons conduce to activity; but thoughts of subsistence need not occupy all the time, enough can be spared to originate the most sublime ideas in science and the arts. It must be thus in the universe; though the general plan is the same throughout, there may be worlds that have never passed the state in which the earth was in early geological times, while on others conspiring circumstances may have allowed life to develop even beyond our standard, and to reach a point that we may hope in the future to attain.

THE SPECTRE.

THERE is a wrinkled old man
With thin and silvery hair,
A lean and withered old man,
And his name, I know, is Care.
He sits by my bed through the night,
He walks at my side in the street,
In the broad and open light,
Unseen of the people I meet.

His cheeks are hollow with age;
His eyes are sunken and dim,
The high and the lowly of earth
Alike are acquainted with him.
Only the child has not known,
Since its infant life began—
Like a blossom newly blown—
The face of this wrinkled old man.

When Youth's bright summer is past,
And the dreams that we dreamed are fled;
When doubts, like a cloud, arise
And the hopes we cherished are dead;
When the castles that we reared
Have vanished at last in air,
Where their portals once appeared
Sits this withered old man called Care.

He stands by the mother who kneels
At the bedside of her child,
As she cools the fevered brow
And the lips that so sweetly smiled;
And across her sad, pale face,
Uplifted a moment in prayer,
A likeness to him you may trace
Imprinted indelibly there.

Unseen he raises the latch,
And creeps past the crazy door,
Up the narrow flight of stairs
To the garret of the poor—
And there by the dreary hearth
He sits at the close of day,
Where is heard no sound of mirth,
And where shines no cheering ray.

He enters the mansions of wealth,
The palaces stately and grand,
And all uninvited he takes
His place at the master's right hand—
He heeds not the time as it flits,
He counts not the moments that pass,
But silent and thoughtful he sits,
And drinks from the master's own glass.

Though aged he never has known
Youth's promise or manhood's prime,
But this lean and withered old man
Will live to the end of time.
He will enter, and speak not a word,
The lofty and wide palace door,
And climb the weak staircase unheard
To the dreary abode of the poor.

There is but one house that I know
Where this wrinkled old man can not come,
In the quiet and gloom of the grave
He shall find neither rest nor a home.
In that narrow house under ground
All unheeded the years shall go by,
As folded in slumber profound,
Undisturbed by his presence we lie.

"EASTER LILIES."

THE triumphal Easter anthem filled the church, and seemed to drift through arch and architrave up to the very throne of God. The very building, with its cold, gray-stone walls, thrilled and pulsed with tuneful sound, and upon that joy-tide many a desolate soul floated upward nearer to heaven than ever before. Mrs. Thorne leaned back wearily in her pew, as if the strain uttered nothing that could reach her heart: "Christ the Lord has risen to-day!" She speculated vaguely about it, as she did about most things: it did not touch her—it was a dim and distant thing, like a story in Grecian History. And there was a fierce struggle in her innermost heart, a strange purpose with which she was wrestling, a horrible, haunting idea that rose again and again, like a vexed ghost, and would not be laid, which shut her eyes to the heavenly vision and her ears to celestial harmonies. The Easter flowers filled the font, and made a summer atmosphere of bloom and fragrance. Lilies, waxen white, yet with a sun-tinge in them; large golden-dusted cymes of laburnums, with feathery moss dewy and glistening; fragrant pale-blue mignonnette that sent a breath of balm through the aisles like incense; and some rose-colored blooms warming the whole. Mrs. Thorne had an appreciation for the lovely coloring of these, for she had an artist's eye. She had earned her bread by painting once, and had been "good at her art for a woman," they said. For five years she had not touched pencil or brush, for it was just five years to-day since she had married John Thorne, M.D.

At last the service was over, the last words died away on the air—a hushed stillness, and then a subdued rustling showed that the people were going. Mrs. Thorne sat still as one in a dream. She had come in expecting something, some hope or comfort perhaps, which she had not received. Was there no blessing there for her? Other people brought their burdens there and found them roll away as Christian's did at the foot of the cross. Why did such an idle fiction haunt her? Christ, if there was a Christ, sat afar off, beyond the sunsets, and the cries and groans of the desolate never pierced that vast expanse of ether. She got up drearily then, for the young minister stood waiting in the chancel, and went forward. She would take something with her, if only a flower—something sweet and fresh and natural, that might whisper. Hush! that thought again.

How kind and mild he looked! Perhaps he could minister to a mind diseased. Perhaps there was some good in the old Romish confessional after all. But this was a Protestant church. Margaret Thorne smiled grimly as she imagined how those mild blue eyes would dilate with surprise if she threw herself passionately at his feet and poured out all her thoughts, her wild regrets, her half-formed purposes, her skeptical doubts. Instead of this the minister only saw a stately-looking lady with rather eager, dark hazel eyes, who lingered at the font and asked for a flower. And he smiled politely as he offered her a cluster of dazzling lilies, glittering like sunlight on snow.

Mrs. Thorne did not go home. She turned instead out of the close, compact little town, and walked with tireless feet on and on, till the pavements came to an end, and straggling lanes, beginning to have a tender greenness hovering over them, lay before her. The distant hills shone yellowish gray or dimmed away into silver. The trees, with their delicate tracery of boughs against the blue sky, held each their store of different-colored buds half unfolded; the rock maples, with their salmon-colored leaves; white and red oaks and the birches spreading out a pale-green mist before a grove of sombre pines.

Clusters of white dog-wood starred the woods, and pink columbines festooned the trees. Careless of the wet, Mrs. Thorne penetrated through the damp, sedgy ground to a stream that ran in the distance, treading on fairy-like mosses with slender, scarlet-tipped stems, some holding tiny brown cups like acorns, or gay dots of crimson flowers. All was clothed in the beautiful verdure of spring. Then the birds! a whole summer of joy and sunshine lay before them, and they kept high carnival. Margaret Thorne sat down on a bit of gray rock and watched a goldfinch rocking itself in the thin, sunny branches of a white birch that pulsed in the wind. She half rocked herself also, and murmured some lines that had echoed through her heart the whole morning:

"Wild, wild wind, wilt thou never cease thy sighing?

Dark, dark night, wilt thou never pass away?

Cold, cold heart, in thy death sleep lying,

Thy Lent is past, thy Passion, but not thine Easter Day."

And so she sat through all the long April afternoon, shivering and drawing now and then the soft Cashmere shawl about her; but letting the folds of her violet silk trail carelessly on the gray mosses and dead leaves. Reader! you have heard long ago of the fierce battle fought between Christian and Apollyon, in that strange, quaint old legend of Bunyan. Ah! we all know there are unseen contests which no papers chronicle, and where no bulletins are sent from the seat of war; but the pen of the Recording Angel writes the record and a tear drops when the banners are trailed in the dust. Well, Margaret Thorne fought her battle with Apollyon that afternoon, and lost!

When the slant sunbeams lay on the ground penetrating the long shadows of the trees she rose to go. She was weary with the contest; but calm—calm as if her heart, like her hopes, had died within her—"and she pitied her own heart, as if she held it in her hand."

The lights were beginning to stir the town as she reached it, like friendly eyes to greet her; but she hurried blindly on with shuddering chills to the prim red brick house that was her home. "Dr. Thorne" decorated the brass plate on the door, and the light of a street-lamp emblazoned it finely for the suffering public this night. In the little office at the side, from whose window ruddy beams streamed out, the Doctor was still at work with a bullet-headed boy putting up prescriptions or concocting some patent medicine. Faugh! Margaret thought she could smell the fumes already. How she hated it all! Was this life? Was this all? Was this dull round of days of petty cares—this dreary sameness—the prim order—the strict drill rules—all she was made for? Had she not crossed the threshold with other dreams five years ago?

She looked at Dr. Thorne again with a flickering gleam of the old feeling, half gratitude, half love, which had made the prim house seem pleasant in those old days to the poor girl who had been left without friends or home. But she fiercely turned upon herself for the lingering tenderness. It would not do now—now when her purpose was formed, the fiat passed. She had believed that foolish feeling had burned itself out long ago to dead gray ashes; could it be there was life in it yet? He came to the window and looked out. A small man, with sandy hair and rather a delicate face—a very quiet and serious face you would call it—somewhat lacking as to coloring or mobility of expression—set—cold, it may be. Large light-gray eyes without much speculation in them, and a good firm mouth. A man of rules—you could almost see that at a glance—and already taking out his watch and looking impatiently at the hour. “So he would do if I were dead!” said Margaret, fiercely, as she opened the door softly and ran up stairs, remembering for the first time that she had been away from her child all day.

Poor little Dot!—she had some other ancient and Puritanical name after John’s mother—so Margaret always called her Dot, and rejoiced that she stretched out her little fat hands at the name, and never noticed Aunt Hetty’s sounding reiteration of her proper one. Poor little thing! with her peach-tinted cheeks and flossy, golden rings of hair. Had Margaret thought of her—weighed things truly for her in the matter? She only bent down over the crib and kissed the pinky cheek, saying over and over again, in an unreasoning, passionate way, “She is mine—she is mine!” And she put the lilies down by her own pure little lily. Then she began hurriedly to dress for dinner. She shivered still, though a fever was in her veins and burned on cheek and lip. She wondered bitterly what sent the strange, glittering light to her eyes when all within was so dark. Then she went down into the dining-room, where John stood ready, knife in hand, to carve the roast, and Aunt Hetty gave a deprecating hem! as she entered, while the bullet-headed boy regarded the meat with watery eyes, and sniffed continually.

“Sakes alive, Margaret!” commenced Aunt Hetty, “where on airth have you bin? The child took on awful, an at last cried herself to sleep.”

“She had her nurse, I suppose,” said Margaret, coldly.

“But, my dear, you look rather flushed,” said Dr. Thorne. He never interfered with his wife’s movements as long as she transgressed no rules. “I think a little powder—”

“Nothing, thank you—I shall do very well,” answered Mrs. Thorne, beginning to eat to overcome the faintness which she began to feel in every limb.

It was a relief when they began to talk of a Sanitary Fair which was to be held in Philadelphia in June. “Would you like to go, Margaret? I’m pretty busy; but I’d take the time to give you pleasure.”

“It would give me no pleasure,” she replied, indifferently.

The light-gray eyes grew colder than before. “If I knew what you would like,” he said, drearily. “I hear it will be worth seeing—fine pictures. You must own to liking pictures, Margaret?”

“I believe I did care for them once!”

“And wonders of machinery, and antique affairs, and curiosities of the vegetable world, and an arctic zone, where a ship stands fast locked in icy fetters on a frozen sea, and a torrid zone, where the strange growth of the tropics may be seen,” continued Dr. Thorne.

“Bless me!” interrupted Aunt Hetty; “do tell! Who’s goin to contribbit them air zones, and how do they keep the ice froze continniwal? Sakes alive! but I’d like to get the receipt for our ice-cream.”

But Dr. Thorne talked no more, and even the garrulous old lady seemed to feel that there was an unusual call to silence. The meals were always silent in that house. Margaret had never questioned herself how far it lay within her to make them otherwise. The dining-room was dingy, she thought; hard and stiff as its owner. The chairs were covered with brown leather studded with brass nails—slippery, shiny chairs, that never held one cordially, but seemed ready to give you the slip. A brown mixed carpet and curtains, and a pervading drug odor, made the place hateful to Margaret. If she could have had “carte blanche in those first pleasant days she would have made a bright, cheerful place of it,” she said; but she could not have carte blanche. John could not afford it, he had told her, but she had only half believed him; and that was the first cloud. She found afterward that he loved old things and dreaded innovation. The house had been his father’s, and his mother had died there. He would have nothing changed. He was a quiet conservative in every thing. Margaret was a red-hot radical. She asked too much, perhaps, and he yielded too little.

So, long before the honey-moon was over the honey was all gone, and nothing left but the jars. So it came to pass that these two people, bound together by eternal ties, sitting at one table, breaking the daily bread of life together—one by the usages of the world and the sanctities of religion—with the daily courtesies, and perhaps endearments, of life on their lips, were as utterly apart as if a broad continent, with its reaches of land, and wooded slopes, and belts of forest, lay between them. So it came that this woman—Margaret Thorne—with her passionate, enthusiastic nature, struggling with her undisciplined heart so long, had fought her last battle in the fresh green woods that afternoon, asking no aid from God or man, looking only on nature and not to nature's God—had so fought, and lost! For she meant to leave home and husband this night.

Yes, she would go. She could live her life better alone—freer, more untrammelled—a true and beautiful life. For she would give herself to art. She had earned her bread in that way once, and could do more now, with dear little Dot to nerve her to steady effort. After all, it was a glorious future—lonely, perhaps; so much the better, art reigned best alone: no divided throne for divine art. She would go to Germany—to Munich it might be—and study hard. She and Dot could live on so little there; and it would be sweet to leave all old scenes behind—better far that the broad ocean should roll between her and her old home and John. Safer too; for surely in any spot or nook of the United States John would find her out. "He would want Dot at least," she said, bitterly.

So she hurried about while Dot still slept, putting up her most precious things. She could not take much, you see—no traveling trunks loaded with treasures—only jewels that might be sold, and what clothes she could take in her hand, and some money. Her head ached madly; a whirling and noisy din seemed to fill the silent room. Oh, but for one quiet, painless moment for her to think of what she should need! Not John's picture certainly, though it seemed to come under her hands every where, as if bewitched. Ah well! perhaps for Dot. She might like to see one day what her father was like. He was loving enough to her, poor little Dot! There are tears in Margaret's eyes, but she dashes them away and says they are for little Dot.

What was it that favored her—Fate or Providence—she wondered vaguely, as she pressed her hands to her burning, throbbing head, that John should be called out into the country? He came up hastily, and she brushed her things into a drawer and sat down by the fire, which made the plain room cheerful on this April night. There was a home glow about it after all—a friendly cheer that made the dark chill streets seem uninviting. He brushed his hair hastily, saying:

"Do not sit up for me, Margaret. I have a long ride before me."

"I shall not sit up," she said, with a tremor in her voice at the hidden meaning of her words.

Would he ever see him again? Why should he bend over the child's crib and kiss her? He loved her, of course; but it had been in a quiet, passionless way, she thought. What if there were depths in his nature that she had never fathomed! What if she were wounding him cruelly, fatally, in taking the child away! Thought after thought seemed turning, whirling in her weary brain, like the wheels of a ponderous machine; but some wheel was wanting, perhaps, and so the rest clashed on in a blind and aimless way, and worked out nothing.

Then Aunt Hetty came in. She was John's aunt—a bustling, gossiping, meddling old lady, truly kind at heart; but Margaret had always rebelled against her. She took all the cares and household tasks and burdens off Mrs. Thorne's dainty shoulders; but then those very cares might have been healthful for one who knew not how to use the energies of life. And so Margaret grudged her the bustling cheerfulness with which she set about the preserving, and had tussles with the baker, and jokes with the butcher, and saved John a peck of coal a day by having the cinders sifted, and made her life as varied and pleasant to herself as though every phase was as important as the things we dramatize. She grumbled at Margaret sometimes; indeed, Mrs. Thorne was wont to say that her temper, like her pickles, was a "pleasant sour." But then Margaret did not make John happy; more than this, she did not try to make John happy; and Aunt Hetty recognized no greater sin.

"I've brought ye a cup o' pennyryal tea, Margaret, for you looked kind o' peakit at dinner; an no wonder—you seem clean beat out a-walkin. In my young days married ladies—nor young ones neither—didn't go scouring round the country like mad, a-spiling good silks that their husbands arned."

Sharp Aunt Hetty! she had seen the country soil on the violet silk.

Margaret thought her own thoughts, and hardly heard a word.

"I tell you, Margaret," said Aunt Hetty, in a solemn way, "you hain't got a mother, an I must stan in her place. I tell you you ain't a doin yer dooty by John. You an he seem to be gittin farther apart every day. Now if you call yourself a Christian woman—"

"But I do not," interrupted Margaret, fiercely.

"Sakes alive!" said Aunt Hetty, putting up her fat hands in horror, "if yer a heathen tain't no use a-sayin nothin—if ye hain't the fear of God before your eyes, I can't expect ye'll care much about yer vows to man; but ye did, ye know ye did, stan up in God's house an promise to love, honor, and obey an the rest of it. How ye've kep the promise ye know in yer heart."

"If John does not complain it is nothing to you," said Margaret, with oh such an aching heart and head, such a mad longing to stop her ears, to be rid in some way of this dreadful woman who was arraigning her at the bar of justice, and bringing fearful charges to which she must plead "guilty!"

"Is he the kind of man to complain?" said Aunt Hetty, drearily; "but don't I see him growin silenter every day. An a thinkin, thinkin, I know, of what he hoped his home would be, when he brought such a bright, handsome gal as you was to it. An how it's a growin darker every day. He complain! I think I see him complainin of you. He's like them Spartan boys in the history, he wouldn't flinch though the great grief was a tearin at his vitals."

"My head aches," said Margaret, wearily, wondering if John had really suffered any thing, so quiet, so self-contained as he had always been. Why, she would have loved him almost if he had appeared to be wounded, if she could have stung him to passion or indignation, or in any way moved him from the quiet, settled tenor of his ways.

"Well, good-night! I'm a-goin up to my room now. You're up here, an it's kind o' lonesome down stairs. I hope ye'll take it kindly what I said. It's for the happiness of ye both, I'm sure."

Ah! a clear field now—Fate or Providence, which? Margaret roused herself from a trance of pain and gathered her bundles again. She could take more now, for there was nothing in the way of her hiring a boy in the street to carry her baggage. She looked at her watch anxiously. There was yet time to take the down boat and be in New York in the morning.

She took Dot out of the little crib, and the child opened sleepy eyes like dew-wet violets, and laughed at the gay scarlet cloak that was wrapped around her. "She does not know that she is losing home and father to-night," said Margaret, sadly, as another tear rolled down her cheek. All for Dot, of course.

Well, all was ready. There was no need to wait; no need for Margaret to lay her head on the pillow where she should never rest again, and shed hot tears, almost of regret; no need that she should put more wood on the fire, so that, looking back from the dark street when far on her way, she might see the ruddy glow like a kindly farewell from the old home; no need, certainly, that she should put John's slippers to the fire, and his dressing-gown on the arm-chair for him to use when he came back from that long, chill ride. Poor fellow! he would meet a deadlier chill by that household fire than night or storm could bring him. As if he could take his comfort when he knew all. Poor John!

How weak she was growing! She must hurry away before this soft, pitying mood spoiled all. She had chosen. But men pitied the foe some times, even when they struck the death-blow, and she might pity John. He was not her foe, he had meant to be kind perhaps, but she was going to strike him a deadly blow for all that. She pictured his first entrance, his first surprise, his horror, his fright, his eager, fruitless search. Poor, poor John!

Well—she was in the street now, and the wind blowing fresh from the river. Somehow things seemed drifting away strangely like the scenes in a panorama; now it was a lighted shop-window that lifted itself up and floated away like a bubble; then the boy before her, loaded with her bundles, seemed to be cresting the huge, dark wave of some unseen ocean, and to rise and fall with its tideless current. Were they all sinking together, and was this the wages of sin? But she held Dot fast through all.

Ha! there was the boat: it blinked up the street with a dozen shining eyes of light, and a white moon made a long silver path behind it on the dark water. The clang of a bell shrilled through the night-air and seemed to strike her head like a blow. People were hurrying on, and she drifted with them. A happy young couple passed her with pleasant chat between them about getting their state-room. She remembered that she had never traveled alone before. Did she envy the young woman who sank luxuriously upon a sofa while her husband bustled about and tended to every thing! Did this first entrance on the world of strife appall her? Oh no! Better, she said, the fiercest wrestling with outer life if one has peace within. But where was the inner peace? Ah! that would come in time when she had gathered together and rewoven again the threads of her old life.

The young woman near her leaned over and looked at Dot. "A little angel," she said, smiling; "how happy you must be!"

Margaret wondered bitterly if this enviable creature envied her. Perhaps every one was wretched, and all appearance of happiness was but a mask—perhaps all joy was but the outer shell, that in every heart was a "seething, restless hell." Did not "the whole creation groan and travail together in pain until now?"

The young woman was a Yankee, and walked in wisdom's ways by the help of questions. "Is your husband below?" she asked.

Margaret winced, and said "No."

"Are you alone with that little thing?"

Margaret nodded.

"Well, I'll make Will get you a state-room," she said, good-naturedly; "he's the dearest fellow—but I'd give my eyes for a baby like that." And Margaret thanked the friendly young woman, but shrank from her nevertheless—the contest was too new, the wound too terrible to be touched by the kindest hand.

When Dot was asleep again she went on deck for a little while. It was a cloudless night—only fair and pearly fragments of cloud hung low at the horizon—above, all was gold-starred azure. The water lay sparkling, phosphorescent—plowed by the boat, it fell back in showers of diamonds, or a delicate silvery spray. On the banks were wooded hills crested by fair homes. It looked like dream-land in that pallid light—too unreal a world for men to suffer and toil in. How fast they went! Margaret was glad to hear the wheels' swift turnings and the labored panting of the great machine like a monster struggling for breath. How many miles already between her and the old life! yet she could not realize it. It haunted her yet, and weighed her down, like the Old Man of the Sea in the fairy tale. So many miles from John! Yet somehow she seemed nearer to him than when she sat by his side at table that day. Strange that she could never forget him—that she must be wearied with an endless iteration of the same scene. Strange that she could not leave him behind utterly, with the repudiated old life. No—not strange, since she must take with her always her own heart. Well, it was weary work, after all, watching the ceaseless shine and sparkle of the waves; so she went in, and lay down by the side of innocent little Dot, and slept a dreamless sleep.

A morning of mist and fog—fog reeking in the sunshine, lingering in shreds on forests of masts, hanging tender lace-like veils before the great warehouses and over the squalor of the low tenements filled with dirty, quarreling children—fog brooding on the river, yet wearing opaline hues in the sunshine. A fog so dense that the great steamboat, where Margaret was hustled about in the crowd, seemed the only real and tangible thing in the universe. The whole world behind her seemed blotted out—the world before her was as the baseless fabric of a vision—a cloud-land of vague shapes and dream fancies. But the street was solid enough after all. Only, strange to say, it came forward to meet her after a fashion most unusual to streets. Had every thing lost its balance—had the world itself swung from its orbit, because she had been recreant to the laws of God and man?

She did not call a carriage. Clogs seemed bound upon her feet, pain racked her, and the hot, swift blood rushed with resistless tide toward her brain; but still she remembered through all that she had no funds to spare. She had known New York all her life, and needed no guide. She would make her way now to one of her old art-friends and rest for a few days, she thought, before beginning the pleasant new life beyond the sea.

Dot stretched out her hands and smiled at every thing as if she wished to embrace this beautiful new world which opened before her—made up to her baby vision chiefly of plate-glass windows and rainbow hues. She did not miss her father's face that morning. Were they sitting down to breakfast yet at home, Margaret wondered vaguely, looking in at a watch-maker's. Ah, yes! John would be punctual, of course—breakfast at eight, life or death.

How the pain stabbed her head! Was she going to be ill? Well, if so, she would have no one to worry her with attentions or drive her into a fever with fussing; but then Dot, poor little Dot! Oh no! she must not, she would not be ill; and at the thought came a great whirl in the life machinery—a sudden crash, and the wondrous machine stood still. The pain dropped away like a garment—beating heart and burning brow; they grew very silent now, and a great, cool darkness wrapped her in a beneficent mantle.

When life came back again, and the wheels moved once more in a jarring, spasmodic way, she gathered all her strength and rose to her feet. Looking at her empty arms she gave a terrible cry. Searching eagerly around she saw that she stood in a doctor's office, and the doctor himself was near her. A stiff, peremptory little man, with gold spectacles on, red hair, and an oracular voice that commanded her to sit down at once.

"My child!" she panted out.

"Well enough, well enough my good lady; if you were half as well off you might thank your stars. My wife has got her asleep in the next room."

"I must have her, I must have her!" cried Margaret, in a wild way. "I have lost every thing but her!"

The doctor looked as if he thought she had certainly lost her reason for one thing.

"Certainly! you shall have her. Do you know how ill you have been?"

"I suppose so; but I am well now, and must be going."

"You are not well; I am confident of that. Let me examine and see if I can not prescribe for you. Does your heart always beat in this way?"

"It will beat in this way till you give me my child," said Margaret, fiercely, rising and drawing away from the stethoscope. "I am well—look at me," she continued, glancing proudly in the glass at her glittering eyes and glowing cheeks; "do your patients wear such color as that, or look on the world through such clear eyes? I am well, I must be well for the work I have to do; bring me the child!"

The doctor sighed a little as he left the room, and he was not wont to sigh. But Margaret laughed. She examined herself in the glass as she had never done before, even on her wedding night. Ill! with that bloom on her cheek, with those firm yet rounded outlines. She turned away in the satisfied pride of strength and beauty—turned to go impatiently toward the open door through which the doctor had disappeared; turned to hear from the other room these words uttered in an explosive whisper:

"I tell you, wife, she can not live a year. I listened to her heart, and it is beating now the knell of doom."

"And can it not be cured?"

"Any excitement would take her in a moment!"

"Ah, ah!" a prolonged exclamation of pity and then silence. Silence every where; did the clock forget to tick? did her heart forget to beat? was the supreme moment already come? To die! why this altered the face of all the world; why this swept the solid earth away; why this tore out all the leaves of life; and where was the fair new page? Where were all her plans, and hopes, and dreams? Could her life-boat go down in a silent sea like this?

She covered her face with her hands, and felt once more her heart like a muffled drum beating its funeral march. And she had railed at life and at the work-day world as if God should have spread for her upon the table of life a continual feast. She had groaned, "Oh, weary, weary days!" and had let them fall one after another carelessly as scattered rose-leaves on the ground; now they seemed worth picking up again—now the dreariest was worth reliving because she was not ready to die.

To die; but she had hardly thought of death even in her fiercest unrest, for life, for life she had been ready to battle with the world; but here right in her way lay the impassable gulf, and what beyond?

Ah, what beyond! She had set aside human law, she had snapped the strongest human ties like a tender thread; and now God, leaning down, had laid His hand upon her.

She took Dot in her arms mechanically when the Doctor brought her back, and refused all offers of assistance. One purpose shaped itself in her brain amidst the general numbness that was diffusing itself over her, to take Dot home again. She must die and leave her; then she would leave her with John. Even fussy motherly Aunt Hetty would be invaluable to the child. Then she thought how the little thing would have brightened her life, even in the prim, dull home. It was pleasant after all to tell John about her new little airs, and to see the love for Dot transfigure his plain face; perhaps through this child they might have grown nearer together one day. But she had thrown away her chance for this, and now it could never be, never now!

The fog had not passed away but fell in fine, silvery showers—April showers mingled with sunshine. A woman at the corner of the street was selling violets. How the odor brought back her wedding-day to Margaret, when she had searched through the poor little city garden and found a few with such triumph! The violet seller had a child with her too, a forlorn little sickly girl, but she was comforting her with these words as Margaret went by:

"Yes, my darlint, be asy till mammy sells her truck, an thin we'll be afther having the foine dinner—didn't ye hear yer daddy promise a gran sirloin an a wee cake for his colleen—an it's not often we do be havin the mate now, more's the pity!"

Did Margaret envy the poor, ignorant woman who looked on violets as truck, and who would go home to a shanty and eat her steak in an atmosphere of foul odors? Almost, for this woman had a home and a husband, a loving heart and a household fire, while she had cast both away; this woman had a robust vitality about her that told of life, life to care for and tend her delicate little one, while she was walking in a black shadow—the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

What wonder that she stretched out impotent hands and cried out, "Oh, John, forgive! forgive!" and lost all sense and power at the words.

A soft air that just lifted the thin curtain;

a sunlight that sifted through it; a faint odor of violets in the room; a cluster of Easter lilies on the table near her shining in pearl and gold, sometimes floating about in strange confusion, sometimes looking fixed and real, till she murmured aloud:

"I muse on joys that can not cease,
Pure spaces clothed in living beams,
Pure lilies of eternal peace,
Whose odors haunt my dreams."

"Talkin poetry," said Aunt Hetty, near her; "then she'll git well for sure. She's a-comin to her right mind, that's certin; for poetry's second natur to her."

"Hush!" said John, bending tenderly over her; "she knows me, I do believe."

So this was home, then—or a dream. A dream, perhaps, for it was so sweet. John was looking at her with his heart in his eyes, and whispering tender words. He loved her, then. Why, this would make life beautiful. But she was not to have it; she was not to have life, but death.

"I am so sorry, John," she faltered. "We should have grown nearer in time. Forgive me that I dared—"

"I have nothing to forgive, my darling," John began; and he looked so bewildered that Margaret wondered again if it was a dream. But there were the lilies with their pearly bells near her. She must have gone to church and listened to the Easter service with her cold, dark heart; she must have planned and done all. But then how was it possible to be here? And life looked lovely even in the prim, dull room; even with the staid and self-contained John; even with the kind and fussy aunt, who was even then bathing her forehead with Cologne. Ay, life looked lovely, but it was passing; and before her stood an open grave.

"Now yer lookin nateral," said Aunt Hetty, smoothing the rich waves of gold-brown hair; "we'll have you as chick as ever in a week. Now I'll jist go an cook you up a bit of chicken broth; for you know you scarcely picked a bit yesterday at dinner."

Surely she was dreaming now. The lilies seemed to bud and bloom and spread out into a wonderful tree, under whose branches she sat and looked through a thicket of starry flowers at John's grave face.

"Yesterday," she dreamily said; "did I dine here yesterday?"

"Of course, my darling; and I thought you were not well then. To think I should have been off in the country when you were taken so ill. You have been wandering all night."

Wandering indeed, thought Margaret; how far she had wandered from the path of right in plan and purpose she could not tell him then.

"Oh, John!" she said, stretching out her hand, "they said I could not live a year, and then I thought of you!"

"That was only one of your vagaries, dear," he said, briskly. "You will live to be a grandmother, as far as I know, and dance Dot's children on your knee. Here she comes, fresh as a daisy, bless her little heart!"

Ah, it was not a dream; for her own little Birdie nestled down at her side, and she knew that life was hers—life with all its chance for noble ends and uses—life to fill with kindly deeds, with helping words to others—life with its trials to be nobly borne, its shadows in which to work for a Heavenly crown. Then her heart echoed the joyful psalm, "Christ our Lord has risen to-day!" for later than the date in the Christian year had dawned the true resurrection in her heart. Christ, bursting through the hard rock of skepticism and dark unbelief, had risen to-day in her rejoicing soul with healing on His wings. Then she took the Easter lilies and pressed the frail, pure things to her lips, giving God praise that she had come back also through the grave and gate of death into newness of life; and that love, a cold, dead seed lying under snows colder than wildest storms can give, had found an earthly spring, and lifted itself up through the hard surface to burgeon and bloom and fill her life with fragrance.

GLADSTONE AS LEADER OF THE COMMONS.

THERE is nothing that at once strikes a casual visitor to the English Parliament more unpleasantly—especially if he has sat in the spacious galleries of the Capitol at Washington—than the way in which the architects of Westminster Hall have ignored the existence of the people as a body vitally interested in the proceedings of those who are supposed to be their representatives. No matter how important the debate that is to take place, only about one hundred and fifty or two hundred out of the thirty millions of England can be admitted into the Commons' House. And what do not these have to go through! About one half have had their names inserted in the list which admits to the Speaker's Gallery. About twenty ladies—principally the families of members who are to take part in the debate—are crowded into the Ladies' Gallery. The rest must cram themselves into the Strangers' Gallery.

In order to get into this last place we first get an order of admission from a member of the House. We then have to sit in a kind of closet from four o'clock in the morning until four of the afternoon, when the Parliament opens. (This, of course, is when there is some unusual attraction.) We do not sit here all this time in propria persona, but obtain what is called a "dummy." This "dummy" is the first poor ragged wretch that may be picked up in the streets with nothing to do. It is not to be supposed that the ragged regiment who crowd to the door of the closet referred to at daybreak, with notes from Members of Parliament in their hands, have any interest beyond a passionate, sleepless desire to hear a great orator. Oh, dear no! Nor is it to be for an instant thought that when, in the afternoon, one of these meekly or even eagerly resigns his place to a well-dressed comer that it is any thing more than pure self-sacrifice. If I were to intimate that, when I lately went to hear Mr. Gladstone introduce the new Reform Bill, and a seedy boy, out at the elbows, kindly yielded to me place No. 6, in which he had been sitting eleven hours, I sat there with $2 50 in gold less in my purse than before, the report might reach Her Majesty's immaculate Government, and a most disinterested functionary might lose his place. Consequently, as you see, I was ushered in by powerful friends, and paid nothing—nothing whatever, I assure you!

It was a very odd place for me to be in—that closet at the foot of the stairway leading to the Strangers' Gallery. When I went in and relieved poor No. 6, I looked around at my company. But few had as yet been relieved from their long watch, and never since the days of Falstaff did eyes behold a more melancholy troop than those who were presumably the auditors of Mr. Gladstone. Through the reeking air of the dark, subterranean place, which by severe crowding held fifty-eight persons, one could see the faces, the filthy raiment, the debauched expression of those who would a few hours later be distributed among the dens, station-houses, and work-houses of London. As you gaze a functionary in uniform starts in at the door and cries, "The Hon. Yelverton Hensleigh!" Each poor wretch looks hard at the back of his bit of paper, some asking their neighbors to spell out what is on theirs. "The Hon. Yelverton Hensleigh!" shouts again the official. "Think as that's me," pipes up a half-naked and very dirty little boy. He is called forth. A few novices explode at the fiction; but the policemen look very solemn as the elegant aristocrat comes forward and takes the seat and order from his double.

At last the ragamuffins with their grand aristocratic and literary names have all gone; in their places a well-dressed and select company has appeared; but there, chatting or reading by the one gas-jet, we must remain one hour. At last, however, the great Westminster clock tolls four; a long single file begins to coil slowly upward through a close, dark series of stairways; but at last a curtain is drawn aside, and ere we know it we are seated on delightful cushions looking down on the assembling wisdom of England.

The room is small, though not so small as the deceptive Gothic style of it makes one at first believe. The carvings and ornamentation of it are exquisite. At the other end of the room, high up on the wall, is what the novice at once takes to be a delicate series of tapestries; but as he gazes some movement starts his eye upon a search, which ends in his conclusion that they are ladies. Yes, behind a diamond lattice-work in the wall are the score of ladies to whom that veiled presence was conceded when these new Houses were built. It was not a generation ago that, in this land with a Queen, the interest of women in public affairs was supposed to be provided for by a small hole at the top of the building, around which a dozen ladies sat—a hole admitting one face at a time, through which peeresses peered by turns! This Ladies' Gallery—holding twenty—was regarded as a formidable innovation, the Conservatives not failing to observe that it was only a way-station in their progress from the ceiling to the floor. And now that Mr. Mill has got there, who knows but that the Conservatives were right?

It would be hard to surpass the impressiveness of the scene when some unusual occasion has brought together all the magnates of the country—when the foreign ministers and the peers are in the places provided for them—and the wandering eye detects among the group of visitors Tennyson or Owen or Froude—and when, as the bishop's prayer closes, a great flood of tinted light descends through the ceiling of toned glass. The little ghostly procession out of the twelfth century—the Speaker with his gown and wig, with his attendants, in tights and kneebuckles and queues, holding up his train or carrying the mace before him—has entered. And now we are called away from the far past, from all memory of our “dummy” and our dark closet, and we are even charmed away from the beautiful scene; for the nineteenth century speaks to us through the voice of Gladstone, who rises to propose and plead for a measure of Reform which, if passed, will go far to thaw and float away this little House of Commons, and build one worthy to be the council chamber of a new England, in which no class or interest shall be unrepresented.

All the great statesmen who have ever lived have belonged to one of two classes—the class of Representatives or that of Leaders. The Representative Man is the direct expression of his country at the time of his connection with it. He may be its practical expression—as Napoleon of France or Wellington of England; or he may be its voice—as Burke was that of England and Webster that of America. It is essential only that he keep abreast with the people, and say or do what they wish to but can not say or do. The Leader is not abreast with but just ahead of his time and country. He says or does not what they wish but what they want, not what they are but what they mean. He interprets them, and often he interprets them best when he is seemingly in antagonism with them. Paul, Luther, Calvin, are historic names in the latter class; and in modern times we have them represented in Italy by Cavour and Mazzini; in England by Palmerston and Gladstone. In England the death of the great Representative of the English people has made way for the accession of their great Leader, who now stands in the front of the Commons. But even as it is hard to classify England it is hard to classify Gladstone. All other nations, from Japan to California, may be described as somewhere in the vast railway train of peoples; but England is aside, running on a groove of her own. Her island is the deposit of many sea-currents from the soils of various other lands; her Constitution is made of the odds and ends of all others in Europe; her people is mixed of all European races; and her foremost orator is as complex as the physical, moral, or political elements of his country.

Gladstone is a Scotchman, with a purely English training. He was bred a Tory, and is the leader of the Liberal party. He is a plebeian aristocrat; a royalist who studied and learned to hate despotism in the court of Bomba; a High Churchman, who once wrote a Puseyistic book, whom Oxford fears; a reformer on whom the Argus of liberty finds it needful to keep its hundred eyes wide open. He has given each party its finest watch-word, for the England he loves includes them all; yet no party would go to him to find an advocate. Finding each party devoted much more to its own shell than to its own essence, he touches them all with his wand and they unclothe, revealing valuable kernels unsuspected by themselves. His theory of oratory classes him among the Leaders. The orator must, as he once said, “return to the people as flood what he has received as vapor.” The Representative would return the vapor he had received more or less rarefied. It is never of a high kind of man that one can say, “He is always up to the people,” or, “He goes as fast as the people will let him.” The Leader will fuse and remould public opinion. He will speak to marble, never doubting that it will flush with life under his words, and follow his voice as something for which it has been waiting, bound by an evil spell. But the task of the Leader lies in his presentative if not in his representative power; that is, he is not necessarily an originator. To the masses all not dictated by themselves may seem innovation or originality, as they like or dislike it. The Leader, however, has leaders; and he is oftener than otherwise a mediator between the highest thought of his time and the people. Mr. Gladstone, as we sit here, charms away the weariness of hours with an eloquence that, though it is figured and changed with the forms of his own mind as that light is by the stained windows, is clearly traceable to many a solitary thinker—not the least to that thin, quietly-nervous representative of Westminster, who is so fascinated by the unsuspected scrolls into which he finds his own ideas may be woven.

When Mr. Gladstone rises there is a flutter of expectation and anxiety throughout the room; what he will say is utterly unpredictable. When John Bright, the finest orator in Europe of the Representative class, rises, his speech is so written out on his broad, handsome face that Lavater, were he reporter for the Times, would write it all out before he got through. But Gladstone's face is, during the first ten minutes, the sheath of the man; and his idea only comes out gleam by gleam, until, a true Damascus blade, it flashes and darts in graceful curves—such a splendid fencer is he!—and at length is wielded with that skill which generally wins the day.

Nature has, in the clear steel-ray of his eye, the fortress-like brow that protects it, the firm nose that is its buttress above, though it becomes refined and Greekish as it descends to the flexible lips, given him a fit casket in which to keep his brilliants. His gestures are more frequent than with the earlier great speakers of Parliament, but are quite his own. He has, in particular, a way of raising his hand up to the side of his temples, and holding it there vertically a moment before it descends to emphasize his point, which is remarkably impressive. It is, however, in the modulations of his voice, in the tones which come each embodied in a word which expresses it as truly as pallor or blush expresses an emotion, that the great culture of Gladstone is revealed. One seems to be listening to the utterances of some invisible procession of great spirits—stretching from Homer, Demosthenes, Simonides, to Erasmus and Bacon. As his words are, so to speak, complexioned, so his style is physiognomical. His sentences carry in their form something beyond the mere meaning of the words.

It was wonderful, indeed, to see a man of this nicety of culture floundering in the great Reform Debate among the old phrases and hereditary expedients of England; and it was not a small tribute to him, that while he touched them they assumed a certain dignity. Fancy the flower of Oxonian culture talking about seat and lot owners and potwallopers! Yet, really, when Gladstone spoke of potwallopers one seemed to find a new dignity in the solitary individual—a widower, mayhap, or hermit, or scholar—whose boiling pot assured him an interest in his country, and entitled him to the franchise. And so did he build statistics up into pretty architectural forms. Nevertheless in the pauses of his speech one could but feel a longing to hear that voice filled with the inspiration of universal questions, and not devoting itself to the tremendous issue of whether the English voter should be a renter to the sum of seven or of ten pounds. Pounds—pounds—pounds—pounds. The words were reiterated until one would think we had all gathered to perform a solemn rite to a great gold sovereign. I reflected on the wit of that photographer, who, having lately to make a likeness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, set up a pound sterling in order to rivet his eye. It is one advantage that we of America have reaped from the slavery agitation in America that our people have been educated into an interest in and knowledge of great human questions, and that our Congressmen, in however rude, unoxonian speeches, deal with such. Though the Church questions, and the Irish wrongs, have given of late a deeper tone to the English Parliamentary debates, yet even now, in four days out of the five of its weekly sittings, one will find an immense amount of learning, research, and thought devoted to the Armstrong gun, to the Pigville Railway Company, and other questions of similar grandeur.

The subject of Reform was one, however, which, once unsealed, could not be kept down in the small casket of statistics. And all who listened to Gladstone when he introduced the bill knew that he must rise with the momentous importance of the theme. He disappointed all who went to hear him as an orator in this; for his main object being to conciliate the Tories—knowing that the reformers were sure to take whatever extension they could get—he devoted himself at the close of his statement to proving that it was a comparatively unimportant change. We had a fine chance to witness the orator's dexterity in talking to one extreme what the other must not hear, and in gilding a revolutionary pill; but there was scarcely a touch of heroism in the speech. The conclusion was the nearest approach to a brave treatment, and occupied five minutes of the speech, which was of two and a half hours' duration. It was an appeal to the Tories, whose objection, it must be remembered, to the extension of the franchise is that the admission of the working-classes is, on account of their numbers, the virtual disfranchisement of the higher and more educated classes:

"We do not," said Mr. Gladstone, "entirely abandon the expectation that even those who have protested almost in principle against the extension of the franchise downward, will be disposed to accept a measure which they do not wholly approve if they think it offers the promise of the settlement for a considerable period of a grave, important, complex, and difficult subject. I would beg them to consider what an immense value there is in the extension of the franchise for its own sake. Liberty is a thing which is good not only in its fruits, but in itself. This is what we constantly say in regard to English legislation, when we are told that affairs are managed more economically, more cleverly, and effectually in foreign countries. Yes, we answer, but here they are managed freely; and in freedom, in the free discharge of political duties, there is an immense power both of discipline and of education for the people. We can not consent to look upon this large addition, considerable although it may be, to the political power of the working-classes of this country as if it were an addition fraught with nothing but danger. We can not look upon it as the Trojan horse approaching the walls of the sacred city, and filled with armed men bent on ruin, plunder, and confiscation. We can not join in comparing it with that monstrum infelix—we can not say:

'—*Scandit fatalis machina muros,

I believe that those persons whom we ask you to enfranchise ought rather to be welcomed as you would welcome recruits to your army. We ask you to give within what you consider to be the just limits of prudence and circumspection, but, having determined those limits, to give with an ungrudging hand. Consider what you can safely and justly afford to do in admitting new subjects and citizens within the pale of the Parliamentary Constitution; and, having so considered it, don't do it as if you were compounding with danger and misfortune. Do it as if you were conferring a boon that will be felt and reciprocated in grateful attachment. Give to these persons new interests in the Constitution—new interests which, by the beneficent working of the laws of Nature and Providence, shall beget in them new attachment to the Constitution; for the attachment of the people to the throne and to the laws under which they live is, after all, more than your gold and your silver, more than your fleets and your armies, at once the strength, the glory, and the safety of the land."

Nothing could exceed the grace and dignity with which this peroration was delivered; and every word and thought in it will bear a microscopic criticism. Yet it was in listening to this that I felt Gladstone's limitations as an orator. There was a certain lack of moral depth in the speaker. Pectus est quod disertum facit. Nothing can go farther than it has come. The plaudits which responded to these words were loud but not deep. Intellectually Mr. Gladstone is profound though not broad; morally he is broad but not profound. I have never in this or any speech been thrilled by him except on the intellectual side. All the parties and the people of England find a reception in his heart—for he is one of the few politicians who have hearts—but it is the reception of a drawing-room; they have no homes there. He is therefore a leader for an intermediate phase between two Englands, and the forerunner of some man with convictions rather than opinions.

If I mistake not, the working-men of England will never obtain their franchises under the leadership of Gladstone. Carlyle reminds us that when any great change is to be wrought God raises up men to whom that change is made to appear as the one thing needful. Nobody would ever suspect Mr. Gladstone of thinking the enfranchisement of the English working-men the one thing needful; there was far more of that kind of feeling about Mr. Horsman when he bitterly denounced Earl Russell and his ministers as having at last laid the Government at the feet of John Bright. It will be impossible for the men of strong convictions on the radical side to bring in their one-thing-needful power upon a timid half-measure like that now proposed; and so it is probable that, between their indifference and the bitter hostility of the Tories and the Palmerston mourners, the measure may fail. If it does, let it not be supposed that English liberty has received any blow. When the diffusion of intelligence among the English lower classes shall have gone on some years yet; when the beer-houses are no longer tenfold more numerous than the schools; when some of the hard and cruel religious dogmas, whose fetters on the minds and hearts of the lower orders are now hugged, shall be broken; they will be worthy of a higher privilege than to write by another's hand their ignorance upon a ballot and cast it to be another link in the chain of all. And when that day shall come the ballot will be found to be the recognition of an elemental force more needed by Parliament than Parliament by it.

THE LIVE AMERICAN.

I AM a live American,
Life's morning on my breast;
In action, action is my Heaven,
But Tophet is in rest.
I grapple savage Nature's mane,
And make her to me bow,
While the iron Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

I crave no other nation's land;
It must not crave for mine:
If it invades, here is my sword,
And yonder yawns the brine.
So, let alone, the sooner all
The elements must bow,
While the iron Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

But not for merely matter's wealth
I'm conquering the zone;
No! 'tis that Science, Letters, Art,
Shall share my mighty throne:
And yet unto their coronals
Must all the nations bow,
While the iron Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

The lightning is the pen of God
On yonder sky for me:
It writes, so all the world may read,
"Forevermore Be Free!"
Niagara answers the command,
"To Mortal Never Bow!"
While the iron Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

Oh, how divine, how vast my Creed!
Earth, Heaven, own its span:
'Tis rainbow-arched belief in God,
And, also, faith in man.
This is the Creed that's bound to make
The king-blasphemers bow,
While the iron Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

Oh, welcome to this New World's life!
Nor shall I slower sweep
Till Nature's mane is wreathed with flowers
On every conquered steep.
Then I, perhaps, will yearn to make
Some other planet bow,
While still the Trump of Action storms
In thunder o'er my brow—
Push along, push along, keep moving!

HENRY BARTH.

HENRY BARTH, THE AFRICAN TRAVELER.

IN the winter of 1859-60 I used to take the London Times every day from the hand of a gentleman who, like myself, used to read the papers at the well-known café of Sparagnapani, Under the Linden, in Berlin. The hour which suited our mutual convenience in going there was from twelve to one, and in time our passing salutations led to sentences, sentences to conversation, conversation to acquaintance, and acquaintance, I can not forbear to think, to friendship.

This man was Henry Barth, the distinguished African explorer. He had just published his great work, and was quietly living in Berlin, waiting till some opening should present itself which should call his talents into occupation, and be worthy of his experience. A young man myself, his junior by about thirteen years, but like him a pupil of Ritter, there were many things in common between us, and our daily conversation soon became to me one of the most pleasant features of the winter. In person he was short, compactly and stoutly built; with a noble forehead, deep, dark eyes, regular features, and a bronzed complexion. He was in excellent condition; yet full as was his face, and thick the solid coating of muscle which covered his cheek-bones, Barth had still so much mind, and so much sensibility, that what in many another man would have seemed like grossness, was entirely lost from sight in the thoroughly intellectual expression which played over his features. Most reserved in his conversation with Germans and with Englishmen, he was affable and confidential with an American; and to me it is to this day an enigma when I hear men use such expressions as this, that "Barth seemed the very incarnation of reserve." Our Minister at the Court of Berlin, who was acquainted with Barth, has the same impression of his character which I gained years ago, and can not believe that the man whom the world considered cold, unapproachable, suspicious, and reticent, was he whom he found open, free, and kindly.

Yet doubtless much is to be said on both sides. His whole early training tended to make him reserved and a lover of solitude, yet not suspicious and jealous. He never had a boyhood in the strict sense of the word: his earliest world was one of thought, hope, expectation, and study. He grew up without play-fellows, and with but few companions save books. In this way his taciturnity found a natural and inevitable development. Advancing years made him more and more a student. His ample pecuniary means allowed him, when he became a traveler, to journey with no companions but his servants, and what might, under other circumstances, have developed a rich, social nature, only proved the means of inducing an increase of reserve and taciturnity. Yet the suspiciousness which he manifested in his later years, was, so far as I can learn, a product of after-growth, and a result of disappointments and of unexpected ingratitude.

The American public has seen Barth only from one point of view—the bold, cheerful, undaunted African explorer; and the man who encountered the obstacles which he did, and yet vanquished them all, would not seem to be the one to be the victim of disappointment. Yet he appears not to have led a bright, happy life. Among the rumors which have passed through the leading circles of Berlin society since his death is one which I never heard when he was alive—namely, that the direction of his energies to travel through wild and unknown districts was originally occasioned by disappointment in love, and as this is mentioned by scientific gentlemen of the highest eminence, it can not, I think, be devoid of truth. The lady to whom he was attached is said to be now residing in Berlin, happily and respectably married.

But not to dwell on this romantic page of his career, which as only at best the record of rumors, there have been other agencies at work which have been effective in marring the quiet happiness of his life. After his return from his first great tour, of which I shall speak further on another page, Barth, laden with a traveler's richest spoils, not mere light and pleasant sketches, but with original results of great value, was appointed lecturer in the University of Berlin, and hoped to win a place not only in the affections of a large number of students, but also to realize his fond ideal of a successful teacher. In this he failed so signally as to embitter his spirits and crush his hopes. From his friend and my own, Professor Koner, of Berlin, I gather some particulars which, though stated with the caution and delicacy of friendship, make it evident that Barth, though possessing some of the qualifications of a first-class lecturer, could not compete with others still more favored. He heaped up the masses of learning in such prodigious quantities that students who had not made geography a special study could follow him neither with profit nor pleasure. Large wall-maps not being used in the lecture-rooms of the University, he was still more disabled: and could even an American lecturer deal with descriptive geography without some help from wall-maps or illustrations? Yet Barth's want of success was necessarily sharply contrasted with the great and sustained enthusiasm which year after year attended the geographical lectures of Carl Ritter. Thirty years of labor in the Berlin University had brought him to the height of his reputation, and his lecture-room, the largest in the University, was always thronged. One might suppose that geography being brought into the foreground by Ritter's unparalleled skill, a young man, standing under his protection and enjoying his warm friendship and entire confidence, would have entered into a full share of success; but this was denied to Barth, and, dissatisfied with his attempts to enlist the interest of the young men in his lectures, he began to look around him for a new field of exploration where his daring, his energy, and his hopefulness might have free play. But had he waited longer at Berlin, a happy, prosperous career might have been his in spite of early discouragements.

In no other country in the world is it so difficult for a young University teacher to gain a fair start as in Germany; in no other country can success lead to such large and varied honors as there. Will the reader allow me to illustrate this remark for a moment, by a slight incident which I noted while in Heidelberg last summer. At the University there the oldest son of Mendelssohn was lecturing on the History of the Greek Revolution. He was said to be a young man of great learning, fine appearance, and of fiery enthusiasm. Being very much interested in the character of his father, the eminent musician, I availed myself of a spare hour to visit the University and hear one of his lectures. Arriving there, I inquired which was the number of the room where the young Doctor would read, and was directed to number eight. Looking in, I saw no one, and went out into the corridor, thinking that there must be a mistake. Encountering there a nervous, slightly-built, florid young man, who was hurrying along, I asked if that was Dr. Mendelssohn's lecture-room, and was answered in the affirmative. Going in and waiting patiently for some five minutes, the door flew open as with a vigorous push, and the same young man entered, walked hastily up to the desk, flung a huge roll of manuscript down, and began to read a lecture with the greatest fire and rapidity. Two hearers came in after him, but as neither one took down notes in the universal manner of German students, I knew that they were casual listeners like myself. And thus he will go on year after year till at length it may be the long practiced patience will have its reward, the lecture-room will begin to fill, the lecturer will be promoted to a professorship, and the honors which the world gives to a Neander, an Ewald, a Ritter, a Dove, an Encke, a Ranke, and a Rothe may be his.

To secure this result Barth did not wait, but turned his back upon the lecture-room and chose the tent, the privations, and the honor of an African explorer.

Yet the great disappointments which embittered his career were not all past even then. Not to dwell on the trials to which, like Livingstone and all great explorers, he was exposed while in the heart of Africa, there have been some within the last few years which would have pained a heart less sensitive than his. Coming home and publishing his great record of adventure and of discovery, he was not at once invited to take any important post, and when I met him in the winter of 1859-60 the future of his life was all uncertain. It was not till 1862 that two calls reached him which were sufficiently important to merit his serious consideration, one of them to the University of Jena, the other to become an Extraordinary Professor in that of Berlin. The latter was naturally more to his taste, since he enjoyed living in the Prussian capital, and he accepted it and entered anew upon those duties from which he once turned away for a more attractive field.

Yet that long period of waiting which succeeded the publication of his African travels was not adapted to make him contented. Speaking the English language as perfectly as he did, it might be supposed that the country which he so faithfully served would have been anxious to retain his services and turn them to account; but from England he received little or no displays of gratitude beyond the orders and medals which awaited him on his return. There was indeed no lack of recognition in the most prominent journals of the heroism which he displayed in his African tour, yet of that more satisfactory recognition which has followed the services of prominent Arctic adventurers, and such men as Livingstone, there has been none displayed in England toward Barth. The English could not forget that he was a German; and the same petty jealousy which has been arrayed against the effort to reach the North Pole by way of the Spitzbergen seas, because it emanates from Petermann, a German geographer, always refused to Barth the honors justly due him, and even down to this moment no scientific or literary journal of Great Britain has done more than to casually mention the fact of his death.

There was one cause more for the bitterness which has clouded Barth within the past few years: that was the bad spirit displayed toward him by the Anti-Slavery Society of England, and the persistent efforts made by its prominent members to show that he neglected the great object of the African mission. There is little doubt that Richardson, the head of the expedition until his premature death, was a man not scientifically qualified for his task, and not possessing that breadth and comprehensiveness of mind which were indispensable in one assuming the responsibility which he took upon himself; yet he was a philanthropist, and the hope of making treaties and opening business relations was stimulated most largely in his bosom by the expectation that the greatest and noblest result of the mission would be the good effect which it would have upon the African slave-trade. But while it would be doing a grievous injustice to the memory of Barth to insinuate that he was indifferent to this infamous traffic, yet it must be confessed that he was not so devoted to this one side of the mission as to forget the scientific objects in view, holding that it would be glory enough to open Africa to the enterprise and energy of the English nation, so that good men, clergymen and philanthropists, might enter in and turn the benefits of the original discoveries and commercial treaties to religious and beneficent uses. And when respectable men opened the fountains of their abuse after his return, and accused him of neglecting the philanthropic objects of the mission, Barth was most deeply wounded, and took no pains to conceal how sorely it touched him. When he came home to Germany, the aged and venerable Carl Ritter went all the way from Berlin to Hamburg to greet him, and to escort him to the Prussian capital. The Royal Geographical Society received their returning member with great respect, and rose as one man when he entered the hall, while Ritter, the President, taking him by the hand, escorted him to the chair, and introduced him to the enthusiastic assembly. But Barth had a burden at his heart which he could not shake off. The attacks which had been made by the English Anti-Slavery organ, seconded as they had been by those of some of the minor ecclesiastical journals, that his mission had not been devoted to religious and philanthropic objects, pained him so deeply that the presentation of the Order of the Bath could not compensate for the wound. Tears filled his eyes as soon as he commenced speaking, and instead of relating what he had done, what he had seen, and how thrilled he was to be received like a returning prince and conqueror, he told the Society of the burden which oppressed him, and took away the joy of the hour.

Barth undoubtedly overrated the importance of these attacks. He ascribed them to men of more influence than was just; he supposed that they would injure his good name in England to an extent which was altogether impossible for them to do. Nor did he ever get over the wound. England became a different country, and the English a different people; and the bitterness thus engendered remained with him down to the day of his death.

Academy of Sciences. This is indeed a body of men of the greatest eminence, but there are few in it who have done more, or who are known better, than was Henry Barth. Yet such are the jealousies of that body, such the petty littlenesses which can creep in even under the shelter of so august a name as Science, that the great philologist and discoverer was never admitted a member. Carlyle mocks in his bitterest vein at the old drunken fool Gundling, one of the first presidents, if not the very first, of this Berlin Academy; but the folly of excluding such a man as Barth from its lists would seem to indicate that its age of stupid self-complacent folly is not wholly gone by. I know that the members have a reason of ostensible validity which they assign for his exclusion: they assert that there have been few vacancies in the classes to which his peculiar departments of knowledge would have entitled him to be admitted. Yet Barth saw no good cause for this exclusion, and felt deeply pained at the neglect.

There is no doubt that all these things left their mark on the character of this sensitive explorer; and that most of those who came in contact with him in his later years did not know that his growing reserve, and apparent suspicion of men and motives, had so painful an origin and history. That in some things he was most unjustly judged can be strongly asserted by those who, like Dove the meteorologist, Ehrenberg the microscopist, Petermann and Koner the geographers, stood nearest to him and knew him best. One of the last protracted conversations which he had in his life was with Mr. Wright, our Minister at Berlin. The impression which was made by the interview on the mind of Mr. Wright was that he was a frank, open, communicative man.

The last time when he appeared in general society was at a gathering of Americans at the mansion of our Minister. He was engaged in conversation throughout the whole evening; and none who saw him then and there, just a week before he died, can fail to recall the friendliness of his demeanor, the cordiality of his expression, and the pleasure which he took in the society of the Americans present. Then it was that Barth appeared as he truly was, reticent and introspective, indeed; but not cold, suspicious, and devoured with that consuming sense of self-importance which is the too frequent attribute of eminent Germans. A man never married, and living either in his library or in the tent, he was, indeed, of few words and of little fondness for general society; but that he was naturally sour, harsh, and suspicious, can be confidently denied by all who knew him.

I said above that he was accused by some of the English ecclesiastical journals of neglecting the spiritual welfare of the Africans, and the inference might be made that Barth was an indifferent Christian: that in him piety was entirely overshadowed by his love of science. But this was by no means the case. It is true that he, like many of his countrymen, talked little of an experimental knowledge of Christianity, and that, in the regular attendance at church, and the explicit advocacy of ecclesiastical organizations, he bore little resemblance to Ritter and Steffens; yet his adherence to the religion into which he was baptized was by no means dead and meaningless. An anecdote, which is told of him as he was entering the kingdom of Ar, south of the Sahara, illustrates pointedly the strength and tenacity of his religious convictions, and manifests the noblest martyr spirit. Nothing in history is finer. The two great German travelers of the first of this century, Burckhardt and Seetzen, when they were passing through unexplored Mohammedan lands, adopted not only Oriental habits and dress and names, but feigned themselves Moslems. The experience of these two men was most amusing, the shifts to which, like the English Burton of our own time, they were put were such as to call out their whole courage, presence of mind, and wit; but there is something in Barth's disdainful refusal to pretend to wear another faith than his own which awakens our highest respect. He did, indeed, adopt a name which would be intelligible to the African Mohammedans, and termed himself Abd el Kerim, "The Son of the Most Merciful;" but further than this he would not go. Arriving at the southern confines of the Sahara, and entering the kingdom of Ar, the little company, consisting of Richardson, Barth, and Overweg, with their attendants, were surrounded by the perfidious nations, heathen in habits, cruelty, and savageness, but Mohammedan by religious profession. They demanded that the Europeans should adopt their own faith. They were numerous and well-armed, resolute and overbearing; but their threats, warnings, reasonings were all in vain. The Englishman and the two Germans were alike unwilling to purchase life at the price of surrendering their faith. It was, of course, a solemn time with the three men, for they had little reason to suppose that their lives would be spared. Barth wrote in a letter shortly after: "With the exalting consciousness of acting worthily of our religion and our country, we awaited the fate that was impending over us. It was an impressive, solemn moment. We had one more discussion regarding the theological points at which we were most at issue, but it was all in vain; and when the fanatic old leader of the party which had surrounded us had decided that as Christians we deserved to die, I stripped off a part of my clothing and told him to give me the first blow if he dared to risk the consequences."

The heroism of the act saved the lives of the whole company. But who can read such an incident as this and not respect the firm, manly piety, the unshaken Christian faith, which preferred death to the nominal acceptance of a half heathen creed? This alone were enough to place the name of Barth on the list of noble heroes. Many a man will do what he did out of a desire to save the lives of near friends.

Some might do it out of a craving for posthumous glory. But I think that the number is not great who would have been willing to die rather than to counterfeit for a short time a false religious faith. But deceit, intrigue, false dealing, formed no part of the character of Barth. He could be curt and rough enough on occasion; but he could not find it in his heart to act a fraud.

It is impossible to pass over the deeds of Barth in writing a sketch of the man and his career. Nor does the fact that the three bulky volumes of his work have passed into all the leading libraries of the United States, and have found their thousands and perhaps their ten thousands of readers, make such a work one of supererogation. It is now many years since those volumes were published, and the record of his adventurous travels may have faded a little with the lapse of time. But of course little can be done here but to give the briefest outline of his course, and to indicate in few words the value of his discoveries. In doing this I must not fail to acknowledge my great obligations to my friend, Professor Koser, the intimate companion of Barth, and the associate editor with him of the Zeitschrift der Allgemeinen Erdkunde.

The working life of Barth divides itself into three great sections, entirely distinct from each other, and yet connected by a bond which it is not difficult to trace. He lived long enough to complete two fondly-cherished hopes; and though the last work to which he laid his hand is left unfinished, yet it is so far advanced as to be of real service to the world. The goal of his youthful ambition was to make an exhaustive scientific tour around the Mediterranean Sea—the mother, as he thought, of all civilization. The hope of doing this was conceived by him during a journey to Italy while he was a student at the University of Berlin, and when he was twenty-one years of age. This was destined to be but partly accomplished when the proposed English expedition called him away, and he entered with the greatest alacrity and zeal upon the project of exploring Northern and Northern Central Africa. This work was triumphantly carried through; it was one of the few expeditions which have entirely satisfied the hopes of those who have attempted them.

Returning to Berlin he began to take up the dropped stitches of the past, and to go on year by year with his exploration of the Mediterranean Basin—a task which he only completed in 1864, about a year before his death. Besides this, he was in his later years devoting himself to the preparation of a Comparative Grammar of eight of the African languages, the result of his five years' experience in the heart of that continent. Of that work two volumes have been already issued by the well-known geographical publishing house of Justus Perthes at Gotha; and a third volume was passing through the press at the time of his death. Though to a certain extent incomplete, yet it is so far a perfected work as to be of great service to those who may have occasion to open the country explored by Barth and bring out its commercial relations with Europe; and we have great reason to be thankful that, instead of leaving it in a heterogeneous state, unintelligible to any one but himself, and utterly useless, therefore, in the event of his death, he worked it out clearly as far as he went, and left a large portion of it in a perfected state. Although I do not know just how complete he regarded it at the time of his death, yet I am sure that it was not left in the unfinished condition in which Buckle left the History of English Civilization, and Robinson his last work on the Holy Land, and that the disappointed hopes with which they had to close their works and leave us, could not have been shared by Barth. Regarding the value of the last work of his life philologists, and those who may need to use it for practical purposes, are best competent to decide. But the eminent philological talents of Barth, and the unexamined opportunities which he had of acquiring the dialects of Northern Africa, make it certain that it will in coming years be regarded as of the utmost value.

And here I can not refrain from alluding to his singular facility in learning languages. In addition to the African tongues, he had so intimate a knowledge of Greek and Latin that he might easily have taken the post of a professor in that department alone. Under Curtius, Böckh, and Grimm he devoted the utmost attention to philology while a student in the University; and the reports which he took down, German-student fashion, of the lectures which he heard, are the most thoroughly worked out of any that I have ever seen. The students always leave a broad margin at the side of the sheet for the reception of later notes and the results of private studies; but it is no unfrequent thing to find that margin an unbroken blank. Aside from the exquisite neatness of Barth's reports (all now existing and in the possession of his friends) the margin exhibits such conscientious and extended later study, as to make it plain that his was a most industrious University career. Only two great departments of study engrossed him—philology and geography. He paid some attention to the modern languages, particularly English; and subsequently attained remarkable proficiency in our tongue. Indeed it may be remarked here as appropriately as any where, that he wrote his Travels not only in German but in English; and no one who has read his volumes in our own tongue would suppose that they were written by one who labored under the great disadvantage of writing in a language to which he was not born. It is true he has not a lively, chatty, imaginative pen; but he equally lacked this when he was writing German, and his style is no more dry in the English edition than when he was writing in his mother tongue. Later he acquired the Arabic, not only as it is spoken in Syria but in Africa; and the mastery which he gained over it was such as to make his decisions regarding the orthography of Eastern names of much value. Indeed the philological talents of Barth were so remarkable that, had he never been a traveler and a geographer, he would have risen to a very distinguished place among the students of language. No one could hear him speak English and not be convinced that the perfect manner in which he expressed himself must be the index of an ease and capability in overcoming the great obstacles which a foreign language presents, such as hardly a contemporary professor in the University of Berlin had in so high a measure as himself. Ritter, whose library was more than half of English works, and whose connection with English geographers and travelers was most intimate, spoke English very imperfectly; and even William Grimm, one of the first philologists of his day, and the conjoint author, with his brother, of the most elaborate dictionary ever prepared of any language, was entirely unable to speak an English sentence. Professor Neumann, the author of the German History of the United States, speaks with a marked accent and with a certain labored use of words; Dr. Pertz, the Curator of the Royal Library, author of the celebrated Life of Stein, and husband successively of an American and an English lady, does not speak our language with the fluency with which Barth found his way through those numerous idioms which distinguish our speech. This great proficiency can not be accounted for on the ground of intercourse with the English while in Africa. Richardson, the head of the expedition, and the only Englishman, was early removed by death, and Barth's only companions subsequently to this were Overweg and Vogel. It can only be explained on the ground of his distinguished natural aptitude, which, if it had been confined to the sphere of philology, might not have made his name known as widely among general readers as his travels have done, but would have given him a place among the learned, not second to that of a Max Müller, a Tischendorf, or a Grimm.

Let me now call the reader's attention to the plan of travel which first fired the imagination of Barth, while he was a student at the University, and which was to be carried out, step by step, the accomplishment of it taking place but a year before his death.

Very early in his career he became interested, through his delight and proficiency in classical studies, in the nations which flourished on the northern side of the Mediterranean Basin; and while making a visit to Italy, he conceived the idea of examining in detail the entire coast land of that sea, the mother of all modern civilization. He had sat long enough at the feet of the great and noble Ritter to grasp his full and weighty teachings respecting the connection of the earth, its physical conditions, its contour, elevation, distribution of land, water, mountains, plains, and rivers, with the history and progress of the human race. From Ritter he unquestionably caught the conception of the immense historical value of the Mediterranean Basin, and the hope and purpose which dawned upon him on his first Italian tour may be traced back to Ritter's crowded lecture-room in the University of Berlin.

In some respects Barth was imperfectly prepared to enter upon travels so important and so little akin to a pleasure tour as were his. His close study of philology had precluded his paying attention to other sciences than Comparative Geography, and in the preface to his great work he has the courage and the honesty to declare, "I am no naturalist and no astronomer;" and in his later years he took the greatest pains to fill up, so far as he could, the deficiencies of his earlier years. Botany and zoology always lay outside of the circle of his studies, while in geology he became a tolerable proficient. It may be wondered at in these days that a great traveler and savant could be ignorant of these sciences; but not to speak of the fact that the greatest American geographer of this age, Dr. Robinson, was no more of a geologist, botanist, and zoologist than was Barth, it must be remembered that what the latter lacked in those sciences he made up in others. He was an ethnographer and a philologist: in these two characters he was eminent; and had he been more at home in the sciences named above than he was, it is confidently to be believed that he would never have accomplished the results in ethnography and philology which, after all, were his highest achievements.

I have already alluded to the kindling of his desire to explore the Basin of the Mediterranean, on the occasion of his first visit to Italy. To prepare himself for a work of the magnitude which he planned required no little time and pains. He could not be content with the study of the languages and literatures of the two countries which had hitherto engrossed his attention, Greece and Italy. The Mediterranean had been the mother of many forms of civilization; from its shores colonies had radiated, star-like, in all directions, penetrating Africa and Asia as well as Europe, and making a broad belt of culture around the blue waters of that beautiful sea. To understand all the languages related to a colonization so extensive and varied, to come into sympathy with all the types of national character involved, to understand the laws of progress and decline, was a work of time: and Barth supplemented the eight busy months which he spent in Italy by three years just as busy in the University of Berlin, preparing himself for the great work of exploration which beckoned him on. He took his Doctor's degree in 1844, making the subject of his Thesis the Commerce of Corinth; treating the subject with exhaustive learning, and producing a paper which a competent judge has declared worthy to be mentioned in connection with Heeren's great work on the politics, commerce, and business of the ancient world.

making London his first goal, where he spent two months in studying the monuments of ancient art stored in the British Museum, and in acquiring the elements of Arabic. In England he had the good sense to provide himself with letters of introduction to most of the English consuls resident on the shores of the Mediterranean, and at a later period he often had occasion to reap the benefit of his great precaution. He then passed rapidly southward, visiting Paris, the Rhone valley with its traces of Roman civilization, crossed the Pyrenees, spent a month in Madrid, examined the ruined fragments of Arabic culture in Southern Spain, and reached Gibraltar, where his true path of discovery began. He touched the African coast at Tangiers, and was able to discern the traces of the now fallen Moorish cities of Asila and El Arish, together with those of the Carthaginian colony of Lix. The suspiciousness of the natives prevented all attempts to penetrate into the interior, however; and after trying all means to examine the Roman and Punic remains along the coast eastward, he was compelled to retrace his steps to Tangiers, recross the strait, to sail from Alicante in Spain to Algiers, and to make a fresh start. Yet he had seen enough of Morocco to become familiar with its physical features, the character of its population, and the general type of the archaeological remains.

Algeria was a little more accessible than Morocco, and Barth, with his natural energy and fearlessness, made the best use of every opportunity. To have penetrated far inland would have been to throw his life away, for although the French had had nominal possession of the country for fifteen years, yet it was only the coast which was quiet and secure. Barth could not leave the immediate neighborhood of the sea, but went eastward as far as the Tunisian frontier and westward as far as Oran, examining among other remains the extensive ruins of Tipasa, the burial-place of the Mauritanian kings. He made excursions just as far inland as was safe, or indeed further, if the truth be told, visiting Philippeville, Constantine, and Gelma, and reaching the sea again at Bona, where he took a steamer for Tunis.

In this state he had less difficulties to contend with, and made a thorough exploration of the country. He first visited the remains of Carthage and Utica, which had been brought to the light of the civilized world only twelve years before by the Danish consul Falbe. He then explored almost every spot of antiquarian interest in the country, bringing to light a mass of information regarding ancient sites, which, if not of so thrilling moment as the discovery of Carthage and Utica, were by no means insignificant. No dangers of great magnitude had to be encountered; and the Tunisian explorations which he made are among the most complete of his whole journey. He then crossed to Malta, and spent three weeks on the island, returning then to Tunis once more, and continuing his successful explorations there. It was there that he heard a negro drop the words, "If it please God, you shall some day visit Kano." They made a deep impression on him at the time; and although crowded out of his mind by subsequent events, they were not forgotten. They followed him, and rung in his ear till, in the course of years, he began to make his preparations to reach that far-distant African town, and fulfill the great mission of his life.

Barth wished to go westward, to pass the Tunis frontier, and to visit the fruitful and well-watered Belád el Jerid, but the inhospitable character of the natives compelled him to abandon this project, and to pursue his course eastward. Following the coast of the Minor Syrtis, and making such stay upon the route as enabled him to examine all places of antiquarian interest, he at length reached Tripoli, and tarried there for a week. Here he prepared himself for a hazardous tour, yet he did not estimate sufficiently, as the sequel proved, the perils lying in the way. The route east of Tripoli was by no means of that savage, repulsive character which it is represented by the ancient writers. A shadow has rested upon the Magna and Minor Syrtis since the days of the Roman power, and it might well appall as brave a heart as that of Barth to face their dangers and their difficulties. Yet its natural character he did not find so markedly in contrast with the other districts which he had traversed, and he has strong words to bestow on the "lying poets" who have given the place its evil name. His journey over the Syrtis, and then through Cyrenaica, was one of the greatest archaeological interest to him. Not to speak of Msarata, Kinyps, Ben-Ghazi, the ruins of Tancheira, Ptolemais, Barca, and Cyrene were places which had an indescribable attraction to him, and to them he devoted loving and patient attention.

His arrival at the extreme eastern portion of the Marmorica, and at the slope of the high plateau which to the ancient world was the natural barrier between Libya and Asia, was characterized by an incident which changed all his plans, and cost him a large portion of the hard-won earnings of eleven such months as he had spent. It was on the 7th of June, 1846, that, as he was lying exhausted in his tent, he was surrounded by a horde of the ruffianly Bedouins of that region, and in the scuffle that ensued he was wounded in the thigh. Victorious in the first attack, and able to continue his march, he evaded for some time the balls which were shot at him from the covert; but in a second attack he was rendered senseless by the blows of two stones which struck him on the head. While he lay in this condition the wretches who had assailed him rifled him of all his valuables and left him in the wilderness, destitute of water and of food. So complete was their spoliation of his effects that they took away even his books, papers, and drawings; and almost the only article which was left was the clothing which he wore and his Herodotus, the faithful companion of all his subsequent travels. I have seen this volume. It is not much soiled for a book which has passed around the Mediterranean, and spent five years of camp service in the heart of Africa. On the blank leaf he has written with his own hand in German: "This copy of Herodotus has accompanied me in all my earlier as well as in my later travels, having been left when I was robbed in Northern Africa, and having made with me my entire second tour. On this account, soiled as it is, it has its value to me." I quote the inscription from memory, but its purport is as above.

This was the real end of the journey. Accompanied by a friendly Arab he was at length able to reach Alexandria, having lost almost every thing which he had brought along with him. Happily his very retentive memory stood him in good stead; and the full letters which he had written to his friends, and especially to Captain Schubert of Dresden, his brother-in-law, supplied the rest, and furnished him with the material of his first work, Wanderungen durch die Küstenländer des Mittelmeeres (Wanderings through the Countries bordering on the Mediterranean). The book is not a readable one. The accumulation of material in it is so great, and the lack of that point and vivacity which often make scientific travels interesting, has precluded the success of the work, and it has had no general acceptance even in Germany. Barth was as unlike as possible in bearing and look to those men of his country whom we generally have in mind when we speak of "German professors;" but his books do not seem like those which would naturally emanate from the English-looking, stirring, vigorous man who is so well remembered in Berlin.

Replenished by his father, a wealthy tradesman of Hamburg, with ample means he again set out anew, taking up the thread of his route where he dropped it, at Alexandria. His first stay was at Cairo. Thence he ascended the Nile to Assuan, whence he turned to the east and visited the ruins of Berenice, on the Red Sea, and the emerald mines at Kosser. He crossed the Gulf of Suez, and touched the soil of that peninsula so memorable for its connection with the children of Israel, although the harbor of Tor which he visited lay doubtless outside of the line of their wanderings. Thence he returned to Cairo, and then struck across the desert to Gaza, where he spent an entire month, studying the place with a critical care which had never been bestowed on it before, and practicing that dialect of the Arabic which he would be compelled to speak in Palestine. He then passed through many of the least explored valleys of the Holy Land, oftentimes facing dangers which Robinson did not wish to encounter. His most elaborate explorations were on the sea-coast, for he did not lose sight of the great goal of his travels, the investigation of the shores of the Mediterranean. The cities which had been held by the Philistines and the Phœnicians were, of course, full of interest to him; and although he was compelled to glean in the field which Robinson had carefully and almost exhaustively explored before him, yet the points which he noted, the corrections which he made, and the observations which he recorded, have a value which those can best estimate who have made that country the subject of special study. The quotations from Barth's unpublished diary, which will be given in a few months to the American reader in the English edition of Ritter's Palestine, will furnish convincing evidence of the thoroughness with which the accomplished and restless traveler studied whatever came within the range of his observation.

The same spirit of scientific exploration with which he investigated Palestine he devoted to the ruins of Cilicia, the island of Cyprus, and indeed the whole southern coast of Asia Minor. After spending a short time in Smyrna to refresh himself, he passed northward through Lydia, the Trojan Plain, Mysia, and Bithynia to Constantinople, whence he returned to Hamburg by way of Athens and Mycenæ, after an absence of three years, his constitution strengthened by exercise and exposure, and with perhaps the richest and most varied experiences that have been acquired by any traveler while engaged in a single journey.

He had in a certain manner accomplished what he proposed at the outset; that is, he had encompassed the entire Mediterranean Basin, and was able to mentally review it in its wholeness. It is true there were many deficiencies to be supplied before he could be said to have thoroughly completed his investigations; and he continued his journeys through Spain, Italy, Turkey, and Greece, down to the very year of his death, although the distinct work which he proposed in his youth was completed in 1864. The last of his journeys was during the summer of 1865. It was made in Albania, and the account of it was published in the Geographical Journal, of which he was an associate editor, in the very month in which he died.

Then followed the year and a half which he spent in writing out the first volume of his travels, and in delivering those discouraging lectures in the University of Berlin to which reference has already been made. Restless, mortified, and ambitious, he began to look out on the world once more for a fresh field of exploration. The opportunity which he sought came sooner than he expected, and in a quarter toward which he would not naturally have looked. In 1848 James Richardson, who had already traveled considerably in Northern Africa, laid before the English Government the proposition that an expedition be formed for the purpose of penetrating Central Africa as far as the kingdom of Bornou, and having as its double mission the abolishment of the slave traffic in that region and the opening of the district to commerce. The plan was approved, and Richardson was intrusted with the general control of such an expedition. Through the influence of the illustrious Bunsen, then the Prussian Minister to England, and of my distinguished friend, the geographer Petermann, then residing in London, it was thought advisable, on the part of the English Government, to secure the services of a German scholar to accompany the expedition, and, at the suggestion of Carl Ritter, Barth was selected for this important post; and a more joyful welcome was perhaps never received than that which the young Doctor gave to the invitation. He had always been a great admirer of England, and to enlist in her service was scarcely less agreeable than it would have been to have been employed by Prussia; and this can be said with the more assurance, in consideration of the fact that, although a German, he was not a Prussian by birth, but a citizen of the free city of Hamburg. Yet Barth declined the flattering invitation; not assuredly out of timidity, or a love of home, or ease, or a disinclination to face the thousand difficulties which beset an explorer. His only motive was the filial deference he owed to his father, who strongly opposed his son's going forth upon so perilous a service, and Dr. Overweg was selected to take his place and intrusted with the money given by the Berlin Geographical Society. Yet the English Government was so impressed with the peculiar value of Barth's services that he was unable to procure his release on the ground of his father's disinclination to part with an only son. This being the case, and the son having accepted the post before consulting his father, and without a suspicion that the proposition would encounter opposition, nothing remained but for him to go.

The whole history of that African expedition has been given so fully to the world that it is unnecessary to recount it in detail. It is safe to say that every one who may read this sketch has acquired his interest in Barth from the pages of that great five-volumed work* in which the explorer had recounted his experiences with a too great minuteness indeed, and in a dry, nerveless manner, and yet not without finding thousands of readers. There is something so fascinating about the interior of that great unexplored Africa, that even the poorest record of travels there is not overlooked by the busy world. And so Barth's work, though over-minute and tedious, has been so far read that the character of its author has been to a certain extent understood and prized.

It would be an insult to the reader's intelligence to do more than to give the slightest outline of his course. It is to be regretted that there was not in England and the United States an epitomized edition, similar to that published by Justus Perthes of Gotha, in two volumes, and like the larger one in five from Barth's own hand.

After a long and tedious preparation, Richardson, Barth, and Overweg met in Tropoli on the 18th of January, 1850. There being still delays, Barth, always restless if there was any exploration to be effected, pushed out into the neighboring country, visiting all the important Punic and Roman remains within a circuit of three or four hundred miles, and so consuming the time up to the 24th of March. The expedition struck across the upland of Sahara, and it is to their report that we owe our first accurate and scientifically valuable report of the physical character of that dreaded region. Like the Syrtis on the coast, Barth found that it was far more dreadful in anticipation than in reality; and often afterward, when exposed to the fever climate of the south, and debilitated by the sultry air, he turned longing thoughts toward the breezy, dry, salubrious upland of Sahara. The type of human character he found much higher there than in the less elevated tropical district to which he subsequently came, and of the whole of the long journey, that which was taken through the ravines and over the crags of the "desert" was the most stimulating and enjoyable.

It was at the arrival near the southern boundary of Sahara that Barth and his companions encountered that determined persistency on the part of the fanatic Mohammedans which has been spoken of on another page, and which seems to have almost led to the destruction of the whole party. They had approached the kingdom of Ar, but it was only by the payment of two hundred dollars that they were allowed to enter it. On the 3d of September, 1850, they set foot in Tintelust, the capital, and here the first commercial treaty made by the expedition was negotiated between the travelers, acting in the name of Great Britain and the Sultan of the country. During the stay which was made there, Barth, unwilling to be idle, pressed alone southward to Agades, and, after encountering no inconsiderable perils, succeeded in making a treaty with the Governor of this important commercial centre. He spent four weeks at Agades and then returned to Tintelust, enriched with knowledge of the country and the people, and having accomplished in a perfectly successful manner one of the great objects of the expedition.

Leaving the Ar district the travelers prepared to enter the lowland region, the Soudan as the German geographers call it, and here the party divided, each of the three taking a different route. It is not clear, either from the diary of Richardson or from the work of Barth, why this step was taken; but it is probable that no single motive prompted it, and that it was brought about partly by the real want of unity in the counsels of Richardson and Barth, partly through a desire to accomplish more than could be done were a single route taken, and partly from the fact that singly they could travel at less expense, because more modestly and unpretentiously, than in a party. The last motive must have had considerable weight, for the funds were already beginning to be short. In the division of routes

M.'s Government, in the years 1849-1855.* By HENRY BARTH, Fellow of the Royal Geographical and Asiatic Societies, etc., etc. With Map and numerous Illustrations.

Barth was to go by way of Katsena to Kano, Overweg to Geber and Maradi, and Richardson to Sinder. The rendezvous was to be in Kukana. Richardson, however, did not live to reach the place of meeting, and the three were reduced to two, the German friends.

It were too long a tale to follow Barth through the course of his wanderings, to see him in his rags, and destitute of money, enter Kano, the object of those long hopes which were awakened years before by that Tunisian negro, who, on the occasion of his first visit to the African soil, whispered in his ear, "If God will, thou shalt one day see Kano." The reader of Barth's volumes needs only to be reminded of the loan of twenty dollars on the part of the Governor, of his successful journey onward to Kukana, the place designated by the British Government as the goal of the expedition, of his entrance into Bornou, his protracted travels and investigations in that kingdom, of his extreme need of money and his consequent want, of his examination of Lake Tsad and the Adamawa district at the south.

It was while Overweg was exploring the lake in detail that Barth made the discovery in the Adamawa country which was the most notable event of the whole expedition. On the 18th of June, 1851, he descended the upper course of the Benue, the stream which connects the heart of Africa with the Atlantic. The value of that discovery may not be known in our day, but the time will come when the words with which Barth alludes to his first view of the river will be recognized as no fanatic's dream, but as those of a man who distinctly discerned the future. "Whoever," he writes, "has surrendered himself to the fancies of youth, and has gone forth in the pursuit of a golden hope, will easily be able to conceive of the feelings with which I looked over the field within my view. I was dumb with amazement. There, fresh from the creative hand of God, was a tract which should one day be alive with the industries of races of men as yet unknown there: a gateway was opened before me, through which the sturdy peoples of northern climes should enter and develop the riches of that fertile region. Little did I think how soon the advance-vessel, bearing that northern civilization, would anchor but a little way from the place where I then was." Yet even now, although the Benue has been successfully navigated to its upper waters, we are far from realizing the value of the great discovery of Barth.

From that point he went southward as far as Yola, and thence turned back to Kukana, where he was obliged to tarry for a considerable time for the restoration of his health, which had suffered much under the trying influences of the African climate. He joined Overweg, and made one journey more, traversing this time the hitherto unexplored kingdom of Bagirmi, at the capital of which, Masenna, he received a message from the English Government, placing him at the head of the expedition, and directing him to return by way of Timbuctoo. The order was highly welcome to Barth, and he set out with eagerness for the "Queen of the Desert," as that barbaric capital is termed. While with his courage and unextinguished hopefulness he was congratulating himself on the honor of being selected to follow in the footsteps of the heroic Mungo Park, he had to bear the pain of losing his friend and companion Overweg, a victim to the relentless climate and to long-protracted fatigue. No one can paint the heaviness of heart with which Barth pursued his solitary journey, himself no longer strong, and liable to die at any time a solitary death. Passing Sinder, Katsena, and Sokoto, he crossed the Niger, and then followed the course of that river up to Timbuctoo, the goal of that stage of his journey. The story of his nine months' detention in that city, of his imminent perils, and of his escape, is too well-known to my readers, and it forms a tale, even when told in his cold, dry way, of thrilling interest. To his dying day he never forgot the gratitude which he owed to the two youths who once saved his life at the peril of their own, and their picture, together with that of his great patron and friend, Bunsen, hung over his bed to the last. I need not follow him down the Niger again to Sokoto, and through his homeward course over Kano and Kukana, where, at the very last stage of his wanderings and dangers, he encountered Vogel, who had been sent out to search for him as for a lost Franklin. The journey northward was uneventful, and on the 13th of October, 1855, he arrived at Berlin.

The results of the journey have been well summed up by his friend Koner in a few words. They were the discovery of the true physical character of the Sahara; the establishing of the position and extent of the Mendif group; the proving that the great eastern tributary of the Niger is independent of Lake Tsad, and that it forms the natural commercial avenue into Central Africa; the investigation of the river system of Bagiri and Adamawa, and the exploration of the Niger between Sokoto and Timbuctoo. The aggregate length of his journeyings was not far from 14,000 miles, and the territory opened to the knowledge of the civilized world is more than 4,000,000 of square miles in extent.

The years immediately following Barth's return were devoted to the preparation of his volumes for the press. Then followed a period of quiet study before he was called to any new field; and at length, in 1863, he was appointed Professor Extraordinary of Geography in the University of Berlin, in which capacity he labored down to the day of his death, November 25th of last year.

It is painful to be called upon to record the death of one whom we have always associated with health, vigor, action. Of the sixty-seven travelers who have endeavored, since the year 1788, to explore the region traversed by Barth, he is the only one who has been spared either a death by violence or by fever. How narrow his repeated escapes from both forms were the readers of his volumes know well. Yet he continued to the end a hale, vigorous man, and a slight form of dyspepsia was the only ailment which his African exposures bequeathed to him. An attack of this complaint following a hearty dinner, and aggravated by the medical treatment which he received, was the immediate cause of his death. Notwithstanding the feeling in Berlin among his friends, in speaking of the administration of six grains of tartar emetic to a man suffering with a slight attack of dyspepsia, and the complaint made by some that he was no less than slaughtered by medical incapacity, it should be said, in justice, that Barth, whenever he was slightly ailing, always demanded a powerful, active, immediate remedy, and was not satisfied with light measures. Even in this the natural energy of the man appeared.

To sum up his character is easy. Though reticent, he was not crooked, and his soul was clear and simple. He was a modest, resolute, straightforward man, a faithful and affectionate son, brother, and friend. He was a thorough student, and loved knowledge with the true German love, for its own sake, and not for the sake of what it would bring him. If he was harsh and severe in his words and repellent in his manner it was only too natural, as the opening pages of this article have, I trust, shown; and very seldom did he allow his pen or his tongue to run away with his judgment. If a false man was to be shown up in his true colors none was more willing to do it than Barth, for his hatred of intrigue, of cunning, and of syc-phancy was strong beyond all expression. He was all his life long free from care about money; his first journey cost him about 11,000 American dollars; but the sloth, want of ambition, and love of ease which often accompany the possession of wealth had no part in the character of Henry Barth. He had a few friends, and those few he loved with pure affection. He was a Liberal in politics, and a member of the Lower House of the Prussian Parliament. He was a friend of America, and with Americans he felt himself at home, for he knew that he was loved and honored in America.

The grave has closed over him at the age of forty-five years, while he seemed to be in the very prime of life. He lived long enough, however, to do a great work and to win an enviable name. His memory will long survive in the hearts of those who knew him best; and those who stood the nearest to him have only words of praise. He was not, it is true, one of those warm, magnetic souls which enkindle the enthusiasm of thousands; his was not one of those tender spirits which draw men like the love of woman; his was not a fine poetic nature, he not even having his full share of the universal, overflowing German sentiment; but he had a manly, brave, genuine soul, a heart which craved the love of the few who formed the world of his affections, a noble heroism in the cause of science and civilization, a lofty, and I venture to say a sanctified, ambition. The world is richer for every man in it whose character has the sterling qualities which lay in the soul of Henry Barth.

THE DIARY ENDED.

"IF I had been less anxious the sudden presentation of Mrs. Oldershaw, in an entirely new character, might have amused me. But I was in no humor for laughing, and (my notes-of-hand being all paid) I was under no obligation to restrain my natural freedom of speech. 'Stuff and nonsense!' I said. 'Put your Sunday face in your pocket. I have got some news for you since I last wrote from Thorpe-Ambrose.'"

"The instant I mentioned 'Thorpe-Ambrose' the whites of the old hypocrite's eyes showed themselves again, and she flatly refused to hear a word more from me on the subject of my proceedings in Norfolk. I insisted—but it was quite useless. Mother Oldershaw only shook her head and groaned, and informed me that her connection with the pomps and vanities of the world was at an end forever. 'I have been born again, Lydia,' said the brazen old wretch, wiping her eyes. 'Nothing will induce me to return to the subject of that wicked speculation of yours on the folly of a rich young man.'

"After hearing this I should have left her on the spot, but for one consideration which delayed me a moment longer.

"It was easy to see by this time that the circumstances (whatever they might have been) which had obliged Mother Oldershaw to keep in hiding, on the occasion of my former visit to London, had been sufficiently serious to force her into giving up, or appearing to give up, her old business. And it was hardly less plain that she had found it to her advantage—every body in England finds it to their advantage, in some way—to cover the outer side of her character carefully with a smooth varnish of Cant. This was, however, no business of mine; and I should have made these reflections outside, instead of inside the house, if my interests had not been involved in putting the sincerity of Mother Oldershaw's reformation to the test—so far as it affected her past connection with myself. At the time when she had fitted me out for our enterprise, I remembered signing a certain business-document which gave her a handsome pecuniary interest in my success, if I became Mrs. Armistead of Thorpe-Ambrose. The chance of turning this mischievous morsel of paper to good account, in the capacity of a touch-stone, was too tempting to be resisted. I asked my devout friend's permission to say one last word before I left the house.

"As you have no further interest in my wicked speculation at Thorpe-Ambrose," I said, "perhaps you will give me back the written paper that I signed, when you were not quite such an exemplary person as you are now?"

"The shameless old hypocrite instantly shut her eyes and shuddered.

"Does that mean Yes or No?" I asked.

"On moral and religious grounds, Lydia," said Mrs. Oldershaw, "it means No."

"On wicked and worldly grounds," I rejoined, "I beg to thank you for showing me your hand."

"There could, indeed, be no doubt now about the object she really had in view. She would run no more risks and lend no more money—she would leave me to win or lose, single-handed. If I lost, she would not be compromised. If I won, she would produce the paper I had signed, and profit by it without remorse. In my present situation it was mere waste of time and words to prolong the matter by any useless recrimination on my side. I put the warning away privately in my memory for future use, and got up to go.

"At the moment when I left my chair there was a sharp double knock at the street-door. Mrs. Oldershaw evidently recognized it. She rose in a violent hurry and rang the bell. 'I am too unwell to see any body,' she said, when the servant appeared. 'Wait a moment, if you please,' she added, turning sharply on me, when the woman had left us to answer the door.

"It was small, very small, spitefulness on my part, I know—but the satisfaction of thwarting Mother Jezebel, even in a trifle, was not to be resisted. 'I can't wait,' I said; 'you reminded me just now that I ought to be at church.' Before she could answer I was out of the room.

"As I put my foot on the first stair the street-door was opened, and a man's voice inquired whether Mrs. Oldershaw was at home.

"I instantly recognized the voice. Doctor Downward!

"The doctor repeated the servant's message in a tone which betrayed unmistakable irritation at finding himself admitted no farther than the door.

"'Your mistress is not well enough to see visitors? Give her that card,' said the doctor, 'and say I expect her, the next time I call, to be well enough to see me.'

"If his voice had not told me plainly that he felt in no friendly mood toward Mrs. Oldershaw, I dare say I should have let him go without claiming his acquaintance. But, as things were, I felt an impulse to speak to him or to any body who had a grudge against Mother Jezebel. There was more of my small spitefulness in this, I suppose. Any way, I slipped down stairs, and, following the doctor out quietly, overtook him in the street.

"I had recognized his voice, and I recognized his back as I walked behind him. But when I called him by his name, and when he turned round with a start and confronted me, I followed his example, and started on my side. The doctor's face was transformed into the face of a perfect stranger! His baldness had hidden itself under an artfully grizzled wig. He had allowed his whiskers to grow, and had dyed them to match his new head of hair. Hideous circular spectacles bestrode his nose in place of the neat double eye-glass that he used to carry in his hand, and a black neckerchief, surmounted by immense shirt-collars, appeared as the unworthy successor of the clerical white cravat of former times. Nothing remained of the man I once knew but the comfortable plumpness of his figure, and the confidential courtesy and smoothness of his manner and his voice.

"'Charmed to see you again,' said the doctor, looking about him a little anxiously, and producing his card-case in a very precipitate manner. 'But my dear Miss Gwilt, permit me to rectify a slight mistake on your part. Doctor Downward of Pimlico is dead and buried; and you will infinitely oblige me if you will never, on any consideration, mention him again!'

"I took the card he offered me, and discovered that I was now supposed to be speaking to 'Doctor Le Doux, the Sanatorium, Fairweather Vale, Hampstead!'

"'You seem to have found it necessary,' I said, 'to change a great many things since I last saw you? Your name, your residence, your personal appearance—?'

"'And my branch of practice,' interposed the doctor. 'I have purchased of the original possessor (a person of feeble enterprise and no resources) a name, a diploma, and a partially completed sanatorium for the reception of nervous invalids. We are open already to the inspection of a few privileged friends—come and see us. Are you walking my way? Pray take my arm, and tell me to what happy chance I am indebted for the pleasure of seeing you again?'

"I told him the circumstances exactly as they had happened, and I added (with a view to making sure of his relations with his former ally at Pimlico) that I had been greatly surprised to hear Mrs. Oldershaw's door shut on such an old friend as himself. Cautious as he was the doctor's manner of receiving my remark satisfied me at once that my suspicions of an estrangement were well founded. His smile vanished, and he settled his hideous spectacles irritably on the bridge of his nose.

"'Pardon me if I leave you to draw your own conclusions,' he said. 'The subject of Mrs. Oldershaw is, I regret to say, far from agreeable to me under existing circumstances. A business difficulty connected with our late partnership at Pimlico, entirely without interest for a young and brilliant woman like yourself. Tell me your news! Have you left your situation at Thorpe-Ambrose? Are you residing in London? Is there any thing, professional or otherwise, that I can do for you?'

"That last question was a more important one than he supposed. Before I answered it I felt the necessity of parting company with him and of getting a little time to think.

"'You have kindly asked me, doctor, to pay you a visit,' I said. 'In your quiet house at Hampstead I may possibly have something to say to you which I can't say here in this noisy street. When are you at home at the Sanatorium? Should I find you there later in the day?'

"The doctor assured me that he was then on his way back, and begged that I would name my own hour. I said, 'Toward this afternoon;' and, pleading an engagement, hailed the first omnibus that passed us. 'Don't forget the address,' said the doctor, as he handed me in. 'I have got your card,' I answered—and so we parted.

"I returned to the hotel, and went up into my room and thought over it very anxiously.

"The serious obstacle of the signature on the marriage register still stood in my way as unmanageably as ever. All hope of getting assistance from Mrs. Oldershaw was at an end. I could only regard her henceforth as an enemy hidden in the dark—the enemy, beyond all doubt now, who had had me followed and watched when I was last in London. To what other counselor could I turn for the advice which my unlucky ignorance of law and business obliged me to seek from some one more experienced than myself? Could I go to the lawyer whom I consulted when I was about to marry Midwinter in my maiden name? Impossible! To say nothing of his cold reception of me when I had last seen him, the advice I wanted this time related (disguise the facts as I might) to the commission of a Fraud—a fraud of the sort that no professional man would think of assisting if he had a character to lose. Was there any other competent person I could think of? There was one, and one only—the doctor who had died at Pimlico, and had revived again at Hampstead.

"I knew him to be entirely without scruples; to have the business experience that I wanted myself; and to be as cunning, as clever, and as far-seeing a man as could be found in all London. Beyond this, I had made two important discoveries in connection with him that morning. In the first place, he was on bad terms with Mrs. Oldershaw—which would protect me from all danger of the two leaguering together against me if I trusted him. In the second place, circumstances still obliged him to keep his identity carefully disguised—which gave me a hold over him in no respect inferior to any hold that I might give him over me. In every way he was the right man, the only man, for my purpose; and yet I hesitated at going to him—hesitated for a full hour and more, without knowing why!

"It was two o'clock before I finally decided on paying the doctor a visit. Having, after this, occupied nearly another hour in settling carefully beforehand what I should say to him, and having determined to a hair's-breadth how far I should take him into my confidence, I sent for a cab at last, and set off toward three in the afternoon for Hampstead.

"I found the Sanatorium with some little difficulty. Fairweather Vale proved to be a new neighborhood, situated below the high ground of Hampstead, on the southern side. The day was overcast, and the place looked very dreary. We approached it by a new road running between trees, which might once have been the park-avenue of a country house. At the end we came upon a wilderness of open ground, with half-finished villas dotted about, and a hideous litter of boards, wheel-barrows, and building materials of all sorts scattered in every direction. At one corner of this scene of desolation stood a great overgrown dismal house, plastered with drab-colored stucco, and surrounded by a naked unfinished garden, without a shrub or a flower in it—frightful to behold. On the open iron gate that led into this inclosure was a new brass plate, with 'Sanatorium' inscribed on it in great black letters. The bell, when the cabman rang it, pealed through the empty house like a knell; and the pallid withered old man-servant in black who answered the door looked as if he had stepped up out of his grave to perform that service. He let out on me a smell of damp plaster and new varnish, and he let in with me a chilling draught of the damp November air. I didn't notice it at the time, but writing of it now I remember that I shivered as I crossed the threshold.

"I gave my name to the servant as 'Mrs. Armadale,' and was shown into the waiting-room. The very fire itself was dying of damp in the grate. The only books on the table were the doctor's Works, in sober drab colors; and the only object that ornamented the walls was the foreign Diploma (handsomely framed and glazed), of which the doctor had possessed himself by purchase, along with the foreign name.

"After a moment or two the proprietor of the Sanatorium came in, and held up his hands in cheerful astonishment at the sight of me.

"'I hadn't an idea who "Mrs. Armadale" was!' he said. 'My dear lady, have you changed your name too? How sly of you not to tell me when we met this morning! Come into my private snuggerly—I can't think of keeping an old and dear friend like you in the patients' waiting-room.'

"The doctor's private snuggerly was at the back of the house, looking out on fields and trees doomed but not yet destroyed by the builder. Horrible objects in brass and leather and glass, twisted and turned as if they were sentient things writhing in agonies of pain, filled up one end of the room. A great book-case with glass doors extended over the whole of the opposite wall, and exhibited on its shelves long rows of glass jars, in which shapeless dead creatures of a dull white color floated in yellow liquid. Above the fire-place hung a collection of photographic portraits of men and women, inclosed in two large frames hanging side by side with a space between them. The left-hand frame illustrated the effects of nervous suffering as seen in the face; the right-hand frame exhibited the ravages of insanity from the same point of view; while the space between was occupied by an elegantly-illuminated scroll, bearing inscribed on it in fancifully-shaped letters the time-honored motto, 'Prevention is better than Cure.'

"'Here I am, with my galvanic apparatus, and my preserved specimens, and all the rest of it,' said the doctor, placing me in a chair by the fireside. 'And there is my System mutely addressing you just above your head, under a form of exposition which I venture to describe as frankness itself. This is no mad-house, my dear lady. Let other men treat insanity, if they like—I stop it! No patients in this house as yet. But we live in an age when nervous derangement (parent of insanity) is steadily on the increase; and in due time the sufferers will come. I can wait, as Harvey waited, as Jenner waited. And now, do put your feet up on the fender and tell me about yourself. You are married, of course? And what a pretty name! Accept my best and most heart-felt congratulations! You have the two greatest blessings that can fall to a woman's lot—the two capital H's, as I call them—Husband and Home.'

"I interrupted the genial flow of the doctor's congratulations at the first opportunity.

"'I am married; but the circumstances are by no means of the ordinary kind,' I said, seriously. 'My present position includes none of the blessings that are usually supposed to fall to a woman's lot. I am already in a situation of very serious difficulty—and before long I may be in a situation of very serious danger as well.'

"The doctor drew his chair a little nearer to me, and fell at once into his old professional manner and his old confidential tone.

"'If you wish to consult me,' he said, softly, 'you know that I have kept some dangerous secrets in my time, and you also know that I possess two valuable qualities as an adviser. I am not easily shocked; and I can be implicitly trusted.'

"I hesitated even now at the eleventh hour, sitting alone with him in his own room. It was so strange to me to be trusting to any body but myself! And yet how could I help myself in a difficulty which turned on a matter of law?

"'Just as you please, you know,' added the doctor. 'I never invite confidences. I merely receive them.'

"'There was no help for it; I had come there not to hesitate, but to speak. I risked it and spoke.

"'The matter on which I wish to consult you,' I said, 'is not (as you seem to think) within your experience as a professional man. But I believe you may be of assistance to me, if I trust myself to your larger experience as a man of the world. I warn you, beforehand, that I shall certainly surprise and possibly alarm you before I have done.'

"With that preface I entered on my story, telling him what I had settled to tell him—and no more.

"I made no secret, at the outset, of my intention to personate Armadale's widow; and I mentioned without reserve (knowing that the doctor could go to the office and examine the will for himself) the handsome income that would be settled on me in the event of my success. Some of the circumstances that followed next in succession I thought it desirable to alter or conceal. I showed him the newspaper account of the loss of the yacht—but I said nothing about events at Naples. I informed him of the exact similarity of the two names; leaving him to imagine that it was accidental. I told him, as an important element in the matter, that my husband had kept his real name a profound secret from every body but myself; but (to prevent any communication between them) I carefully concealed from the doctor what the assumed name under which Midwinter had lived all his life really was. I acknowledged that I had left my husband behind me on the Continent; but when the doctor put the question I led him to conclude—I couldn't with 'all my' resolution tell him positively!—that Midwinter knew of the contemplated fraud, and that he was staying away purposely so as not to compromise me by his presence. This difficulty smoothed over—or, as I feel it now, this baseness committed—I reverted to myself, and came back again to the truth. One after another I mentioned all the circumstances connected with my private marriage, and with the movements, while in London, of Armadale and Midwinter, which rendered any discovery of the false personation (through the evidence of other people) a downright impossibility. 'So much,' I said, in conclusion, 'for the object in view. The next thing is to tell you plainly of a very serious obstacle that stands in my way.'

"The doctor, who had listened thus far without interrupting me, begged permission here to say a few words on his side before I went on.

"The 'few words' proved to be all questions—clever, reaching, suspicious questions—which I was, however, able to answer with little or no reserve, for they related, in almost every instance, to the circumstances under which I had been married, and to the chances for and against my lawful husband if he chose to assert his claim to me at any future time. 'My replies informed the doctor, in the first place, that I had so managed matters in Armadale's house and in the neighborhood as to lead to a general impression that he intended to marry me; in the second place, that my husband's early life had not been of a kind to exhibit him favorably in the eyes of the world; in the third place, that we had been married without any witnesses present who knew us, at a large parish church in which two other couples had been married the same morning, to say nothing of the dozens on dozens of other couples (confusing all remembrance of us in the minds of the officiating people) who had been married since. When I had put the doctor in possession of these facts, and when he had further ascertained that Midwinter and I had gone abroad among strangers immediately after leaving the church, and that the men employed on board the yacht in which Armadale had sailed from Somersetshire (before my marriage) were now away in other ships voyaging to the other end of the world, his confidence in my prospects showed itself plainly in his face. 'So far as I can see,' he said, 'your husband's claim to you—after you have stepped into the place of the dead Mr. Armadale's widow—would rest on nothing but his own bare assertion. And that I think you might safely set at defiance. Excuse my apparent distrust of the gentleman. But there might be a misunderstanding between you in the future, and it is highly desirable to ascertain beforehand exactly what he could or could not do under those circumstances. And now that we have done with the main obstacle that I see in the way of your success, let us by all means come to the obstacle that you see next!

"I was willing enough to come to it. The tone in which he spoke of Midwinter, though I myself was responsible for it, jarred on me horribly, and roused for the moment some of the old folly of feeling which I fancied I had laid aside forever. I rushed at the chance of changing the subject, and mentioned the discrepancy in the register between the hand in which Midwinter had signed the name of Allan Armadale and the hand in which Armadale of Thorpe-Ambrose had been accustomed to write his name, with an eagerness which it quite diverted the doctor to see.

"Is that all?" he asked, to my infinite surprise and relief, when I had done. "My dear lady, pray set your mind at ease! If the late Mr. Armadale's lawyers want a proof of your marriage they won't go to the church register for it, I can promise you."

"What!" I exclaimed, in astonishment; "do you mean to say that the entry in the register is not a proof of my marriage?"

"It is a proof," said the doctor, "that you have been married to somebody. But it is no proof that you have been married to Mr. Armadale of Thorpe-Ambrose. Jack Nokes or Tom Styles (excuse the homeliness of the illustration!) might have got the License and gone to the church to be married to you under Mr. Armadale's name—and the register (how could it do otherwise?) must in that case have innocently assisted the deception. I see I surprise you. My dear madam, when you opened this interesting business you surprised me—I may own it now—by laying so much stress on the curious similarity between the two names. You might have entered on the very daring and romantic enterprise in which you are now engaged without necessarily marrying your present husband. Any other man would have done just as well, provided he was willing to take Mr. Armadale's name for the purpose."

"I felt my temper going at this. 'Any other man would not have done just as well,' I rejoined instantly. 'But for the similarity of the names I should never have thought of the enterprise at all.'

"The doctor admitted that he had spoken too hastily. 'That personal view of the subject had, I confess, escaped me,' he said. 'However, let us get back to the matter in hand. In the course of what I may term an adventurous medical life I have been brought more than once into contact with the gentlemen of the law, and have had opportunities of observing their proceedings in cases of, let us say, Domestic Jurisprudence. I am quite sure I am correct in informing you that the proof which will be required by Mr. Armadale's representatives will be the evidence of a witness present at the marriage who can speak to the identity of the bride and bridegroom from his own personal knowledge.'

"But I have already told you," I said, "that there was no such person present."

"Precisely," rejoined the doctor. "In that case, what you now want, before you can safely stir a step in the matter, is—if you will pardon me the expression—a ready-made witness, possessed of rare moral and personal resources, who can be trusted to assume the necessary character, and to make the necessary Declaration before a magistrate. Do you know of any such person?" asked the doctor, throwing himself back in his chair and looking at me with the utmost innocence.

"I only know you," I said.

"The doctor laughed softly. 'So like a woman!' he remarked, with the most exasperating good-humor. 'The moment she sees her object she dashes at it headlong the nearest way. Oh, the sex! the sex!'

"Never mind the sex!" I broke out, impatiently. "I want a serious answer—Yes or No?"

"The doctor rose and waved his hand with great gravity and dignity all round the room. 'You see this vast establishment,' he began; 'you can possibly estimate to some extent the immense stake I have in its prosperity and success. Your excellent natural sense will tell you that the Principal of this Sanatorium must be a man of the most unblemished character—'

"Why waste so many words," I said, "when one word will do? You mean No!"

"The Principal of the Sanatorium suddenly relapsed into the character of my confidential friend.

"Oh, the sex! the sex!" he said. "My dear lady, it isn't Yes, and it isn't No, at a moment's notice."

"You want time?"

"I want till this time to-morrow afternoon. May I have it? A thousand thanks. Where can I call on you when I have decided what to do?"

"There was no objection to my trusting him with my address at the hotel. I had taken care to present myself there as 'Mrs. Armadale;' and I had given Midwinter an address at the neighboring post-office to write to when he answered my letters. We settled the hour at which the doctor was to call on me; and, that matter arranged, I rose to go, resisting all offers of refreshment, and all proposals to show me over the house. His smooth persistence in keeping up appearances after we had thoroughly understood each other disgusted me. I got away from him as soon as I could, and came back to my diary and my own room.

"We shall see how it ends to-morrow. My own idea is that the doctor will say Yes.

"November 24.—The doctor has said Yes, as I supposed—but on terms which I never anticipated. The conditions on which I have secured what he calls his 'confidential services' amount to nothing less than the payment to him, on my stepping into the place of Armadale's widow, of half my first year's income—in other words, six hundred pounds!

"I protested against this extortionate demand in every way I could think of. All to no purpose. The doctor met me with the most engaging frankness. Nothing, he said, but the accidental embarrassment of his position at the present time would have induced him to mix himself up in the matter at all. He would honestly confess that he had exhausted his own resources, and the resources of other persons whom he described as his 'backers,' in the purchase and completion of the Sanatorium. Under those circumstances, six hundred pounds in prospect was an object to him. For that sum he would run the serious risk of advising and assisting me. Not a farthing less would tempt him—and there he left it, with his best and friendliest wishes, in my hands!

"It ended in the only way in which it could end. I had no choice but to accept the terms, and to let the doctor settle things on the spot as he pleased. The arrangement once made between us, I must do him the justice to say that he showed no disposition (as the proverb says) to let the grass grow under his feet. He called briskly for pens, ink, and paper, and suggested opening the campaign at Thorpe-Ambrose by to-night's post.

"We agreed on a form of letter which I wrote, and which he copied on the spot. I entered into no particulars at starting. I simply asserted that I was the widow of the deceased Mr. Armadale; that I had been privately married to him; that I had returned to England on his sailing in the yacht from Naples; and that I begged to inclose a copy of my marriage-certificate, as a matter of form with which I presumed it was customary to comply. The letter was addressed to 'The representatives of the late Allan Armadale, Esq., Thorpe-Ambrose, Norfolk.' And the doctor himself carried it away, and put it in the post.

"I am not so excited and so impatient for results as I expected to be, now that the first step is taken. The thought of Midwinter haunts me like a ghost. I have been writing to him again—as before, to keep up appearances. It will be my last letter, I think. My courage feels shaken, my spirits get depressed, when my thoughts go back to Turin. I am no more capable of facing the consideration of Midwinter at this moment than I was in the by-gone time. The day of reckoning with him, once distant and doubtful, is a day that may come to me now I know not how soon. And here I am, trusting myself blindly to the chapter of Accidents still!

"November 25.—At two o'clock to-day the doctor called again by appointment. He has been to his lawyers (of course without taking them into our confidence) to put the case simply of proving my marriage. The result confirms what he has already told me. The pivot on which the whole matter will turn, if my claim is disputed, will be the question of identity; and it may be necessary for the witness to make his Declaration in the magistrates' presence before the week is out.

"In this position of affairs the doctor thinks it important that we should be within easy reach of each other, and proposes to find a quiet lodging for me in his neighborhood. I am quite willing to go any where—for, among the other strange fancies that have got possession of me, I have an idea that I shall feel more completely lost to Midwinter if I move out of the neighborhood in which his letters are addressed to me. I was awake and thinking of him again last night. This morning I have finally decided to write to him no more.

"After staying half an hour the doctor left me—having first inquired whether I would like to accompany him to Hampstead to look for lodgings. I informed him that I had some business of my own which would keep me in London. He inquired what the business was. 'You will see,' I said, 'to-morrow or next day.'

"I had a moment's nervous trembling when I was left by myself again. My business in London, besides being a serious business in a woman's eyes, took my mind back to Midwinter in spite of me. The prospect of removing to my new lodging had reminded me of the necessity of dressing in my new character. The time had come now for getting my widow's weeds.

"My first proceeding, after putting my bonnet on, was to provide myself with money. I got what I wanted to fit me out for the character of Armadale's widow by nothing less than the sale of Armadale's own present to me on my marriage—the ruby ring. It proved to be a more valuable jewel than I had supposed. I am likely to be spared all money anxieties for some time to come.

"On leaving the jeweler's I went to the great mourning shop in Regent Street. In four-and-twenty hours (if I can give them no more) they have engaged to dress me in my widow's costume from head to foot. I had another feverish moment when I left the shop; and, by way of further excitement on this agitating day, I found a surprise in store for me on my return to the hotel. An elderly gentleman was announced to be waiting to see me. I opened my sitting-room door—and there was old Bashwood!

"He had got my letter that morning, and had started for London by the next train to answer it in person! I had expected a great deal from him, but I had certainly not expected that. It flattered me. For the moment, I declare it flattered me!

"I pass over the wretched old creature's raptures and reproaches, and groans and tears, and weary long prosings about the lonely months he had passed at Thorpe-Ambrose, brooding over my desertion of him. He was quite eloquent at times—but I didn't want his eloquence here. It is needless to say that I put myself right with him, and consulted his feelings before I asked him his news. What a blessing a woman's vanity is sometimes! I almost forgot my risks and responsibilities in my anxiety to be charming. For a minute or two I felt a warm little flutter of triumph. And it was a triumph—even with an old man! In a quarter of an hour I had him smirking and smiling, hanging on my lightest words in an ecstasy, and answering all the questions I put to him like a good little child.

"Here is his account of affairs at Thorpe-Ambrose, as I gently extracted it from him bit by bit:

"In the first place, the news of Armadale's death has reached Miss Milroy. It has so completely overwhelmed her that her father has been compelled to remove her from the school. She is back at the cottage, and the doctor is in daily attendance. Do I pity her? Yes! I pity her exactly as much as she once pitied me!

"In the next place, the state of affairs at the great house, which I expected to find some difficulty in comprehending, turns out to be quite intelligible, and certainly not discouraging so far. Only yesterday the lawyers on both sides came to an understanding. Mr. Darch (the family solicitor of the Blanchards, and Armadale's bitter enemy in past times) represents the interests of Miss Blanchard, who is next heir to the estate, and who has, it appears, been in London on business of her own for some time past. Mr. Smart of Norwich (originally employed to overlook Bashwood in the steward's office) represents the deceased Armadale. And this is what the two lawyers have settled between them.

"Mr. Darch, acting for Miss Blanchard, has claimed the possession of the estate and the right of receiving the rents at the Christmas audit in her name. Mr. Smart, on his side, has admitted that there is great weight in the family solicitor's application. He can not see his way, as things are now, to contesting the question of Armadale's death, and he will consent to offer no resistance to the application if Mr. Darch will consent, on his side, to assume the responsibility of taking possession in Miss Blanchard's name. This Mr. Darch has already done; and the estate is now virtually in Miss Blanchard's possession.

"One result of this course of proceeding will be (as Bashwood thinks) to put Mr. Darch in the position of the person who really decides on my claim to the widow's place and the widow's money. The income being charged on the estate, it must come out of Miss Blanchard's pocket; and the question of paying it would appear therefore to be a question for Miss Blanchard's lawyer. To-morrow will probably decide whether this view is the right one—for my letter to Armadale's representatives will have been delivered at the great house this morning.

"So much for what old Bashwood had to tell me. Having recovered my influence over him, and possessed myself of all his information so far, the next thing to consider was the right use to turn him to in the future. He was entirely at my disposal, for his place at the steward's office has been already taken by Miss Blanchard's man of business, and he pleaded hard to be allowed to stay and serve my interests in London. There would not have been the least danger in letting him stay, for I had, as a matter of course, left him undisturbed in his conviction that I really am the widow of Armadale of Thorpe-Ambrose. But with the doctor's resources at my command, I wanted no assistance of any sort in London; and it occurred to me that I might possibly make Bashwood more useful by sending him back to Norfolk to watch the progress of events there in my interests. He looked sorely disappointed (having had an eye evidently to paying his court to me in my widowed condition!) when I told him of the conclusion at which I had arrived. But a few words of persuasion, and a modest hint that he might cherish hopes in the future if he served me obediently in the present, did wonders in reconciling him to the necessity of meeting my wishes. He asked helplessly for 'instructions' when it was time for him to leave me and travel back by the evening train. I could give him none, for I had no idea as yet of what the legal people might or might not do. 'But suppose something happens,' he persisted, 'that I don't understand, what am I to do, so far away from you?' I could only give him one answer. 'Do nothing,' I said. 'Whatever it is, hold your tongue about it, and write, or come up to London immediately to counsel me.' With those parting directions, and with an understanding that we were to correspond regularly, I let him kiss my hand, and sent him off to the train.

"Now that I am alone again, and able to think calmly of the interview between me and my elderly admirer, I find myself recalling a certain change in old Bashwood's manner which puzzled me at the time, and which puzzles me still.

"Even in his first moments of agitation at seeing me, I thought that his eyes rested on my face with a new kind of interest while I was speaking to him. Besides this, he dropped a word or two afterward, telling me of his lonely life at Thorpe-Ambrose, which seemed to imply that he had been sustained in his solitude by something like a feeling of confidence about his future relations with me when we next met. If he had been a younger and a bolder man (and if any such discovery had been possible), I should almost have suspected him of having found out something about my past life which had made him privately confident of exercising a power of control over me if I showed any disposition to deceive and desert him again. But such an idea as this in connection with old Bashwood is simply absurd. Perhaps I am over-excited by the suspense and anxiety of my present position? Perhaps the merest fancies and suspicions are leading me astray? Let this be as it may, I have at any rate more serious subjects than the subject of old Bashwood to occupy me now. To-morrow's post may tell me what Armadale's representatives think of the claim of Armadale's widow.

"November 26th.—The answer has arrived this morning in the form (as Bashwood supposed) of a letter from Mr. Darch. The crabbed old lawyer acknowledges my letter in three lines. Before he takes any steps or expresses any opinion on the subject he wants evidence of identity as well as the evidence of the certificate, and he ventures to suggest that it may be desirable before we go any further to refer him to my legal advisers.

"Two o'clock.—The doctor called shortly after twelve to say that he had found a lodging for me within twenty minutes' walk of the Sanatorium. In return for his news I showed him Mr. Darch's letter. He took it away at once to his lawyers, and came back with the necessary information for my guidance. I have answered Mr. Darch's by sending him the address of my legal advisers—otherwise, the doctor's lawyers—without making any comment on the desire that he has expressed for additional evidence of the marriage. This is all that can be done to-day. To-morrow will bring with it events of greater interest—for to-morrow the doctor is to make his Declaration before the magistrate, and to-morrow I am to move to my new lodging in my widow's weeds.

"November 27th.—Fairweather Vale Villas.—The Declaration has been made, with all the necessary formalities. And I have taken possession, in my widow's costume, of my new rooms.

"I ought to be excited by the opening of this new act in the drama, and by the venturesome part that I am playing in it myself. Strange to say, I am quiet and depressed. The thought of Midwinter has followed me to my new abode, and is pressing on me heavily at this moment. I have no fear of any accident happening in the interval that must still pass before I step publicly into the place of Armadale's widow. But when that time comes, and when Midwinter finds me (as sooner or later find me he must!) figuring in my false character, and settled in the position that I have usurped—then, I ask myself, What will happen? The answer still comes as it first came to me this morning, when I put on my widow's dress. Now, as then, the presentiment is fixed in my mind that he will kill me. If it was not too late to draw back—Absurd! I shall shut up my journal.

"November 28th.—The lawyers have heard from Mr. Darch, and have sent him the Declaration by return of post.

"When the doctor brought me this news, I asked him whether his lawyers were aware of my present address; and, finding that he had not yet mentioned it to them, I begged that he would continue to keep it a secret for the future. The doctor laughed: 'Are you afraid of Mr. Darch's stealing a march on us, and coming to attack you personally?' he asked. I accepted the imputation, as the easiest way of making him comply with my request. 'Yes,' I said, 'I am afraid of Mr. Darch.'

"My spirits have risen since the doctor left me. There is a pleasant sensation of security in feeling that no strangers are in possession of my address. I am easy enough in my mind to-day to notice how wonderfully well I look in my widow's weeds, and to make myself agreeable to the people of the house.

"Midwinter disturbed me a little again last night; but I have got over the ghastly delusion which possessed me yesterday. I know better now than to dread violence from him when he discovers what I have done. And there is still less fear of his stooping to assert his claim to a woman who has practiced on him such a deception as mine. The one serious trial that I shall be put to when the day of reckoning comes, will be the trial of preserving my false character in his presence. I shall be safe in his loathing and contempt for me after that. On the day when I have denied him to his face I shall have seen the last of him forever.

"Shall I be able to deny him to his face? Shall I be able to look at him and speak to him as if he had never been more to me than a friend? How do I know till the time comes! Was there ever such an infatuated fool as I am, to be writing of him at all, when writing only encourages me to think of him? I will make a new resolution. From this time forth his name shall appear no more in these pages.

"Monday, December 1st.—The last month of the worn-out old year, eighteen hundred and fifty-one! If I allowed myself to look back, what a miserable year I should see added to all the other miserable years that are gone! But I have made my resolution to look forward only, and I mean to keep it.

"I have nothing to record of the last two days, except that on the twenty-ninth I remembered Bashwood, and wrote to tell him of my new address. This morning the lawyers heard again from Mr. Darch. He acknowledges the receipt of the Declaration, but postpones stating the decision at which he has arrived until he has communicated with the trustees under the late Mr. Blanchard's will, and has received his final instructions from his client, Miss Blanchard. The doctor's lawyers tell him that this last letter is a mere device for gaining time—with what object they are of course not in a position to guess. The doctor himself says, facetiously, it is the usual lawyer's object of making a long bill. My own idea is that Mr. Darch has his suspicions of something wrong, and that his purpose is in trying to gain time—

"Ten, at night.—I had written as far as that last unfinished sentence (toward four in the afternoon) when I was startled by hearing a cab drive up to the door. I went to the window, and got there just in time to see old Bashwood getting out with an activity of which I should never have supposed him capable. So little did I anticipate the tremendous discovery that was going to burst on me in another minute that I turned to the glass, and wondered what the susceptible old gentleman would say to me in my widow's cap.

"The instant he entered the room I saw that some serious disaster had happened. His eyes were wild, his wig was awry. He approached me with a strange mixture of eagerness and dismay. 'I've done as you told me,' he whispered, breathlessly. 'I've held my tongue about it, and come straight to you!' He caught me by the hand before I could speak, with a boldness quite new in my experience of him! 'Oh, how can I break it to you?' he burst out. 'I'm beside myself when I think of it!'

"'When you can speak,' I said, putting him into a chair, 'speak out. I see in your face that you bring me news I don't look for from Thorpe-Ambrose.'

"He put his hand into the breast-pocket of his coat and drew out a letter. He looked at the letter, and looked at me. 'New-new-news you don't look for,' he stammered; 'but not from Thorpe-Ambrose!'

"'Not from Thorpe-Ambrose!'

"'No. From the sea!'

"The first dawning of the truth broke on me at those words. I couldn't speak—I could only hold out my hand to him for the letter.

"He still shrank from giving it to me. 'I daren't! I daren't!' he said to himself, vacantly. 'The shock of it might be the death of her.'

"I snatched the letter from him. One glance at the writing on the address was enough. My hands fell on my lap, with the letter fast held in them. I sat petrified, without moving, without speaking, without hearing a word of what Bashwood was saying to me, and slowly realized the terrible truth. The man whose widow I had claimed to be was a living man to confront me! In vain I had mixed the drink at Naples—in vain I had betrayed him into Manuel's hands. Twice I had set the deadly snare for him, and twice Armadale had escaped me!

"I came to my sense of outward things again, and found Bashwood on his knees at my feet, crying.

"'You look angry,' he murmured, helplessly. 'Are you angry with me? Oh, if you only knew what hopes I had when we last saw each other, and how cruelly that letter has dashed them all to the ground!'

"I put the miserable old creature back from me—but very gently. 'Hush!' I said. 'Don't distress me now. I want composure—I want to read the letter.'

"He went away submissively to the other end of the room. As soon as my eye was off him I heard him say to himself, with impotent malignity, 'If the sea had been of my mind the sea would have drowned him!'

"One by one I slowly opened the folds of the letter, feeling while I did so the strangest incapability of fixing my attention on the very lines that I was burning to read. But why dwell any longer on the effect produced upon me by the letter? It will be more to the purpose if I give the letter itself, for future reference, on this page of my journal:

"FROM ILIYRIA, AUGUST 21, 1851.

"MR. BASHWOOD,—The address I date from will surprise you—and you will be more surprised still when you hear how it is that I come to write to you from a port on the Adriatic Sea.

"I have been the victim of a rascally attempt at robbery and murder. The robbery has succeeded; and it is only through the mercy of God that the murder did not succeed too.

"I hired a yacht rather more than a month ago at Naples, and sailed (I am glad to think now) without any friend with me, for Messina. From Messina I went for a cruise in the Adriatic. Two days out we were caught in a storm. Storms get up in a hurry and go down in a hurry in those parts. The vessel behaved nobly—I declare I feel the tears in my eyes now when I think of her at the bottom of the sea! Toward sunset it began to moderate; and by midnight, except for a long smooth swell, the sea was as quiet as need be. I went below, a little tired (having helped in working the yacht while the gale lasted), and fell asleep in five minutes. About two hours after I was woke by something falling into my cabin through a chink of the ventilator in the upper part of the door. I jumped up, and found a bit of paper with a key wrapped in it, and with writing in the inner side, in a hand which it was not very easy to read.

"Up to this time I had not had the ghost of a suspicion that I was alone at sea with a gang of murderous vagabonds (excepting one only) who would stick at nothing. I had got on very well with my sailing-master (the worst scoundrel of the lot), and better still with his English mate. The sailors being all foreigners I had very little to say to. They did their work, and no quarrels and nothing unpleasant happened. If any body had told me, before I went to bed on the night after the storm, that the sailing-master and the crew and the mate (who had been no better than the rest of them at starting) were all in a conspiracy to rob me of the money I had on board, and then to drown me in my own vessel afterward, I should have laughed in his face. Just remember that, and then fancy for yourself (for I'm sure I can't tell you) what I must have thought when I opened the paper round the key, and read what I now copy (from the mate's writing) as follows:

"Son.—Stay in your bed till you hear a boat shove off from the starboard side—or you see a dead man. You money is stolen; and in five minutes' time the yacht will be scuttled and the cabin-hatch will be nailed down on you. Dead men tell no tales—and the sailing-master's notion is to leave proofs afloat that the vessel has foundered with all on board. It was his doing to begin with, and we were all in it. I can't find it in my heart not to give you a chance for your life. It's a bad chance, but I can do no more. I should be murdered myself if I did not seem to go with the rest. The key of your cabin-door is thrown back to you, inside this. Don't be alarmed when you hear the hammer above. I shall do it, and I shall have short nails in my hands as well as long, and use the short ones only. Wait till you hear the boat with all of us shove off, and then prize up the cabin-hatch with your back. The vessel will float a quarter of an hour after the holes are bored in her. Slip into the sea on the port side, and keep the vessel between you and the boat. You will find plenty of loose lumber, wrenched away on purpose, drifting about to hold on by. It's a fine night and a smooth sea, and there's a chance that a ship may pick you up while there's life left in you. I can do no more.

"As I came to these last words I heard the hammering-down of the hatch over my head. I don't suppose I'm more of a coward than most people—but there was a moment when the sweat poured down me like rain. I got to be my own man again before the hammering was done, and found myself thinking of somebody very dear to me in England. I said to myself, 'I'll have a try for my life, though the chances are dead against me.'

"I put a letter from that person I have mentioned into one of the stoppered bottles of my dressing-case—along with the mate's warning, in case I lived to see him again. I hung this and a flask of brandy in a sling round my neck—and, after first dressing myself in my confusion, thought better of it, and stripped again, for swimming, to my shirt and drawers. By the time I had done that the hammering was over, and there was such a silence that I could hear the water bubbling into the scuttled vessel amidships. The next noise was the noise of the boat and the villains in her (always excepting my friend the mate) shoving off from the starboard side. I waited for the splash of the oars in the water, and then got my back under the hatch. The mate had kept his promise. I lifted it easily—crept across the deck, under cover of the bulwarks, on all fours—and slipped into the sea on the port side. Lots of things were floating about. I took the first thing I came to—a hen-coop—and swam away with it about a couple of hundred yards, keeping the yacht between me and the boat. Having got that distance I was seized with a shivering fit, and I stopped (fearing the cramp next) to take a pull at my flask of brandy. When I had closed the flask again I turned for a moment to look back, and saw the yacht in the act of sinking. In a minute more there was nothing between me and the boat but the pieces of wreck that had been purposely thrown out to float. The moon was shining; and if they had had a glass in the boat, I believe they might have seen my head, though I carefully kept the hen-coop between me and them.

"As it was, they laid on their oars; and I heard loud voices among them disputing. After what seemed an age to me I discovered what the dispute was about. The boat's head was suddenly turned my way. Some cleverer scoundrel than the rest (the sailing-master, I dare say) had evidently persuaded them to row back over the place where the yacht had gone down, and make quite sure that I had gone down with her.

"They were more than half-way across the distance that separated us, and I had given myself up for lost, when I heard a cry from one of them, and saw the boat's progress suddenly checked. In a minute or two more the boat's head was turned again; and they rowed straight away from me like men rowing for their lives.

"I looked on one side, toward the land, and saw nothing. I looked on the other, toward the sea, and discovered what the boat's crew had discovered before me—a sail in the distance, growing steadily brighter and bigger in the moonlight the longer I looked at it. In a quarter of an hour more the vessel was within hail of me, and the crew had got me on board.

"They were all foreigners, and they quite deafened me by their jabber. I tried signs, but before I could make them understand me I was seized with another shivering fit, and was carried below. The vessel hied on her course, I have no doubt, but I was in no condition to know any thing about it. Before morning I was in a fever; and from that time I can remember nothing clearly till I came to my senses at this place, and found myself under the care of a Hungarian merchant, the consignee (as they call it) of the coasting vessel that had picked me up. He speaks English as well or better than I do; and he has treated me with a kindness which I can find no words to praise. When he was a young man he was in England himself, learning business, and he says he has remembrances of our country which make his heart warm toward an Englishman. He has fitted me out with clothes, and has lent me the money to travel with as soon as the doctor allows me to start for home. Supposing I don't get a relapse, I shall be fit to travel in a week's time from this. If I can catch the mail at Trieste, and stand the fatigue, I shall be back again at Thorpe-Ambrose in a week or ten days at most after you get my letter. You will agree with me that it is a terribly long letter. But I can't help that. I seem to have lost my old knack at putting things short, and finishing on the first page. However, I am near the end now—for I have nothing left to mention but the reason why I write about what has happened to me, instead of waiting till I get home, and telling it all by word of mouth.

"I fancy my head is still muddled by my illness. At any rate, it only struck me this morning that there is barely a chance of some vessel having passed the place where the yacht foundered, and having picked up the furniture and things wrenched out of her and left to float. Some false report of my being drowned may, in that case, have reached England. If this has happened (which I hope to God may be an unfounded fear on my part), go directly to Major Milroy at the cottage. Show him this letter—I have written it quite as much for his eye as for yours—and then give him the inclosed note, and ask him if he doesn't think the circumstances justify me in hoping he will send it to Miss Milroy. I can't explain why I don't write directly to the major or to Miss Milroy instead of to you. I can only say there are considerations I am bound in honor to respect, which oblige me to act in this roundabout way.

"I don't ask you to answer this—for I shall be on my way home, I hope, long before your letter could reach me in this out-of-the-way place. Whatever you do don't lose a moment in going to Major Milroy. Go, on second thoughts, whether the loss of the yacht is known in England or not. Yours truly,

"ALLAN ARMADALE."

"I looked up when I had come to the end of the letter, and saw, for the first time, that Bashwood had left his chair, and had placed himself opposite to me. His eyes were fixed on my face, with the eager inquiring expression of a man who was trying to read my thoughts. His eyes fell guiltily when they met mine, and he shrank away to his chair. Believing, as he did, that I was really married to Armadale, was he trying to discover whether the news of Armadale's rescue from the sea was good news or bad news in my estimation? It was no time then for entering into explanations with him. The first thing to be done was to communicate instantly with the doctor. I called Bashwood back to me, and gave him my hand.

"You have done me a service," I said, "which makes us closer friends than ever. I shall say more about this, and about other matters of some interest to both of us, later in the day. I want you now to lend me Mr. Armadale's letter (which I promise to bring back) and to wait here till I return. Will you do that for me, Mr. Bashwood?"

"He would do any thing I asked him, he said. I went into the bedroom, and put on my bonnet and shawl.

"Let me be quite sure of the facts before I leave you," I resumed, when I was ready to go out. "You have not shown this letter to any body but me?"

"Not a living soul has seen it but our two selves."

"What have you done with the note inclosed to Miss Milroy?"

"He produced it from his pocket. I ran it over rapidly—saw that there was nothing in it of the slightest importance—and put it in the fire on the spot. That done, I left Bashwood in the sitting-room, and went to the Sanatorium with Armadale's letter in my hand.

"The doctor had gone out; and the servant was unable to say positively at what time he would be back. I went into his study, and wrote a line preparing him for the news I had brought with me, which I sealed up, with Armadale's letter, in an envelope, to await his return. That done, I told the servant I would call again in an hour, and left the place.

"It was useless to go back to my lodgings and speak to Bashwood until I knew first what the doctor meant to do. I walked about the neighborhood, up and down new streets and crescents and squares, with a kind of dull, numbed feeling in me, which prevented not only all voluntary exercise of thought but all sensation of bodily fatigue. I remembered the same feeling overpowering me, years ago, on the morning when the people of the prison came to take me into court to be tried for my life. All that frightful scene came back again to my mind, in the strangest manner, as if it had been a scene in which some other person had figured. Once or twice I wondered, in a livery, senseless way, why they had not hanged me!

"When I went back to the Sanatorium I was informed that the doctor had returned half an hour since, and that he was in his own room anxiously waiting to see me.

"I went into the study, and found him sitting close by the fire, with his head down and his hands on his knees. On the table near him, besides Armadale's letter and my note, I saw, in the little circle of light thrown by the reading lamp, an open railway guide. Was he meditating flight? It was impossible to tell from his face, when he looked up at me, what he was meditating, or how the shock had struck him when he first discovered that Armadale was a living man.

"Take a seat near the fire," he said. "It's very raw and cold to-day."

"I took a chair in silence. In silence, on his side, the doctor sat rubbing his knees before the fire.

"Have you nothing to say to me?" I asked.

"He rose, and suddenly removed the shade from the reading-lamp, so that the light fell on my face.

"You are not looking well," he said. "What's the matter?"

"My head feels dull, and my eyes are heavy and hot," I replied. "The weather, I suppose."

"It was strange how we both got farther and farther from the one vitally important subject which we had both come together to discuss!

"I think a cup of tea would do you good," remarked the doctor.

"I accepted his suggestion, and he ordered the tea. While it was coming he walked up and down the room, and I sat by the fire—and not a word passed between us on either side.

"The tea revived me; and the doctor noticed a change for the better in my face. He sat down opposite to me at the table and spoke out at last.

"If I had ten thousand pounds at this moment," he began, "I would give the whole of it never to have compromised myself in your desperate speculations on Mr. Armadale's death!"

"He said these words with an abruptness, almost with a violence, which was strangely uncharacteristic of his ordinary manner. Was he frightened himself, or was he trying to frighten me? I determined to make him explain himself at the outset, so far as I was concerned. 'Wait a moment, doctor,' I said. 'Do you hold me responsible for what has happened?'

"'Certainly not,' he replied, stiffly. 'Neither you nor any body could have foreseen what has happened. When I say I would give ten thousand pounds to be out of this business I am blaming nobody but myself. And when I tell you next that I, for one, won't allow Mr. Armadale's resurrection from the sea to be the ruin of me without a fight for it, I tell you, my dear madam, one of the plainest truths I ever told to man or woman in the whole course of my life. Don't suppose I am invidiously separating my interests from yours in the common danger that now threatens us both. I simply indicate the difference in the risk that we have respectively run. You have not sunk the whole of your resources in establishing a Sanatorium; and you have not made a false declaration before a magistrate, which is punishable as perjury by the law.'

"I interrupted him again. His selfishness did me more good than his tea—it roused my temper effectually. 'Suppose we let your risk and my risk alone, and come to the point,' I said. 'What do you mean by making a fight for it? I see a railway guide on your table. Does making a fight for it mean—running away?'

"'Running away?' repeated the doctor. 'You appear to forget that every farthing I have in the world is embarked in this establishment.'

"'You stop here then?' I said.

"'Unquestionably!'

"'And what do you mean to do when Mr. Armadale comes to England?'

"A solitary fly, the last of his race whom the winter had spared, was buzzing feebly about the doctor's face. He caught it before he answered me, and held it out across the table in his closed hand.

"'If this fly's name was Armadale,' he said, 'and if you had got him as I have got him now, what would you do?'

"His eyes, fixed on my face up to this time, turned significantly, as he ended his question, to my widow's dress. I, too, looked at it when he looked. A thrill of the old deadly hatred and the old deadly determination ran through me again.

"'I should kill him,' I said.

"The doctor started to his feet (with the fly still in his hand) and looked at me—a little too theatrically—with an expression of the utmost horror.

"'Kill him!' repeated the doctor, in a paroxysm of virtuous alarm. 'Violence—murderous violence—in My Sanatorium! You take my breath away!'

"I caught his eye while he was expressing himself in this elaborately indignant manner, scrutinizing me with a searching curiosity which was, to say the least of it, a little at variance with the vehemence of his language and the warmth of his tone. He laughed uneasily when our eyes met, and recovered his smooth confidential manner in that instant that elapsed before he spoke again.

"'I beg a thousand pardons,' he said. 'I ought to have known better than to take a lady too literally at her word. Permit me to remind you, however, that the circumstances are too serious for any thing in the nature of—let us say, an exaggeration or a joke. You shall hear what I propose without further preface.' He paused, and resumed his figurative use of the fly imprisoned in his hand. 'Here is Mr. Armadale. I can let him out or keep him in, just as I please—and he knows it. I say to him,' continued the doctor, facetiously addressing the fly, 'Give me proper security, Mr. Armadale, that no proceedings of any sort shall be taken against either this lady or myself, and I will let you out of the hollow of my hand. Refuse—and be the risk what it may, I will keep you in.' Can you doubt, my dear madam, what Mr. Armadale's answer is, sooner or later, certain to be? Can you doubt,' said the doctor, suiting the action to the word and letting the fly go, 'that it will end to the entire satisfaction of all parties in this way?'

"'I won't say at present,' I answered, 'whether I doubt or not. Let me make sure that I understand you first. You propose, if I am not mistaken, to shut the doors of this place on Mr. Armadale, and not to let him out again until he has agreed to the terms which it is our interest to impose on him? May I ask, in that case, how you mean to make him walk into the trap that you have set for him here?'

"'I propose,' said the doctor, with his hand on the railway guide, 'ascertaining first, at what time during every evening of this month the tidal trains from Dover and Folkestone reach the London Bridge terminus. And I propose next posting a person whom Mr. Armadale knows, and whom you and I can trust, to wait the arrival of the trains, and to meet our man at the moment when he steps out of the railway carriage.'

"'Have you thought,' I inquired, 'of who the person is to be?'

"'I have thought,' said the doctor, taking up Armadale's letter, 'of the person to whom this letter is addressed.'

"The answer startled me. Was it possible that he and Bashwood knew one another? I put the question immediately.

"'Until to-day I never so much as heard of the gentleman's name,' said the doctor. 'I have simply pursued the inductive process of reasoning, for which we are indebted to the immortal Bacon. How does this very important letter come into your possession? I can't insult you by supposing it to have been stolen. Consequently it has come to you with the leave and license of the person to whom it is addressed. Consequently that person is in your confidence. Consequently he is the first person I think of. You see the process? Very good. Permit me a question or two, on the subject of Mr. Bashwood, before we go on any further.'

"The doctor's questions went as straight to the point as usual. My answers informed him that Mr. Bashwood stood toward Armadale in the relation of steward—that he had received the letter at Thorpe-Ambrose that morning, and had brought it straight to me by the first train—that he had not shown it or spoken of it before leaving to Major Milroy or to any one else—and that I had not obtained this service at his hands by trusting him with my secret—that I had communicated with him in the character of Armadale's widow—that he had suppressed the letter, under these circumstances, solely in obedience to a general caution I had given him to keep his own counsel if any thing strange happened at Thorpe-Ambrose until he had first consulted me—and lastly, that the reason why he had done as I told him in this matter was, that in this matter, and in all others, Mr. Bashwood was blindly devoted to my interests.

"At this point in the interrogatory the doctor's eyes began to look at me distrustfully behind the doctor's spectacles.

"What is the secret of this blind devotion of Mr. Bashwood's to your interests?' he asked.

"I hesitated for a moment—in pity to Bashwood, not in pity to myself. 'If you must know,' I answered, 'Mr. Bashwood is in love with me.'

"Ay! ay!" exclaimed the doctor, with an air of relief. 'I begin to understand now. Is he a young man?'

"He is an old man.'

"The doctor laid himself back in his chair and chuckled softly. 'Better and better,' he said. 'Here is the very man we want. Who so fit as Mr. Armadale's steward to meet Mr. Armadale on his return to London? And who so capable of influencing Mr. Bashwood in the proper way as the charming object of Mr. Bashwood's admiration?'

"There could be no doubt that Bashwood was the man to serve the doctor's purpose, and that my influence was to be trusted to make him serve it. The difficulty was not here—the difficulty was in the unanswered question that I had put to the doctor a minute since. I put it to him again.

"Suppose Mr. Armadale's steward meets his employer at the terminus,' I said. 'May I ask once more how Mr. Armadale is to be persuaded to come here?'

"Don't think me ungallant,' rejoined the doctor, in his gentlest manner, 'if I ask, on my side, how are men persuaded to do nine-tenths of the foolish acts of their lives? They are persuaded by your charming sex. The weak side of every man is the woman's side of him. We have only to discover the woman's side of Mr. Armadale—to tickle him on it gently—and to lead him our way with a silken string. I observe here,' pursued the doctor, opening Armadale's letter, 'a reference to a certain young lady, which looks promising. Where is the note that Mr. Armadale speaks of as addressed to Miss Milroy?'

"Instead of answering him I started, in a sudden burst of excitement, to my feet. The instant he mentioned Miss Milroy's name all that I had heard from Bashwood of her illness and of the cause of it rushed back into my memory. I saw the means of decoying Armadale into the Sanatorium as plainly as I saw the doctor on the other side of the table, wondering at the extraordinary change in me. What a luxury it was to make Miss Milroy serve my interests at last!

"Never mind the note,' I said. 'It's burnt, for fear of accidents. I can tell you all (and more) than the note could have told you. Miss Milroy cuts the knot! Miss Milroy ends the difficulty! She is privately engaged to him. She has heard the false report of his death, and she has been seriously ill at Thorpe-Ambrose ever since. When Bashwood meets him at the station the very first question he is certain to ask—'

"I see!' exclaimed the doctor, anticipating me. 'Mr. Bashwood has nothing to do but to help the truth with a touch of fiction. When he tells his master that the false report has reached Miss Milroy he has only to add that the shock has affected her head, and that she is here under medical care. Perfect! perfect! We shall have him at the Sanatorium as fast as the fastest cab-horse in London can bring him to us. And mind! no risk—no necessity for trusting other people. This is not a mad-house; this is not a Licensed Establishment—no doctors' certificates are necessary here! My dear lady, I congratulate you; I congratulate myself. Permit me to hand you the railway guide, with my best compliments to Mr. Bashwood, and with the page turned down for him, as an additional attention, at the right place.'

"Remembering how long I had kept Bashwood waiting for me I took the book at once, and wished the doctor good-evening without further ceremony. As he politely opened the door for me he reverted, without the slightest necessity for doing so, and without a word from me to lead to it, to the outburst of virtuous alarm which had escaped him at the earlier part of our interview.

"I do hope,' he said, 'that you will kindly forget and forgive my extraordinary want of tact and perception when—in short, when I caught the fly. I positively blush at my own stupidity in putting a literal interpretation on a lady's little joke! Violence in My Sanatorium!' exclaimed the doctor, with his eyes once more fixed attentively on my face; 'violence in this enlightened nineteenth century! Was there ever any thing so ridiculous? Do fasten your cloak before you go out—it is so cold and raw! Shall I escort you? Shall I send my servant? Ah! you were always independent—always, if I may say so, a host in yourself! May I call to-morrow morning and hear what you have settled with Mr. Bashwood?"

"I said yes, and got away from him at last. In a quarter of an hour more I was back at my lodgings, and was informed by the servant that 'the elderly gentleman' was still waiting for me.

"I have not got the heart or the patience—I hardly know which—to waste many words on what passed between me and Bashwood. It was so easy, so degradingly easy, to pull the strings of the poor old puppet in any way I pleased! I met none of the difficulties which I should have been obliged to meet in the case of a younger man, or of a man less infatuated with admiration for me. I left the allusions to Miss Milroy in Armadale's letter, which had naturally puzzled him, to be explained at a future time. I never even troubled myself to invent a plausible reason for wishing him to meet Armadale at the terminus, and to entrap him by a stratagem into the doctor's Sanatorium. All that I found it necessary to do was to refer him to what I had written, in the first place, and to what I had afterward said to him when he came to answer my letter personally at the hotel.

"'You know already, Mr. Bashwood,' I said, 'that my marriage has not been a happy one. Draw your own conclusions from that, and don't press me to tell you whether the news of Mr. Armadale's rescue from the sea is or is not the welcome news that it ought to be to his wife!' That was enough to put his withered old face in a glow, and to set his withered old hopes growing again. I had only to add: 'If you will do what I ask you to do, no matter how incomprehensible and how mysterious my request may seem to be; and if you will accept my assurances that you shall run no risk yourself, and that you shall have the proper explanations at the proper time, you will have such a claim on my gratitude and my regard as no man living has ever had yet!' I had only to say these words, and to point them by a look and a stolen pressure of his hand, and I had him at my feet, blindly eager to obey me. If he could have seen what I thought of myself—but that doesn't matter: he saw nothing.

"Hours have passed since I sent him away (pledged to secrecy, possessed of his instructions, and provided with his time-table) to the hotel near the terminus, at which he is to stay till Armadale appears on the railway platform. The excitement of the earlier part of the evening has all worn off, and the dull, numbed sensation has got me again. Are my energies wearing out, I wonder, just at the time when I most want them? Or is some foreshadowing of disaster creeping over me which I don't yet understand?

"I might be in a humor to sit here for some time longer, thinking thoughts like these, and letting them find their way into words at their own will and pleasure—if my Diary would only let me. But my idle pen has been busy enough to make its way to the end of the volume. I have reached the last morsel of space left on the last page; and whether I like it or not, I must close the book this time for good and all when I close it to-night.

"Good-by, my old friend and companion of many a miserable day! Having nothing else to be fond of, I half suspect myself of having been unreasonably fond of you.

"What a fool I am!"

THE END OF THE FIFTH BOOK.

BOOK THE LAST.

CHAPTER I.

AT THE STATION.

On the night of the second of December Mr. Bashwood took up his post of observation at the terminus of the South Eastern Railway for the first time. It was an earlier date, by six days, than the date which Allan had himself fixed for his return. But the doctor, taking counsel of his medical experience, had considered it just probable that "Mr. Armadale might be perverse enough, at his enviable age, to recover sooner than his medical advisers might have anticipated." For caution's sake, therefore, Mr. Bashwood was instructed to begin watching the arrival of the tidal trains on the day after he had received his employer's letter.

From the second to the seventh of December the steward waited punctually on the platform, saw the trains come in, and satisfied himself, evening after evening, that the travelers were all strangers to him. From the second to the seventh of December Miss Gwilt (to return to the name under which she is best known in these pages) received his daily report, sometimes delivered personally, sometimes sent by letter. The doctor, to whom the reports were communicated, received them in his turn with unabated confidence in the precautions that had been adopted up to the morning of the eighth. On that date the irritation of continued suspense had produced a change for the worse in Miss Gwilt's variable temper, which was perceptible to every one about her, and which, strangely enough, was reflected by an equally marked change in the doctor's manner when he came to pay his usual visit. By a coincidence so remarkable that his enemies might have suspected it of not being a coincidence at all, the morning on which Miss Gwilt lost her patience proved to be also the morning on which the doctor lost his confidence for the first time.

"No news, of course," he said, sitting down with a heavy sigh. "Well! well!"

Miss Gwilt looked up at him irritably from her work.

"You seem strangely depressed this morning," she said. "What are you afraid of now?"

"The imputation of being afraid, madam," answered the doctor, solemnly, "is not an imputation to cast rashly on any man—even when he belongs to such an essentially peaceful profession as mine. I am not afraid. I am (as you more correctly put it in the first instance) strangely depressed. My nature is, as you know, naturally sanguine, and I only see to-day what, but for my habitual hopefulness, I might have seen, and ought to have seen, a week since."

Miss Gwilt impatiently threw down her work. "If words cost money," she said, "the luxury of talking, doctor, would be rather an expensive luxury in your case!"

"Which I might have seen, and ought to have seen," pursued the doctor, without taking the slightest notice of the interruption, "a week since. To put it plainly, I feel by no means so certain as I did that Mr. Armadale will consent without a struggle to the terms which it is my interest (and in a minor degree yours) to impose on him. Observe! I don't question our entrapping him successfully into the Sanatorium—I only doubt whether he will prove quite as manageable as I originally anticipated when we have got him there. Say," remarked the doctor, raising his eyes for the first time, and fixing them in steady inquiry on Miss Gwilt; "say that he is bold, obstinate, what you please; and that he holds out—holds out for weeks together, for months together, as men in similar situations to his have held out before him. What follows? The risk of keeping him forcibly in concealment—of suppressing him, if I may so express myself—increases at compound interest, and becomes Enormous! My house is, at this moment, virtually ready for patients. Patients may present themselves in a week's time. Patients may communicate with Mr. Armadale, or Mr. Armadale may communicate with patients. A note may be smuggled out of the house and may reach the Commissioners in Lunacy. Even in the case of an unlicensed establishment like mine, those gentlemen—no! those chartered despots in a land of liberty—have only to apply to the Lord Chancellor for an order and to enter (by Heavens, to enter My Sanatorium!) and search it from top to bottom at a moment's notice! I don't wish to despond; I don't wish to alarm you; I don't pretend to say that the means we are taking to secure our own safety are any other than the best means at our disposal. All I ask you to do is to imagine the Commissioners in the house—and then to conceive the consequences. The consequences!" repeated the doctor, getting sternly on his feet, and taking up his hat as if he meant to leave the house.

"Have you any thing more to say?" asked Miss Gwilt.

"Have you any remarks," rejoined the doctor, "to offer on your side?"

He stood hat in hand, waiting. For a full minute the two looked at each other in silence.

Miss Gwilt spoke first.

"I think I understand you," she said, suddenly recovering her composure.

"I beg your pardon," returned the doctor, with his hand to his ear. "What did you say?"

"Nothing!"

"Nothing?"

"If you happened to catch another fly this morning," said Miss Gwilt, with a bitterly sarcastic emphasis on the words, "I might be capable of shocking you by another 'little joke.'"

The doctor held up both hands, in polite depreciation, and looked as if he was beginning to recover his good-humor again.

"Hard," he murmured gently, "not to have forgiven me that unlucky blunder of mine even yet!"

"What else have you to say? I am waiting for you," said Miss Gwilt. She turned her chair to the window, scornfully, and took up her work again as she spoke.

The doctor came behind her and put his hand on the back of her chair.

"I have a question to ask, in the first place," he said; "and a measure of necessary precaution to suggest in the second. If you will honor me with your attention I will put the question first."

"I am listening."

"You know that Mr. Armadale is alive," pursued the doctor; "and you know that he is coming back to England. Why do you continue to wear your widow's dress?"

She answered him without an instant's hesitation, steadily going on with her work.

"Because I am of a sanguine disposition, like you," she said. "I mean to trust to the chapter of accidents to the very last. Mr. Armadale may die yet on his way home."

"And suppose he gets home alive—what then?"

"Then there is another chance still left."

"What is it, pray?"

"He may die in your Sanatorium."

"Madam!" remarked the doctor, in the deep bass which he reserved for his outbursts of virtuous indignation. "Stop! you spoke of the chapter of accidents," he resumed, gliding back into his softer conversational tones. "Yes! yes! of course. I understand you this time. Even the healing art is at the mercy of accidents—even My Sanatorium, otherwise the Fortress of Health, is liable at any day to be surprised by Death. Just so! just so!" said the doctor, conceding the questions with the utmost impartiality. "There is the chapter of accidents, I admit—if you choose to trust to it. Mind! I say emphatically, if you choose to trust to it."

There was another moment of silence—silence so profound that nothing was audible in the room but the rapid click of Miss Gwilt's needle through her work.

"Go on," she said; "you haven't done yet."

"True!" said the doctor. "Having put my question, I have my measure of precaution to impress on you next. You will see, my dear madam, that I am not disposed to trust to the chapter of accidents on my side. Reflection has convinced me that you and I are not (locally speaking) so conveniently situated as we might be, in case of emergency. Cabs are, as yet, rare in this rapidly-improving neighborhood. I am a quarter of an hour's walk from you; you are a quarter of an hour's walk from me. I know nothing of Mr. Armadale's character; you know it well. It might be necessary—vitally necessary—to appeal to your superior knowledge of him at a moment's notice. And how am I to do that unless we are within easy reach of each other, under the same roof? For both our interests, I beg to invite you, my dear madam, to become for a limited period an inmate of My Sanatorium."

Miss Gwilt's rapid needle suddenly stopped. "I understand you," she said again, as quietly as before.

"I beg your pardon," said the doctor, with another attack of deafness, and with his hand once more at his ear.

She laughed to herself—a low, terrible laugh, which startled even the doctor into taking his hand off the back of her chair.

"An inmate of your Sanatorium?" she repeated. "You consult appearances in every thing else—do you propose to consult appearances in receiving me into your house?"

"Most assuredly!" replied the doctor, with enthusiasm. "I am surprised at your asking me the question! Did you ever know a man of the highest eminence in my profession who set appearances at defiance? If you honor me by accepting my invitation, you enter My Sanatorium—"

"In what character?"

"In the most unimpeachable of all possible characters," replied the doctor. "In the character of—a Patient."

"When do you want my answer?"

"Can you decide to-day?"

"No."

"To-morrow?"

"Yes. Have you any thing more left to say?"

"Nothing more."

"Leave me then. I don't keep up appearances. I wish to be alone—and I say so. Good-morning."

"Oh, the sex! the sex!" said the doctor, with his excellent temper in perfect working order again. "So delightfully impulsive! so charmingly reckless of what they say, or how they say it! 'Oh, woman, in our hours of ease, coy, diffident, and hard to please!' There! there! there! Good-morning!"

Miss Gwilt rose and looked after him from the window, when the street-door had closed and he had left the house.

"Armadale himself drove me to it the first time," she said. "Manuel drove me to it the second time.—You cowardly scoundrel! shall I let you drive me to it for the third time and the last?"

She turned from the window and looked thoughtfully at her widow's dress in the glass.

The hours of the day passed—and she decided nothing. The night came—and she hesitated still. The new morning dawned—and the terrible question was still unanswered, Yes or No.

By the early post there came a letter for her. It was Mr. Bashwood's usual report. Again he had watched for Allan's arrival, and again in vain.

"I'll have more time!" she said to herself, passionately. "No man alive shall hurry me faster than I like!"

At breakfast that morning (the morning of the ninth) the doctor was surprised in his study at the Sanatorium by a visit from Miss Gwilt.

"I want another day," she said, the moment the servant had closed the door on her.

The doctor looked at her before he answered, and saw the danger of driving her to extremities plainly expressed in her face.

"The time is getting on," he remonstrated, in his most persuasive manner. "For all we know to the contrary, Mr. Armadale may be here to-night."

"I want another day!" she repeated, loudly and passionately.

"Granted!" said the doctor, looking nervously toward the door. "Don't be too loud—the servants may hear you. Mind!" he added, "I depend on your honor not to press me for any further delay."

"You had better depend on my despair," she said—and left him.

The doctor chipped the shell of his egg, and laughed softly.

"Quite right, my dear!" he said. "I remember where your despair led you in past times; and I think I may trust it to lead you the same way now."

At a quarter to eight that night Mr. Bashwood took up his post of observation, as usual, on the platform of the terminus at London Bridge.

He was in the highest good spirits; he smiled and smirked in irrepressible exultation. The sense that he held in reserve a means of influence over Miss Gwilt, in virtue of his knowledge of her past career, had had no share in effecting the transformation that now appeared in him. It had upheld him in his forlorn life at Thorpe-Ambrose, and it had given him that increased confidence of manner which Miss Gwilt herself had noticed; but it had vanished as a motive power in him from the moment that had restored him to Miss Gwilt's favor—it had vanished, annihilated by the electric shock of her touch and her look. His vanity—the vanity which in men at his age is only despair in disguise—had now lifted him to the seventh heaven of fatuous happiness once more. He believed in her again as he believed in the smart, new winter over-coat that he wore—as he believed in the dainty little cane (appropriate to the dawning dandyism of lads in their teens) that he flourished in his hand. He hummed—the worn-out old creature who had not sung since his childhood—hummed, as he paced the platform, the few fragments he could remember of a worn-out old song.

The train was due as early as eight o'clock that night. At five minutes past the hour the whistle sounded. In less than five minutes more the passengers were getting out on the platform.

Following the instructions that had been given to him, Mr. Bashwood made his way as well as the crowd would let him along the line of carriages; and discovering no familiar face on that first investigation, joined the passengers for a second search among them in the custom-house waiting-room next.

He had looked round the room, and had satisfied himself that the persons occupying it were all strangers, when he heard a voice behind him, exclaiming, "Can that be Mr. Bashwood!"

He turned in eager expectation, and found himself face to face with the last man under heaven whom he had expected to see.

The man was—MIDWINTER!

THE FALL OF RICHMOND.

NOTWITHSTANDING the current representations as to the privations and hardships of the denizens of the Confederate capital, life in Richmond during the war was not altogether one of discomforts. As to material wants, almost every thing for their supply, not only as to necessities but luxuries, could be had, if one only had the money, and fortunately Confederate notes were almost as abundant as "leaves in Vallambrosa." True, the war rested like a heavy incubus upon the heart; but even that in time we became used to; and there never was the terror and apprehension for the safety of the city which outsiders probably supposed. General Lee and his army were between us and danger; and that was enough to quiet all fears. So that we could hear the thunder of battle so near that it seemed almost in the city, and still move on in our usual occupations without much uneasiness as to how it would terminate.

Indeed there was even an amount of gayety which seemed altogether untimely. Expensive parties, balls, private theatricals, and other amusements abounded. Richmond never was gayer than during the winter of 1864-65; so much so, indeed, that the clergymen of the various denominations felt called upon to remonstrate from the pulpit; while the more religious portion of the population were stimulated, by way of counteracting the evil tendencies and of averting the judgments of Heaven, to be still more attentive on the daily prayer meetings, which often filled the largest churches, and seemed characterized by great devoutness and fervor.

The spring of 1865 found things much in this condition. One day, not long before the Confederate Congress adjourned, I happened to cast my eye toward the Capitol building, and saw that the flag raised to indicate that they were in session had by mistake been put up that day bottom upward, and was in fact "Union down," the signal of distress. Superstitious minds might have read in this apparent omen the coming doom of the Confederacy; but few, if any, took that view.

Occasionally expressions were heard from individuals indicative that their confidence and hope were failing them. One very intelligent and well known gentleman so entirely lost heart that it became a matter of common remark and somewhat of merriment. But the most discouraging person I encountered was a member of the State Legislature of high standing, who had evidently "given up." Meeting with him at a friend's one evening, his conversation was almost entirely on that subject. Among other things he stated, substantially, that General Lee had been before a Committee of the Senate, I think the previous November, and had stated that he could hold out if he could be reinforced with some twenty thousand fresh troops; that in February—three months after—before that or a similar committee, General Lee had stated that if he had fifty thousand reinforcements he could maintain his ground; but that he had neither received the fifty thousand nor the twenty thousand, but had lost by sickness and desertion; so that the inference was irresistible that he could not hold his ground. Such statements were discouraging; but perhaps the impression made on most of the auditors was simply that that man was no longer loyal to the cause.

Rumors had, it is true, been coming from the army that the men were losing heart; that patient and enduring as they had shown themselves, there was a limit even to their powers; that they could not suffer on, and starve on, and fight on, year after year interminably, and that, too, without the prospect of any increment of fresh material to meet the constantly accumulating and overwhelming forces they were called to confront. There was, indeed, but too much truth and force in what they said; and one could not help feeling that such a struggle could not be protracted very much longer—especially, too, in view of the constantly increasing scarcity of food, and the equally alarming failure of the facilities of transportation. Still, we had been enabled to hold out so far against what might have been regarded as impossibilities; and we hoped it might continue to be so.

The first Sabbath in April, 1865, dawned upon us in this state of things. It was a bright, pleasant day. The churches were full—as they generally were—and the ministers gave their people such truth as they considered most appropriate. At the church which I attended the text and sermon seemed almost prophetic. The words of Scripture were, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter;" and the object of the discourse was to render the hearers resigned and contented under even the most mysterious and unwelcome allotments of Providence.

The sermon over, the congregation joined in the Doxology to Old Hundred, accompanied by the grand notes of the organ, and then reverently dispersed. That was the last service ever to be held there under the Confederate Government. As I was passing out through the vestibule two friends came up, and said they wondered what could be going on; that there must be something of unusual importance; that the President and some of the other high functionaries had been sent for out of church; and that there was evidently some exciting news.

On leaving the church-door I saw a bank officer meet another one for whom he appeared to have been in search, and as I passed them I heard a few words indicative of trouble. Just then espying a young man whose connection with the Government ought to make him acquainted with any important intelligence, I asked him what it was that was producing such a ferment. He replied that he was not at liberty to communicate what he knew, but that there had been terrible fighting near Petersburg.

"Favorable or unfavorable?"

"So far as we have heard not favorable." Then, in a subdued voice, he added, "I'll tell you that I shouldn't be surprised if we are all away from here before twenty-four hours."

This was news indeed! No wonder the President hurried out of church, and no wonder bank officers held solemn council.

Returning to the house of the friends with whom I was sojourning, and believing that there need be and could be no longer any secrecy about such events, I mentioned at the dinner-table what had been told me. The ladies were greatly agitated and distressed—apprehending violence from the dreaded "Yankees," and also lamenting the separation which the withdrawal of the Confederate army would make between them and their young relatives who were in it. In a moment the deep pall of uncertainty and gloom was cast over every thing. What scenes that day or the next would disclose, who could tell?

Before we had arisen from dinner one of the young gentlemen of the family connected with a government bureau came in, with a countenance indicative of serious work, asking that his trunk might be gotten, and adding that they were to be off at six o'clock that evening—that the city was to be evacuated! This was the signal for every one of our little company to be on the move to save what he could. Silverware was quickly collected for hiding; watches were gathered up to be sent away; spoons and forks likewise; and every preparation, practicable in the short time and amidst the excitement and confusion, made for the speedily anticipated pillage.

In the course of the afternoon a relative of the writer came over from Petersburg, bringing us the first definite news of the breaking of the Confederate lines, and the disaster General Lee's army had experienced. Of the full extent of it, however, he was not aware. From his telling us that the tobacco warehouses had been burned to prevent the tobacco from falling into the Federal hands, we knew that Petersburg was gone.

About nine o'clock in the evening, the young man already referred to not having got off as soon as he had expected, came in and told my relative, who was anxious to get to his family up the country, that his only chance was to go to the dépôt immediately, that the last Confederate trains would leave in the course of the night, and that to-morrow all intercourse would be cut off. Being better acquainted than my friend, and knowing he would encounter difficulties, I went with him to the dépôt. Arrived there, we encountered a file of soldiers obstructing the entrance, and the officer in command positively refusing admittance to any one who had not a pass from the Secretary of War. But that condition was an impossibility. Finding the Secretary of War, under such circumstances, would indeed be "like hunting a needle in a hay-stack." There was no other way, therefore, than just to stand our ground, hoping that something might "turn up." Numerous were the arrivals while we stood there, multitudinous the applications, appeals, and remonstrances, but all to no purpose. The man of the "stars" was inexorable.

In the course of an hour or two one of the trains moved off. "There goes the President and his Cabinet." And sure enough they were gone; and that was the last of the Confederate Government in its capital. The Argus-eyed sentinels must have a little relaxed their vigilance after this, for my friend, who had been on a reconnoissance, soon came back with the report that he had found a place where we could flank the guards and get into the dépôt. This we accomplished. But here a new difficulty had to be encountered. We could find no admittance into the cars. There were numerous trains—all, I believe, rough box cars—waiting their turn to go. One after another of them we applied to, but in vain. One was the Treasury Department, another the Quarter-Master's Department, another the Telegraph Department, and so on. Most of them contained ladies as well as gentlemen. "Can't we get in here?" "No! Impossible! we're crowded to suffocation." Passing on to another: "Won't you just let one gentleman in here? His home and family are up the country, and he is anxious to get to them." "No, no! we're too full already. This car is marked for 14,500 pounds, and we have 18,000 in it now. We'll break down before we get five miles."

We were about giving up in despair, when there hove in sight a man with a lantern, escorting two gentlemen, whom he evidently intended to put into one of the cars. "Now," said I to my friend, "be on the alert, and when he pushes those two up I'll push you immediately following, as if one of the party." We did so, and succeeded. They found out the ruse, it is true, and I heard them berating my friend as an intruder; but having the "nine points of the law," he held his ground. Many a day elapsed before I heard what became of him; but I had the satisfaction of seeing him safely out of Richmond, for I stood there until his train was gone, and indeed until all were gone. One after another they rolled off; the guards dispersed; and the dépôt was forsaken and desolate, never more to be visited by Confederates.

Some were very slow to realize what was going on. While engaged in our efforts to get a place in the cars a clerical friend came up, and, recognizing us in the dark, asked if there was any chance of getting away. He said that he had been preaching down on the lines some six or seven miles below the city, and that in the afternoon the colonel of the regiment where he was advised him that he had better go up to Richmond. This, however, our friend not wishing to do, and finding that the colonel seemed to be getting his command ready to move, he thought he would go over to another point on the lines and spend the night there. But on arriving there he found that they also were going to Richmond. As he now had no place to stay, he concluded, though reluctantly, to go along. As they advanced the numbers tending that way thickened, but still for some time he did not see the true state of the case, and it was not until he was half-way to Richmond that the unwelcome truth at last flashed upon him. He was under the influence of this fresh discovery when he encountered us in the dépôt—his mental perturbations by no means allayed by the struggle to get off, and particularly by the fact that when I pushed him up into the same car into which I had thrust my relative they repelled him; so that when I last saw him he was in a most disconsolate and hopeless condition. But he must have got off after all, as I heard of him afterward in North Carolina.

During our long tarrying at the dépôt one of the batteries from below—the last, it was said—came up, carrying torches and cheering, I suppose to keep their spirits up. They moved off over the bridge, thus completing the departure of the entire army from our side of the river, and thus completing also the abandonment of the capital of the Southern Confederacy.

The curtain had now fallen on one act of the stupendous drama; it was soon to rise on what, in its opening at least, would prove even more striking and impressive. But the interval between the two acts was one of painful suspense. The Government and army which for years had guarded and protected us was gone; that other army which had been stretching out its hands in vain to grasp this most coveted prize—that army which had come so near that they could hear our church-bells and we could see the flash and smoke of their guns—that army which had been so repeatedly foiled, and with such sore disappointment and terrible slaughter—that army, probably by this time exasperated and infuriated to the last degree, was to be upon us with the dawn of the coming day, and we helplessly at their mercy. What will be the fate of this beautiful city? what the fate of these hitherto happy homes? what the fate of these noble-hearted and lovely women? The accounts which we had received of the burning and pillage of Columbia were fresh in our minds.

After seeing the last of the Confederate Government I did what not very many in Richmond did that night—went to bed and slept soundly. About half past four o'clock in the morning I was awakened from profound slumbers by a tremendous concussion. But I fell asleep again, and slept until about half an hour longer, when I was aroused by what might almost have awakened the dead. The earth seemed fairly to writhe as if in agony, the house rocked like a ship at sea, while stupendous thunders roared around. This was the blowing up of the Confederate magazine; and this was the opening gun of the august and sublime pageant of that ever-memorable day. Soon after the flames burst out from the tobacco warehouses, set on fire to prevent the tobacco from becoming spoils to the enemy, and proving the cause of the terrific conflagration which ensued. The bridges across the river—one of them the lofty Petersburg Railroad bridge, about a mile long—were speedily long lines of flame; while on the side of the city the devouring element set to work in fearful earnest. The fire had scarcely got fairly under way when the arsenal, containing, it was said, seven hundred and fifty thousand loaded shells, and the dépôts of cartridges and fixed ammunition, with the laboratory and its combustibles, began to explode. This was not instantaneous, but continuous, resembling the cannonading and musketry of a heavy battle, and lasting through most of the day.

Imagine our condition, left by our own army and anticipating the enemy's; the entire business part of the city on fire—stores, warehouses, manufactories, mills (Galligo's the largest in the world), dépôts, and bridges—all, covering acres, one sea of flame, and as an accompaniment the continuous thunder of exploding shells, and in the midst of it that long, threatening, hostile army entering to seize its prey—imagine all this, and you will probably conclude that those who were there will not soon forget that third day of April, 1865, in Richmond.

Our unwelcome visitors were not so quick to avail themselves of the now open door into Richmond as we had anticipated, some hours elapsing before the first of them made their appearance. My host, anxious to get his ship in order for the coming storm, went down to his place of business early in the morning, and returning soon afterward, announced to us that "the Yankees" were in the city, he had seen the first of them pass up Main Street. It would be impossible to convey to any one not of our way of thinking and feeling the impression produced by that piece of intelligence; the disappointment and regret, the realization that all we had been looking and hoping and struggling for through weary years was gone, and that all we had most deprecated had come; that our mortal foe was at last in the fruition of the spoils he had most desired; that the fortunes of war had made him our master, and placed us in the position of a conquered people. Such thoughts, mingled with anxiety as to what was to be our fate, flowed freely through our minds when assured beyond all doubt that "the Yankees" were in the city.

Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to how far it would be safe for a citizen to venture out, I determined to make the experiment, and see what was to be seen. Never expecting and fervently hoping never again to have the opportunity to see a victorious army enter a conquered capital, I was willing to run some risk. Moreover, I wished if possible to save some valuable papers I had down town from what now threatened to be an almost unlimited conflagration.

I found the streets thronged with the black population, but almost absolutely and literally forsaken by the whites. Richmond seemed in a night to have been transformed into an African city. On getting down as far as the Powhatan House, opposite the Capitol, I at length espied one white man, and as he proved to be an old acquaintance I joined him, and we stood together in the piazza looking on at the spectacle. The United States flag was floating from the Capitol—a sight which had not been seen for many a day; but instead of taking the place of the Confederate flag, it was put up, through some mistake, on the opposite end of the building, thus occupying the place of the State flag; and thus, as some facetiously suggested, unintentionally symbolizing the triumph of Federal centralized power over States Rights. The authorities were probably never apprised of the faux pas, inasmuch as the Stars and Stripes were still waving over the old Virginia end of the building when I left, some weeks afterward.

Some of the troops had stacked their arms in the Capitol Square, and were gazing curiously around; others were marching thither through the street before us. The latter attracted much attention from the colored crowds who thronged the sidewalks. I watched with some interest the swarthy spectators, anxious to see how they regarded the advent of those whose coming promised to introduce them to liberty and political equality. A large portion of them—very much the largest, I think—simply looked on, as upon any other novel and remarkable spectacle. Here and there a man waved his hat and huzzaed. The most marked demonstrations were the shaking of hands by those nearest with the passing troops, much of which was done. Some of the women courtesied and bowed at a great rate. One little weazen-faced old woman, her head crowned with a conical turban, seized a soldier's hand in both of hers, and shaking it up and down like a pump-handle, said, "Welcum, masta! you's welcum! Glad to see you, Sah—glad to see you! Thank de Lord, dese hands do no mo' wurk!" A condition of elegant and luxurious repose was the happy consummation to which she congratulated herself this glorious day was to introduce her.

Becoming after a while sufficiently assured to venture beyond our post of observation in the Powhatan piazza, I pushed through the swarthy crowd around into Governor Street, just opposite the Governor's house. Scarcely had I reached this point when the first body of colored cavalry came moving up the hill. Their appearance called forth a greeting from their brethren in the streets. No sooner had the cavalry fairly comprehended by whom they were surrounded than they returned the greeting with a will, rising in their stirrups, waving their flashing sabres, their white eyes and teeth gleaming from rows of dark visages, and rending the air with wild huzzas. Considering that they had been slaves, that they were suddenly released and armed, and that they were now entering our city as conquerors, one could not look upon these men without a shudder at the possible impending horrors.

Passing on down Governor Street I persevered until I reached Main Street. Here the spectacle again was most remarkable. The progress of the fire rendered it certain that the contents of the stores and shops would be destroyed, and hence, possibly, the throngs of negroes set to the work of helping themselves to whatever they liked. Here would come one rolling before him a barrel of flour; here another with a bag of coffee or sugar upon his back; another with a bag full of shoes; another with four or five bolts of cotton cloth on his head; another with a bolt of woollen goods under his arm; a woman with an armful of hoop-skirts; a girl with a box of spool thread—and so on through the crowd. But yesterday these articles—run at great risk and expense through the blockade—were bringing fabulous prices; to-day he who wills may have them for the carrying away. Never in the history of Richmond were the colored population so well stocked with necessities and luxuries.

Continuing to thread my way through the crowd, I reached the point on Main Street for which I was aiming. The papers I was in quest of were in a room on the fourth floor, which had to be reached through a store on the first-floor, a tailor's shop on the second, and so on. Entering the store, whose doors were wide open, I saw no one but a colored man, who was filling a bag with shoes from the shelves, all the while talking to himself, and swearing he would have them. And have them he did, for there was no longer any one there to dispute his right. Ascending to the tailor's shop I found it deserted, and the rolls of cloth for which hundreds of dollars a yard had been asked lying there waiting to be burned up. While getting together my papers the flames burst through the windows opposite, and came lashing half-way across the street. There was no time to lose; and as I emerged from the front-door the heated atmosphere was already most stifling. I cast a farewell look up Main Street. The Dispatch and Enquirer newspaper offices were all in a blaze, the banks and the American Hotel were just catching, and from the doors and windows of some of the fashionable stores volumes of flame were bursting.

Up to this time I do not remember to have seen a fire-engine at work. The young men had left with the evacuating army; the older men, fearing pillage and violence to their families, remained at home to do what they could to protect them; and consequently there was nobody to look after the fire. I myself went to one of the Federals, and told him that unless they went to work to arrest the conflagration the entire city would be swept away. Soon after the military authorities organized the crowds of blacks as a fire corps, and this with their own efforts, and the steam-engines at length brought to play, was instrumental in checking and ultimately stopping the tempest of fire. But all the forenoon, and till well on in the afternoon, flame and smoke and burning brands and showers of blazing sparks filled the air, spreading still further the destruction, until it had swept before it every bank, every auction store, every insurance office, nearly every commission house, and most of the fashionable stores, together with one of the prominent churches, and, as before-mentioned, immense mills, manufactories, foundries, etc. Seldom has a city, in proportion to its population and wealth, suffered so terribly. Sad, indeed, was the spectacle afterward of those acres of ruin, and sadder that of the many worthy citizens from whom the hard earnings of a lifetime had thus been wrested in an hour.

Of all the days of my life that eventful and terrible day seemed the longest. Not having my watch about me, I could not well judge the flight of time. At last, when I thought it must be toward four o'clock in the afternoon, I inquired the time, and found to my astonishment that it was only twelve o'clock. It seemed as if that day would never end.

Very agreeable was the disappointment at the behavior of the victorious army. Whether it was because, notwithstanding all that had occurred, there was still some lingering feeling of respect for the capital of the Old Dominion, or whether the terrific calamity falling upon the city at the moment disarmed all purpose to inflict further injury, we could not tell; but what most concerned us was the fact that, with few exceptions, the troops behaved astonishingly well, and were remarkably courteous and respectful. Some cases of outrage were committed in the suburbs, but every attempt of the sort in the city, of which I heard, was followed by condign punishment.

The days which followed that ever-memorable third of April were eminently days of leisure. Nobody had any thing to do. All business was brought to a sudden stand-still. Few had any money; my own stock amounted to an old-fashioned three-cent piece. Some of us spent most of the time sitting on the front steps talking over the past, the present, and the most uncertain future. When occasionally a friend passed we would call him in, or he would call himself—both parties happy to have some mode of relieving the tedium. As to the Confederacy, we gave that up with the fall of Richmond, thinking that General Lee would probably fall back into the interior, and there, after considerable delay and worrying, make the best terms for peace on the basis of the Union restored. But we did not anticipate so speedy a finality, nor of the sort which occurred. Various rumors reached us from day to day of disasters to the Confederates; but as these all came through our conquerors we gave them small credence.

At length, one night my host informed me that the sentinel near our door had just told him that General Lee had surrendered. Though we did not credit it, it seemed worth inquiring into. On further interrogation we were assured that the news was official; and soon all remaining doubts were dispelled by the salvos of artillery from the Capitol Square saluting the tidings of the surrender of the Southern Army and the downfall of the Southern Confederacy. Such an event was, of course, a crushing disappointment to those who, through years of sacrifice and struggle, had staked their earthly hopes and all upon the success of the cause; but, to their credit be it said, most of them seemed to recognize in the event the voice of God deciding by his providence the great question. Though this decision differed widely from what they had anticipated, they knew that the great Arbiter of all human affairs does all things well, and that it was their duty humbly and cheerfully to acquiesce. The Government to which they had acknowledged allegiance for four years being no more, and that under which they had previously lived being now restored, there was but one course open, and that was to endeavor to prove themselves henceforth good and faithful citizens of the United States.

Time will no doubt wear away the hostile feelings engendered by bloody war, and once more restore to terms of friendly intercourse those who were arrayed in this bitter, deadly strife; but no lapse of time can erase the memories of the fearful scenes which marked the progress of the dreadful drama, and in the history which is to record them for coming generations will stand, as not the least conspicuous, that which has formed the topic of the present sketch—the Fall of Richmond.

MISS LETITIA.

MISS LETITIA put aside the muslin curtains from her window, and looked out. She had just made her toilet for afternoon, and she was, as usual, neat almost to primness. Her sombre gray dress was enlivened by no bits of bright-colored ribbon. It fell without a particle of trimming in soft folds to her feet. Her brown hair was brushed smoothly back from her still, thoughtful face—the face which the quiet dress and plain hair suited so well. There was no thread of silver in the tresses—not a wrinkle in the smooth skin, with its coloring delicate as that of sixteen. Yet, observing Miss Letitia closely, you would not have imagined for a moment that she was younger than the thirty-three years to which the town record of Danby bore witness. There was about her a perfect repose—the look of one who has ceased to expect, and learned not to hope—which I think no face ever wears in youth, unless it be, sometimes, that of an incurable invalid.

Every one called her “Miss Letitia”—the days when she was “Letty” were gone with her lost girlhood. That would never come back to her any more. There were graves in the church-yard on whose white stones were chiseled the names of her father and mother and her one brother. There was a deeper grave in her heart, over which no tombstone gleamed, where the tenderest hope of her life lay sleeping. Miss Letitia was all alone.

But she had grown used to loneliness, and hardly knew how sad it was. She looked out on the landscape, bright with its earliest October glories—hills crowned with trees whose boughs were touched with gold and flame—haze in the air—blue asters in the highway—golden-rod nodding at the gate. She heard a wind, slow, mournful, inexpressibly profound and tender, and sighed a little at the thought of long, still winter evenings to come. The dead hope in her heart rose from its deep grave, and stood beside her in all the glory of youth and grace—too dear a ghost of a past too dear! This wind, which sighed and sung as if murmuring some weird incantation, had summoned as with a spell old, haunting memories, and familiar names rushed unbidden to the lone woman's lips. But she did not utter them—too many years had still face and quiet lips been learning the lesson of calmness.

She was so tranced in thought that it seemed to her like a call from a strange outside world with which she had nothing to do—she sitting among her dreams—when the knocker on her front-door gave forth a sound, sharp yet uncertain, as if touched by a hand at once eager and timorous. She opened the door, and saw a child standing there with wistful face—Deacon Parmelee's little girl, sole fruit of his first marriage. Her own mother was in heaven, but her step-mother—the deacon's second wife—had been the one friend of Miss Letitia's early youth. Through all the gay, girlhood days Letitia Mason and Grace Anderson had been as inseparable as shadow and substance. Since they had grown past girlhood an unexplained coldness had seemed to arise between them. They were friends still—at least Grace, now Mrs. Parmelee, made fervent professions of friendship—only something was always happening to prevent their meeting, to hold them asunder. Miss Letitia wondered often whose fault it was. It seemed to her that the change dated as far back as the time when her old, well-beloved hope had died; and she speculated now and then whether she could have been cold and careless to Grace in that time of grief, and so wounded her that they never could be quite the same to each other any more.

“Mother is very sick,” said the voice of the little blue-eyed girl, waiting at the door, “and she wants to have you come and see her, if you will be so kind, right off.”

“I will, indeed I will.” And tears sprang to Miss Letitia's eyes, and her calm face quivered a little. She did not think of Mrs. Parmelee—a silent, grave woman, two years older than herself—but of laughing Grace Anderson, with her merry ways, and petulant airs, and fervent caresses. Back through the years went her thoughts to the old time when they were both young, and so loved each other. She tied on her bonnet, and pinned her shawl, and hurried across the fields by the little girl's side. In half an hour she stood in the silent, shaded room where her old friend lay.

When she came to the bedside she started with amazement. It seemed to her as if the years had turned backward, and the Grace of the old days were indeed with her again. The fever which was running riot in the sick woman's veins had restored more than the beauty of her youth. A clear, intense color flamed on her cheeks, and a strange light kindled her great dark eyes. Her hair was tossed back over the pillow, and her face wore an eager, longing, expectant look. When she saw Miss Letitia at her bedside she grew excited.

“You are come,” she cried, “with kindness looking from your eyes. You won't smile at me when you go away. Leave us alone,” and she made an imperious gesture to the nurse who sat at the foot of the bed.

The woman arose quietly.

“Mrs. Parmelee,” she said, “it is most dangerous for you to excite yourself—I give you fair warning. I should not have permitted this interview on my own judgment; but since the doctor consented to it the responsibility does not rest with me.”

Then she went out slowly, and the patient laughed—a shrill, strange laugh, which almost struck fear to the listener's heart.

“Yes, the doctor knew I should die,” she cried. “A little excitement more or less won't matter. I felt a week ago when I was taken that my time had come. I waited though, before I sent for you, until other eyes besides my own could see that there wasn't the ghost of a chance left for my life.”

“Grace, dear,” Miss Letitia said, soothingly, going back unconsciously to the phraseology of their young days, “don't talk so. People who are ill do not always die. There is hope for you yet.”

"No! Do you think I don't know my own doom? I tell you death has been nearer than any other watcher to my bedside ever since I've lain here. I should not have sent for you if I had not known there was no escape."

"And why not for me?" Miss Letitia asked, with a gentle reproach in her voice. "Am I not your old friend, who has loved you all these years?"

"And who will hate me to-night," the other said, in a tone sadder and more hopeless than any words can describe. "I sent for you to confess a great wrong. I dare not die with it on my conscience, and carry it with me silently into the other world. Letitia, you loved Nelson Guthrie, and he loved you."

Burning blushes swept up to Miss Letitia's pale cheeks—her heart seemed to stand still. She thought she could not bear any more.

"Do not speak of that, Grace," she cried, wildly; "it is dead, that old dream. Let it rest in its grave!"

"But I must speak, or I can not rest in mine. Letitia, I did love you; but oh, I loved him so well! I would have sold my soul for his love—did sell it, perhaps; I do not know. I separated you—I, your friend, your sister, as you used to call me in those days. I made him think that you were deceiving him—that you loved some one else, and were not worthy of him. He was haughty and passionate, and I was crafty. I put a gulf between you that I knew you were too proud and he too angry to try to cross. Then my punishment began. I had hoped to win his love, expected he would turn to me in his disappointment, but my plan failed utterly. I think I had made myself hateful in his eyes by opening them, as he fancied, to the flaws in his idol. It was not a year before he had married Margaret Cross. He did it, I know, in very desperation. He did not love her then, however it has been since. I think—I always thought—that if I had known of the marriage before it took place I should have gone to him and prevented it by telling the truth; but I don't know—I might not have had the courage. At any rate, I heard nothing of it until the wedding was over, and then it was too late.

"It was no longer in my power to make any reparation. It would do him no good to know what he had lost; and I thought you would get over it easier to believe him false than to know how you had both been betrayed. So I made up my mind to carry the secret with me to my grave. But as years passed the burden grew heavy, and I wrote the whole story out, sealed it up, and put directions on the outside that it should be given to him after my death. I never meant, you see, that any one should know it until I was past the sound of earthly reproaches. So I went on, and tried to treat you as your old friend might—grown older and colder with time, but your friend still—I meant to go on so to the end."

"Oh, I wish you had, I wish you had!"

burst like a moan from Miss Letitia's quivering lips.

"I think I felt worse about it than ever, after I married the deacon. I didn't love him. That was over for me—the fierce flame had burned out and left my heart waste and sere. Nothing earthly could ever kindle it again. I married because it seemed a good thing to do; and then I was so lonely I wanted something to fill up my long days. But after a while I began to see how good the deacon was—how true he was—how honest and upright. The spirit of his life seemed to haunt and accuse me continually. I began—seeing the distance between us—to feel what it was to be a lost soul. I believe these thoughts, which have had strong possession of me all summer, brought on my fever. They were with me until it got to seem that every wind was the reproving voice of God, and every sunbeam a ray from his reproachful eye. I grew sick at last, and I knew death was coming. Letitia, I dared not die until I had told you. I can offer no atonement—I do not expect you will forgive me. If you could I should not fear so much to go out into the dark."

She shook with a dumb, shivering terror, and then lay still, uttering no farther entreaty, speaking no word more—only fixing her great dark eyes on the woman she had wronged, with a look in their depths so full of anguish and supplication that it was mightier than words.

Miss Letitia seemed dumb, as one turned suddenly to marble. She had loved Nelson Guthrie with her life's one love; and this woman lying here had separated them—taken away her bread and given her a stone—darkened her sunshine—reft from her all the hope and promise of her existence. Could she forgive? Did God require it of her? And yet—to-morrow it might be too late to speak her forgiveness. Would she have a lost soul wailing in wordless anguish at her side for evermore? Must she not forgive even this—lend to the parting spirit what she might of ease and comfort—if she hoped in her turn to be forgiven of God? After all, now that she knew the uttermost—knew that when all things should be made clear she would stand fair and honored in her old love's sight—ought she not to find it easy to forgive a wrong bounded by the compass of this earthly life? What if, in loneliness and sorrow, she must go down to her grave—she knew now that he whom she loved had not been false or unworthy—that she need not turn away from him when he should come to her side in the world of spirits. She looked into the beseeching eyes which met hers, as the deacon's wife cried out again, rent by the anguish of her suspense—

"Speak to me—your silence tortures me. Let me know my doom. Forgive me, or curse me!"

Miss Letitia bent over her, and took in her own the hand burning with fever.

"Yes," she said, slowly, "I forgive you."

You made my life a burden—you took away from me all that I cared for in this world, but I pity you in this hour when your sin has found you out, and I forgive you. I will pray for you to the God whose love is infinite—whose compassion is boundless. Your soul is not lost. You shall not die without hope."

"You forgive me? You are sure? You can ask mercy for me of God? He will hear your prayer—yours, whom I have injured. I will hope—O God, is it not too late?"

"The promise fails not, even at the eleventh hour," Miss Letitia murmured, with a solemn sweetness in her voice.

Just then a strong, firm step sounded in the yard, and the sick woman started eagerly.

"It is the deacon," she said; "he is coming, and we shall have but a moment more. Go to that desk in the corner—the key is in it. You will see, in the little drawer at the right, the packet directed to Nelson Guthrie. Take it away and read it. It will make all the particulars clear. When I am dead send it to him, and then he will understand us both."

Trembling in every limb Miss Letitia did her bidding, and went back to the bedside with the packet in her hand.

"Yes, that is it; and there is the Deacon's step on the threshold. He loves me—surely it can not be wrong to give him the consolation of believing me worthy of it. Once more, before you leave me, oh let me hear you say that you forgive me!"

"Fully and freely, as I hope myself to be forgiven," Miss Letitia answered, solemnly; and then, moved by a divine impulse of tenderness and pity, she bent over and pressed her lips to the feverish brow.

Going out, she met Deacon Parmelee in the room beyond, wearing a face on which anxiety and watching were graving stern lines.

She went into the gathering twilight. The sad wind was wailing still—the leaves rustled, the crickets chirped mournfully; but a star was rising already in the east, while yet the crimson autumn sunset burned above the western hills. "We have seen his star in the east," she murmured. "There is hope in the heavens."

That night she read all the long confession, and understood on just what rocks the hope of her life had stranded and gone down helplessly. After all, there was a certain sweetness in the knowledge that the man she loved had been neither false nor fickle, but only, like herself, wronged and deceived. She could never be any thing more to him in this life; but it was something to be sure that he had once loved her. When the life going out in that house across the fields was ended, she would send him the packet, and then—reinstated in his esteem—she could bear to go on alone through the rest of her pilgrimage.

The next morning news came that the Deacon's wife was dead.

She thought it would not be seemly to send off the dead woman's confession until the funeral should be over. So she waited four days longer, and then, when all reason for delay was at an end, she took the packet from her desk, and was going to dispatch it to Nelson Guthrie. As she stood with it in her hand a doubt suggested itself for the first time. Should she send it? Had she a right to clear herself in his eyes at the risk of recalling so many old memories? He had loved her once well and truly. Should she revive the spell, if that were possible—make him discontented with the present—stir his heart with vain longings? Would it be just to his wife—the wife to whom in this whole matter no blame could attach—whose sufficient misfortune it was that the man who married her had, at best, no fond freshness of first love to give her?

Miss Letitia was just, to the heart's core; and she was, besides, self-forgotten and resolute. What mattered it, she thought, whether or not he understood her now? Let him go on. Let whatever domestic happiness time had fostered at his hearth-stone still grow. When the end came would be time enough for her to stand before him justified. So her mind was made up. She wrote him a few lines, explaining simply how the confession came into her hands, and the motives which deterred her from sending it to him at once. Then, in her turn, she folded and sealed the packet, and directed it on the outside:

"To be given, unopened, into the hands of Nelson Guthrie, after the death of Letitia Mason."

That was all. Last week she had believed her lover of other days recreant to all truth and loyalty. Over the grave where his memory lay buried she had dared to drop no tear—plant no blossom. Now she knew that the wrong had not been on his part; and the thought that he had not given her up voluntarily was balm to her self-respect. So she took up her old life again, with something less than the old burden to carry.

Years came and passed noiselessly. Slowly silver threads grew into the brown, shining hair, and the delicate, youthful color faded a little. She scarcely realized how time went on until her fortieth birth-day found her. Then she began to feel how many the lonely years had been. Twenty-two years ago that day the note had come from Nelson Guthrie which gave her back her troth-plight, and since then she had never experienced one flutter of womanly vanity or anticipation. Life, to all selfish intents, ended with her that spring day, she thought. Since then, as more than one whom she had comforted could have borne witness, she had been doing the Master's work. She felt a little sad on this day of all days in the year. Memory was busy, and the path before her, leading on to old age, perhaps, stretched out bare and bleak.

It was in the middle of the long forenoon that a wagon stopped at the gate, and a man whom she recognized as the near neighbor of the Guthries—who lived at the other end of the town—dismounted and came up toward the house. A subtle, prophetic instinct told her his errand before she met him at the door. Her old lover had sent for her—was dying, probably.

"Mr. Guthrie is sick," the man began, abruptly, "and they say he has not long to live. He took a bad cold about ten days ago, and inflammation of the lungs set in, and they've given up all hopes of him. He says you were an old friend, and he wants to see you if you are willing to go."

"I will be ready in five minutes," she answered, with apparent calmness, but she turned back into the house, her heart throbbing strangely. Now, after all these years, her time had come—now she had a right to justify herself in his dying eyes.

She took the packet she had kept so long, put on her bonnet, and went out. They rode in utter silence over the three miles of dusty road which lay between her little cottage and Nelson Guthrie's house. She noticed, as one in a dream, how blue the sky was, and heard the spring birds sing, and the full brooks murmur. At last she was there.

It was pitiful to see how so brief an illness had shattered the forces of that strong man's life. Pale almost as he would be when they should put his grave-clothes on he was now, his face worn and wan, his heavy black beard making it look yet more ghastly. His wife had met Miss Letitia at the door with a whispered welcome, and as if by previous arrangement led her into the sick man's room, and left her there.

"I wanted to look yet once more in this world upon your face," he said, faintly, his eyes kindling a little as he saw her at his bedside. "I wanted to forgive you."

"You never had any thing to forgive," she answered, quietly.

"Never! Letty!"

"Never. For seven years I have had in my possession Grace Anderson's confession—the confession of the wrong-doing which separated us. I did not mean that you should see it until I was dead. But your time has come first, and you must not die until you know the truth, and have forgiven Grace."

He put out his hand with an eager gesture.

"Read it, Letty!" he cried. "Read every word of it. I think my soul could almost linger at the gates of death to hear such tidings."

She read it plainly and clearly, every word. When she was through she waited for him to speak.

"Did you forgive her, Letty—you, with your lonely woman's heart, your solitary life?"

"I forgave her—I prayed for her—I believe God heard me." Her voice came clear but very low.

"Then I, too, forgive her. Letty, I loved you in those days—we belonged to each other. It would have made my life a different thing to have shared it with you. But God knew best by what path to lead us both home. Margaret has been a true, good wife. Letty, will you care for her and comfort her when I am gone? You are stronger than she, and she will be quite alone."

"If she will let me I will be her friend—I will take her as your legacy."

"Call her, please, and wait for her in another room. I must make her understand how near was the tie between us."

She went out and sent his wife in.

Was it all over, she thought, and over so calmly? Standing on the threshold of the grave, how quietly he had received the tidings which had stirred her own soul seven years ago to its depths. But he understood her now—he knew that she had been true. For the rest, death calms the wildest pulses.

After a while Margaret came out. She had been weeping evidently, but she came up to Letitia and kissed her.

"He has told me all," she said, "and I know that you, not I, ought to have been his wife. But he loves me a good deal, I think; and he has been very kind to me, and made me happy. It is almost over now. Will you stay till the last? He wishes it."

"Till the last" was not long. The third day the summons came which called home the tired soul to forget all sorrows, all failures, all disappointments in the blessedness which is infinite. And by his bedside the two women who had loved him watched and wept, while his lips grew cold, and his proud, passionate, true heart stopped beating.

Miss Letitia had learned to suffer quietly by the discipline of long, sad years. The wound in her heart was deep, but it bled inwardly. Outwardly she was calm, and supported Margaret by her steady, undemonstrative courage.

When the funeral was over Margaret clung still to the friend in whom she seemed to find rest and strength. They scarcely knew on which side the proposal that they should live together originated; but it was carried out before midsummer, and they were both settled in the little cottage where Miss Letitia had lived alone so long.

And then time went on again, and the grass grew green on Nelson Guthrie's grave; and his widow's passionate grief subsided into gentle regret and tender memory. Regret so gentle that its shadow failed to affright a new wooer; and Mistress Margaret, fair and sweet still at a little past forty, went out of Miss Letitia's cottage into another home. And again Letitia was all alone.

Alone, but never lonely; for now she dreams that when Margaret shall go, resting on her later love, to the country peopled by shades, she herself, true through all, will have the right to stand proudly at Nelson Guthrie's side.

AMERICAN STUDIOS IN ROME AND FLORENCE.

ONCE upon a time, as my maternal grandfather was hugging his knees complacently over the fire, in the delicious abandon of a well-beloved pastor's Sunday evening, he broke forth in laudation of some well-put point of his morning homily.

"That may all be very true, my dear, but hadn't you better let somebody else praise you?" was the conjugal counterblast to this flourish of Pharisaism.

"Somebody else? No indeed!" quoth the trumpeter; "the poor coots don't know how to put it on in the right place."

Doubtless the artists whose ill-fortune opened their studios during the last winter to my crude criticism may class me under like ornithological condemnation with the sermon-critics of my progenitor. But during my residence in Italy I was so impressed by the fact of the neglect by American tourists of the studios of their countrymen and women that I determined, at my first opportunity, to pipe a little against this ignorance and indifference before three or four deserving doors in Rome and Florence. If you will not dance I shall at least have relieved my spirit.

It is a lamentable truism that the representative American traveler prefers an indifferent bust or picture by an Italian or English artist to the best which his compatriots can achieve.

Going forth from the artistic atmosphere of an average American circle, strong in the faith that Squire Jonathan's portrait in oils, and his boarding-school daughter's monochromatics and crayons are the ne plus ultra of art, he enters his first European gallery to depart a sadder, but scarcely a wiser man. "Ichabod" is thenceforth written not only upon daughter Mary's thrilling sea-fights and gay beauties in pastel, but upon all American art. His self-conceit in its sloughing leaves no atom of confidence in aught which his land can produce. Yet his converse admiration of foreign art must necessarily be indiscriminating, since he retains the complacent belief that no jackanapes with his technical jargon can teach him what to admire. Not he! He hasn't called Ruskin a madman and Jarves a fool, in snubbing Mary's raptures, to go to them or any other critic for instruction. Accordingly he stocks his gallery, as he would disdain to do his shop, with foreign wares, of whose origin, intent, and worth he is utterly ignorant, only making sure that no "Yankee trash" is included.

He carries home in triumph a blear-eyed Beatrice Cenci, a leering Madonna della Sedia executed by a Roman sign-painter, a medallion portrait of himself chipped out in the putty-relievo of a third-rate English artist, and a family-group cannily altered for the occasion from a Niobe and her Children, which had long cumbered the appartamento of some Italian sharper.

Our own escape from the sin and condemnation of the representative American traveler in regard to our compatriots' studios in Rome was owing solely to imputed grace. On our way thither we met the author of "Harper's Guide-Book," who solemnly assured us that there were two individuals in Rome whom it was desirable to see—"first the Pope, then Mrs. Dr. G." Now, it happened that to the latter little epitome of all charity and hospitality we are indebted for much of that which makes us still cry with Shakspeare, and being there, to Numero tredici via Condotti! It was her generous ire which spurred our supineness around the circle of American artists in the Eternal City, and even in remote Florence.

"Was't not a happy star Led us to Rome—"

The pity is that this should be a notable instance of esprit de corps and de esprit de pays—that every American resident of position abroad should not feel a fraternal interest in the success of American artists around him, and make of himself a conscience for the admonition of thoughtless tourists from their native land, with hearts or purses to be touched.

I understand that Mr. Jarves has pronounced William Story to be unappreciated in America. However true this may be in regard to untraveled connoisseurs, I think the representative American traveler is least likely to neglect this among all American studios in Rome. Does not Murray indorse Mr. Story's handiwork as "much noticed" at the great London Exposition of 1862? This Anglican baptism is surely almost equivalent to British birth. Moreover, it is quite safe to give loose rein to one's adjectives and notes of admiration in the presence of the Soul, the Sappho, and the Sybil, and all the more because there are sure to be among the carriages which wait on the Saturday receptions in the Via di San Nicolo di Tolentino an Italian coronet or two, and some well-quartered British escentcheon.

We had the privilege of entering the innermost studio, and seeing the sculptor, moulding-stick in hand. Even in its immaturity and in soulless plaster we saw in the Modena a grander statue than those apt fingers had previously created. The artist is said to have followed Ristori like her shadow, and has appropriated the great tragedienne's inspiration as a spiritual body for his own. It was a sad pleasure to see also in this inner sanctum that which is pronounced by Mr. Browning, and her brother Mr. Barrett, the best of all the many essays to render the drooping head and pathetic face of Elizabeth Browning. This bust was chiseled from the artist's memory of the poet (with whose personal friendship he was privileged), and its creation was trammelled by no lying portraits or superficial photographs as a model.

But why do we linger here where my pipe is absurdly superfluous? Were all America besides silent in his praise, Mr. Story might well rest content with Hawthorne's crowning.

an acute attack of mal du pays. On their table lay a fresh, crisp copy of the Springfield Republican, and on the walls hung half a dozen admirable sketches of autumnal scenery, which could only have had their birth among the maples, oaks, and beeches of New England. Their previous vacation having been spent in Sicily we were able to judge, both from their enthusiastic descriptions and abundant sketches, how delightful the scenery must be. A fine picture of Mount Etna, with sunrise tints, pleased us exceedingly. It had just been purchased by Mr. Morehead, of Philadelphia.

We were fascinated by the beauty of Mr. Tilton's Venetian views and Venetian coloring before we had learned of Mr. Jarves that it was artistically wrong so to be, and our first impression still abides. This artist's naïveté in the exposition of the "luminosity" and other perfections of his own pictures is sublime. Yet the oddest thing of all is, that he seemed to us only to tell the plain truth eloquently about these glowing re-creations of his brush, albeit it might, perhaps, have come with better grace from some "poor coot" of a spectator instead of from the Titianesque artist himself.

We cherish a grudge against the Fates, which prevented us from executing frequently-renewed plans for visiting the studios of other distinguished Americans in Rome. Unless the tourist conscientiously assign every moment of his time to some specific object, however long he may remain in Rome, in leaving he will carry away many such regrets and suffer remediless loss.

Our faithful, clever Consul, Mr. Stillman, true as truth, but not always in sunshine, was just about removing to a new post, so that his studio was in a transition state. We saw enough of his painting, however, to convince us that his talents would reap a rich harvest in the new and artistically unexplored field before him. In the beautiful island of Candia he will be likely to find worthy material for his skillful pencil and pen, while in the inhabitants he will find his very antipodes, unless they have outgrown their portrait so graphically sketched by one of their own artists centuries ago: The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.

Having tarried so long in the Eternal City we had far too little time for doing justice to Florence and her American studios.

Hiram Powers is the one American artist whose merits seem to be fully appreciated at home. Every representative American traveler longs to have his Ciceronic features immortalized by this sculptor, and joyfully exchanges his thousand silver scudi for one of his exquisitely-finished busts. Aside from his talent Mr. Powers deserves his brilliant success on account of his generous interest in younger, less famous artists, and his vigorous loyalty. Few Americans visit his studio without hearing the suggestion from the beautiful-eyed old man as they reluctantly take leave, "You must not think of going from Florence without seeing such and such studios."

His thirty years' exile have only deepened his patriotism, and his children, all of Florentine birth, have been chiseled by their parents into noble specimens of New Englanders—not a foreign touch about them. During our four years of darkness and combat this good man never once lost heart, and, perhaps, did as much as any American resident abroad to silence English impertinence. His studio is much frequented by British tourists, and it is doubtful if one is ever suffered to escape scot-free. He repeated to us a bon mot of his own similar to that already narrated of Mr. Rogers. An English visitor was struck on entering Mr. Powers's studio by the well-known bust of Andrew Jackson.

"Who is this, pray? An American?"

"Yes; General Jackson."

"Oh, indeed!" turning with beatific delight to Mrs. John Bull. "My dear, this is that brave Stonewall Jackson of whom you have heard so much."

"No, Sir, by no means. It is a man, who, if he had been living, would have hung Stonewall Jackson long ago."

Mr. Powers also related with great gusto the story of a bluff Englishman, who came storming into his studio one day with the frank announcement:

"I don't know any thing about statuary. I've come to your studio because it's one of the sights of Florence. Busts all look just alike to me."

After wandering about for a long time among the crowded treasures of the many-roomed studio with a vacant stare, a sudden gleam of intelligence illumined his broad countenance. Mr. Powers, startled, turned to discover what had so transfigured his stolidity. It was a plaster cast of the famous Florentine Boar, before which the delighted connoisseur had struck an attitude.

"That's a foin hanimal, Sir! I raise pigs myself, Sir. A foin hanimal; pray what breed is it?"

"A wild boar."

"Ah, poor condition he's in, Sir; 'twould take a long time to fetch him up to where my pigs are. But he's a foin hanimal, Sir!"

A Tennessean came one day into Mr. Powers's studio.

"Only just come to town!" said he; "had to wait in Paris to get my gallery packed. Bought a whole gallery of Old Masters—paid fifteen hundred dollars for 'em, too! How much is that statoo worth?"

"Two thousand dollars."

"My stars! Why, I bought one t'other day for two hundred dollars, and it ain't plaster neither; for I drew my jack-knife right cross her nose, and it never made a scratch."

Do you know the story of Powers's America? Fifteen years ago, in prophetic inspiration, he wrought a beautiful figure crowned with stars, treading under foot broken chains. He regarded Congress as pledged to its acceptance for the Capitol; but two successive Presidents shuddered at the awful radicalism of the trampled fetters, and at the time of our visit America still lay boxed in New York. Can she not now safely come forth with her crown of stars?

Mr. Powers's patriotism is so extreme that he prefers to model in American clay, which is regularly exported, as he told us, for his use. Home soil is better to him than that of classic Arno or Tiber. One might think that his marble also was brought from some more favored mount than the quarries of ordinary artists, since it acquires in his studio an inimitable velvetness of texture. We hope it may be many years before our country shall lose such a representative of American manhood, patriotism, and art as Hiram Powers.

One young artist commended to us by Mr. Powers we had already learned to admire. The same dainty fancy which once wrought itself out through the evanescent medium of Brattleborough snow now moulds Carrara marble into enduring forms of beauty. We were so fortunate as to find in his studio the model of his Lincoln monument. The four groups about the base, representing Cavalry, Artillery, Marine, and Infantry, have wonderful life and action. Although the dolce fur niente of Italian workmen prevented our seeing the model complete, yet we saw enough to convince us that here was Larkin Meade's chef-d'œuvre.

A pretty statue of a Puritan girl on a visit to her poultry-yard had been christened a Contadine: we recognized too well the exquisite refinement of the New England type of girlhood not to protest against the misnomer. A fine group of a soldier, telling the story of his campaign to the little daughter upon his knee, had just been ordered of colossal size to be the admirable ornament for the grounds of an asylum for soldiers' orphans in Connecticut. Before the soldier stretches an awful vision of blood, indicated by the fixed gaze, the outstretched hand, and the eloquent face of the little maiden as she looks up into his war-worn face with wondering sympathy.

I can only speak of a single artist more. The story of John Jackson is so touching that I take the liberty of telling it simply. His design for a monument to Dr. Kane having been accepted by an organization formed for the purpose, he was sent to Italy to execute it in marble. He was assured that on arriving in Florence he should find funds to a large amount, and that further remittances would be made until the sum proposed on the acceptance of his design should have been received. Accordingly, breaking up his home in the midst of an appreciative circle in Boston, he removed to Florence. On his arrival no funds were found—none were sent. After many anxious weeks he received a letter from the committee who had expatriated him, stating that, in consequence of the panic incident to the outbreak of the rebellion, Dr. Kane's monument must be indefinitely postponed.

possible, a family to provide for—what shall be done? This true hero valiantly betook himself to the trade which his father (mindful of the Hebrew proverb, "Blessed is he that hath a trade to his hand; he is like a vineyard well fenced") had obliged him to learn before he would suffer him to devote himself to his beloved art. Uncomplainingly he went into a machine-shop, and wrought in iron when he longed to be in his studio.

Of late something of the success he so richly deserves has crowned this artist. But when we were in Florence there stood in his studio, still in plaster, a most poetic conception of Eve, the "Mother of all Living," holding upon her lap the body of the dead Abel. Every detail is admirably rendered, but the most distinguishing points in the group are the contrast between the beautiful hand of the mother, with full, eager life coursing through its veins, and the limp, lifeless fingers which fall without response from her grasp; and chief of all, the expression of the bereaved mother's face. It is not so much the "bootless bene" of a childless Rachel weeping un comforted, as the marvel of the Mother of the Living over the first revelation of the awful miracle of Death.

I have before me one of the exquisite photographs of Powers frères (the artist's sons). It is a copy of the rough model (the original of which we saw) of a commemorative monument. It represents a pure shaft eighty feet in height, surmounted by a graceful statue of Liberty, bearing aloft in one hand the star-spangled banner, and holding in the other a wreath, as if about to let it fall upon the honored graves beneath. The design was to ornament the base with bass-reliefs, according to the subjects commemorated. But the uniqueness of this monument consists in the capital of the graceful column, which is of rare beauty, and distinctively American. It is at once so natural and striking that the marvel is that it was not conceived long ago, and adopted in place of Corinthian or Composite ornament in many of our national buildings throughout the republic. The existence of this model at the time of our visit to the studio was known only to the photographer and a few favored friends. If I am betraying a secret at this late day by even these incoherent hints, I shall not beg Mr. Jackson's pardon, for it is high time this beautiful design were executed in pure white marble (or in Quincy granite with bronze ornaments), and were set up in the sight of all men in some Place Vendôme of America.

Is it not already evident that among the gracious fruit which is to spring from fields which we have been for weary years sowing in tears, but in faith, is a fresh, beautiful growth of native art? The demand for commemorative monuments is great, the supply of unmeaning meretricious designs is perhaps greater; let severely discriminating taste be exercised in the selection of these memorials, lest they prove unworthy not alone of our glorious dead, but of the new era of American art which is now dawning.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL EXPERIMENT.

"AS to every leaf and every flower there is an ideal to which the growth of the plant is constantly urging, so is there an ideal to every human being—a perfect form in which it might appear, were every defect removed and every characteristic excellence stimulated to the highest point. Once in an age God sends to some of us a friend who loves in us not a false imagining, an unreal character; but, looking through all the rubbish of our imperfections, loves in us the divine ideal of our nature—loves, not the man that we are, but the angel that we may be.

"But these wonderful soul-friends, to whom God grants such perception, are the exceptions in life; yet sometimes are we blessed with one who sees through us, as Michael Angelo saw through a block of marble, when he attacked it in a divine fervor, declaring that an angel was imprisoned within it.

"There be soul-artists, who go through this world looking among their fellows with reverence, as one looks amidst the dust and rubbish of old shops for hidden works of Titian and Leonardo, and, finding them, however cracked or torn or painted over with tawdry daubs of pretenders, immediately recognize the divine original, and set themselves to cleanse and restore."

Alice dropped the book and gazed dreamily through the green branches of the arbor into the golden sunset. A world of thought had been opened to her. She was imaginative and poetic, pre-eminently one of those very soul-artists of whom she had been reading. How beautiful, how true every word was to her! "As to every leaf and every flower there is an ideal to which the growth of the plant is constantly urging, so is there an ideal to every human being." Would the time ever come when we should all read this ideal perfection—when, from the narrow, the selfish, the passionate, the ignorant, and prejudiced, the dust and rubbish would be removed, and they should stand out pure and beautiful, their own higher, truer selves? How many beautiful characters might be hidden beneath the coarse and uncultivated exteriors of those around her! What a glorious work that of the soul-artist! She was living in an ideal world when she was suddenly recalled to the actual by her sprightly little companion.

"Come, Allie, are you thinking how you're going to carve out Ned Armstrong, and polish him up into a magnificent work of art? I'll tell you what it is, you've got a work before you! It's easier to see a statue in a block of marble than it is to get it out, particularly in these human statues Mrs. Stowe tells about."

"Pshaw, Kate, how you do run on! I wasn't thinking about any one in particular. But isn't it a beautiful idea that every human being contains the germ of perfection, and that we have only to remove the dust and rubbish to reveal an angel?"

"Beautiful, but not true."

"Not true? Oh, Kate, you wicked little skeptic! If I didn't see a beautiful character in you, behind all your naughty ways, I'd never say another word to you!"

"I'm very glad you have such good eyes, or such a vivid imagination, I don't know which. But I'm more practical. I'm a Baconian. First get your facts, then form your theory. Now you sit and read beautiful books, and look off into the sunset clouds, and weave a most delightful web of fanciful theories. But just come down to everyday life; mingle with commonplace people. I don't mean your friends that you love and idealize, but people you don't take any particular interest in—those bread-and-butter kind of people that don't seem to have any ideas beyond heaping up a pile of dry goods and furniture around them; the very sort that Mrs. Stowe herself describes on another page: those who have learned 'to be fat and tranquil, to have warm fires and good dinners,' to hang their 'hat on the same peg at the same hour every day, to sleep soundly all night, and never to trouble their head with a thought or imagining beyond.' Do you see any angels in them? To come to the point: There is Aunt Julia, whose highest ambition is satisfied with a $500 camel's-hair shawl, and Mr. Simmons, who will have attained the object of his existence when he is the owner of a marble front on Broadway; there is poor Mary O'Neil's miserable husband, who beats her every week in a fit of intoxication; and there is my beloved brother-in-law, a minister, yet the most thoroughly selfish, disagreeable man in his family I ever knew. Can you see an angel in any of those people?"

"If I can not, I have faith to believe it is there. God is the artist, and His works are perfect—behind all the rubbish with which time has obscured them," Alice rejoined, earnestly. "Sometimes it requires peculiar circumstances to develop the finer traits of character. A seed is wrapped up in a paper for centuries, and it remains nothing but a seed. Yet the possibilities of myriads of beautiful flowers are there. Plant it, give it rain and sunshine, and the rich juices of earth, and all the possibilities of the seed blossom into the reality of a beautiful flower. So it is with character. Think how much nobleness and heroism and self-sacrifice have been developed since the opening of the war, among many in whom we least expected to find those qualities. Yes, I believe there is an angel in every one, if we could only find it and bring it out."

"I don't know, Alice. Some people don't seem to have any higher nature. If you should describe what you call their higher nature to them they wouldn't appreciate it at all, wouldn't recognize it as belonging to them, and wouldn't consider that you complimented them in insisting that it did. James Sherwood hasn't any higher nature, I know! You ought to see him every day, for weeks and months, as I have. I've studied him for a curiosity, as a naturalist would study a peculiar fossil, and I can't find any thing in him but what is coarse, and selfish, and narrow. He goes around house like a thunder-cloud; never speaks except to tell what he wants done, or find fault with something that isn't done to his mind, and never seems to think of any body's happiness but his own. I verily believe he enjoys making other people unhappy as much as some people enjoy creating happiness. I never saw such a narrow, contracted specimen of humanity in my life, and that's just the amount of it!"

Alice looked grave, and was silent a few moments. "And yet your sister saw something to love in him;" she said at last.

"Poor Nell! I suppose she was just such a dreamy, imaginative girl as you are, and she made up a glorious ideal all out of her own brain, and threw it, with undoubting confidence, over the man who said 'I love you,' never dreaming that love did not mean to him all that it did to her; that to him it only meant, 'You're a good-looking and very convenient article of household furniture; I would like to own you.' Now I'm romantic. You don't believe it, but I am, only I have just enough of real practical common-sense to save me from making a martyr of myself. I have a glorious ideal. I could love almost to idolatry the man who only aspired to it; but that man I have never seen. I have tried to surround some I have known, and who have professed interest in me, with the radiance and glory of this ideal. I never succeeded. The outlines of the real were always too plainly visible through the ideal, and so it follows that at twenty-two I have never been in love. Nellie, I suppose, was more imaginative and less practical than I. She loved an ideal being, a creature of her brain; she awoke to find herself married to a stranger."

"You draw too dark a picture," Kate. You are very intense in your likes and dislikes. I never saw a being who was wholly bad. I believe Mr. Sherwood has a better nature, if any one has the skill to draw it out."

"I don't know how you'd go to work to get at it. If he was a drunkard I could undertake him with some hope of success. He might have a large, generous nature, something that you could appeal to, to lead him up to a higher life. But a professed teacher of righteousness, an expounder of the will of God, one who doubtless considers himself at the pinnacle of virtue, when he hasn't in reality the faintest conception of the meaning of the word, how are you to get at him? I have a missionary spirit toward him, but I don't know how to go to work."

"If you could tell him the truth in kindness. Perhaps all he needs is light."

"Kindness! Poor sister has tried that on him for the last ten years, and had the satisfaction of seeing him grow more selfish and morose every day. He isn't high enough up to appreciate it. But the truth! I'll tell you what it is. I've a new idea!" exclaimed Kate, suddenly starting up. "I'm going to try a psychological experiment on him. I'll test him with acids, and if there's a soul in him I'll bring it out. I'll write him a letter this very night, and I'll tell him just exactly what I think of him; ask him if he's got any better nature; and tell him, if he has, I'd like to see a little of it. He preaches the truth to others; if I shall enjoy the privilege of having it preached to him for once. Truth and Love are the two great levers to move the world with. Nell's love has failed with him; I'll try truth. If I succeed I'll accept your theory, and be your most reverent and devoted disciple henceforth and forever."

Alice Graves was wealthy and an only child. Her friend, poor, an orphan, and a teacher, was spending her vacation with her. The two girls had spent the long summer afternoon in reading, and, as twilight approached, had fallen into the conversation we have just recorded.

II.

It had been a busy day in the little country parsonage of A——; for its mistress was cook, chamber-maid, nurse, seamstress, and lady of the house, all in one. The week's ironing, which had occupied the sultry hours of morning, was fluttering in snowy purity on the bars; the callers, who had stolen the precious hours of afternoon, had taken their departure; the teething baby was at last asleep; and Mrs. Sherwood had seated herself before her formidable basket of unfinished sewing. What a weary vista of unstitched seams lay before her! Would she ever reach the end? No; for soon the autumn work would come—the sewing, cleaning, and a multitude of other duties—for a country minister's wife must be economical, and try her own lard, and make her own candles; and then came winter, and then spring; the seasons following each other in such rapid succession that she scarcely found time to prepare for one before the other was upon her. Life seemed an endless succession of unsewed garments, unwashed dishes, and teething babies; and, to embitter all, perpetual fault-finding from one whose love would have cast a golden halo around her humblest duties.

Mr. Sherwood had spent the day in his study, reading a little, lounging a little, and writing at intervals on a sermon on "Unconditional Submission." A very attractive room was Mr. Sherwood's study—much more so than the kitchen in which his better half was destined to spend the greater part of her time. There was a large square writing-desk, an inviting arm-chair, a lounge, and, best of all, a very respectable library of standard authors. One hour of the twenty-four in this room would have been gold to Nellie Sherwood, yet she seldom entered it but to sweep and dust. If her husband would but have brought the warmth and light of those great minds with whom he daily communed down to her, she would have asked no more. He never did; perhaps because he was himself incapable of receiving them.

When he came down this afternoon he had but three words for her: "Where's your supper?"

"It will be ready very soon. It is hardly time yet, and I wanted to get Susie's little apron done," was the rejoinder, without looking up from her work.

"Time half an hour ago. Seems to me you must have been short of starch this morning," he continued, going into the kitchen and inspecting the newly ironed linen. "My collars are as flimsy as rags, and one of them is smutty."

His wife ventured no reply. George and Susie rushing in at that moment fresh from play and waking the baby from his restless slumber, gave her opportunity to conceal the burning tears she could not wholly suppress.

Mr. Sherwood stretched himself on the sofa and took up a paper, but soon threw it aside impatiently. "I believe I will go up to the Post-office, as there seems to be no prospect of supper in this establishment for some time to come."

There were three letters in Mr. Sherwood's box; one from his brother, one from a neighboring clergyman, asking an exchange; the third—did his eyes deceive him?—was directed, in the dashing, off-hand chirography of Kate Vivian, to "Mr. James Sherwood."

"What now?" he thought, as he wonderingly tore open the envelope, and unfolded two closely-written sheets. He read as follows:

"HEMLOCK GROVE, August 23, 1864.

"I have been thinking about you this evening, and have taken it into my head to write you a letter. While I was at your house, two years ago, I interested myself in studying your mental and moral developments, to learn your object in life, your idea of happiness, your views of duty. I must confess frankly that the result of my investigations was not at all flattering to you. As far as I could learn your nature, from its outward manifestations, it is an intensely selfish one.

"As I understand it, the mainsprings of human action are three: duty, benevolence, selfishness. Neither duty nor benevolence ever prompted you to scold and grumble at your wife—making yourself disagreeable and her unhappy—because, perchance, she had made an ill-fitting garment, burned the coffee, or forgotten to make the gravy. Only selfishness, and a low form of selfishness, prompted you. Neither duty nor benevolence influenced you in treating your wife with the unkindness and neglect which you uniformly did while I was there. Selfishness—only selfishness—of the coarsest, rudest form. You are not happy. You can not be. The two objects of life are: first, holiness; second, happiness. To the attainment of the former, forgetfulness of self, love for God and our fellow-beings—a love which manifests itself in kind words, generous deeds, self-sacrifices, little acts of nobleness and love in everyday life—is essential. Evidently your object in life is not the attainment of holiness. It must then be happiness, and a failure at that! In a blind, ignorant, groping way you are seeking happiness, and, continually baffled, continually disappointed, you are vexed, angry, irritated, and out of humor with every one for that for which you alone are to blame.

"You profess to be a teacher of righteousness, yet how ignorant you are of the first principles of Christianity! 'Love is the fulfilling of the law.' 'God is LOVE.' Love is the essence of Christianity. By 'love' I mean all true love, divine and human. All true love is divine, and he who scoffs at love blasphemes. Love was given to lead us out of and above self; to a purer, higher life; to God. It is sacred, and he who has proved disobedient to its requirements has committed a fearful sin. Ten years ago you won the love of a sincere, pure-minded, trusting girl. You married her, promising to love, tenderly cherish, and care for her, as long as you both should live. How have you fulfilled that promise? Have you, forgetting yourself, sought to smooth her pathway for her, day by day; cheering her with kind deeds and pleasant words, noticing every little effort to please, generously overlooking all failures, nobly assisting to bear her burdens? Do you bring sunshine into the house with you? Or do you think only of yourself, and of her simply as a convenient machine to get your bread-and-butter for you, sew on your shirt-buttons, and darn your stockings?

"I have boarded for a long time in the family of a man whose life is a continual sermon. His happiness seems to consist in the pleasure he gives others. If his business troubles him he does not bring any clouds home, but has always a genial smile and pleasant word for his family. I have never heard him find fault with his wife. When things are to his taste he notices it, if there is a failure anywhere he does not see it. If one collar isn't ironed to suit him he takes another, and never says a word about it. Generally speaking he thinks every thing his wife does is about right, as every man with a soul in him does, when she tries her best to please him. He is always pleasant around house, and his family are glad instead of sorry when he comes home earlier than usual. He is always helpful, kind, considerate. If there are any burdens to bear, he is always ready and more than ready to bear them; and so easily, so cheerfully, with such manly strength and hearty good-will! In short, he lives the religion of the God whose name is Love. He is too manly to bicker about trifles, and too sensible to allow things which are of slight consequence to destroy domestic happiness. Although he values neatly fitting and well-ironed collars as highly as you do, he values the happiness of his wife, and the calm, peaceful flow of a pure and sacred home-love far more. Though he appreciates elaborate dinners, he likes better the cheerful converse around the board, the unclouded brow and merry laugh of his wife, the free, hearty effort to please which only love can inspire. In a word, he values the spiritual more than the material; love more than the gratification of selfish desires; God more than the world. His life tends upward, toward God; yours downward, as that of every selfish person must.

"Oh, why can you not change? Why can you not become noble, manly, generous, strong—living above self, forgetting self, trying to make others happy? Have you no higher nature, capable of nobler things? Surely you must have. My dearest friend, Allie Graves, says everybody has an angel in him. If there is one in you, I think it's about time for him to show himself. I want to see him. Won't you liberate him for my benefit? If you will, I'll like you and call you 'brother.'

"Trusting that you are sufficiently noble to accept all that I have said, in the same spirit of candor and goodwill in which I have written it,

"I remain your honest and sincere friend,

"KATE VIVIAN."

Mrs. Sherwood's supper was uncriticised that night. If the tea was too strong, or the biscuit not quite right, Mr. Sherwood did not know it. He ate in silence, and immediately retired to his study. For weeks he was the victim of violent and conflicting emotions. At first surprise and indignation, then bitterness and a feeling of injured innocence, finally a settled conviction of the truth of all Kate had said—a conviction that he would not have acknowledged even to himself—took possession of him. The angel in him was awakened, was beginning to assert her authority, and the demon, so long master, stood on his defense. A fearful soul-conflict followed. Mrs. Sherwood only knew that her husband was reserved and fitful—sometimes moody, sometimes petulant, and sometimes strangely kind and thoughtful for her. They were "strangers yet," for he lacked that largeness of nature that would come to her, acknowledging his past unkindness, telling her all his heart, and promising that henceforth love should reign in their household. Unkind? He had not been unkind—oh no! Things had not always run smoothly, he had had his annoyances, perhaps he had not always been patient under them—one can not always control one's self—and perhaps Nellie had had more labors and trials than he had realized. At any rate he should always be kind to her, and make her happy, of course. Hadn't he always done so?

The angel was very feeble from her long imprisonment. Air, exercise, and time strengthened her.

III.

The next summer Kate wrote to Alice Graves as follows:

"The millennium is coming! What do you think has happened? James Sherwood has made Nellie a present of a sewing-machine. My poor sis is in the seventh heaven over it. You see she has always been dying for one, she did want so much to find a little time for reading and writing; but, then, she said she didn't suppose she could ever see through one—she never had any ingenuity—and she should only break needles and waste thread. Well, you know that piece in Harper's about that wonderful sewing-machine so like the letter 'G.' She was telling Elm Heath about it, and saying if she could only get time to write another Sunday-school book she thought she could earn one. James happened to overhear her, and when he went to New York made a hunt among the sewing-machines till he found the right one, and sent it to her for a surprise. She wrote me the gayest letter I have had from her in years; said she had all her summer sewing done, and was looking forward to hours and hours of reading that would make her forget she wasn't a girl again. She says her machine will braid, hem, fell, and do all sorts of things. I don't know but it washes the dishes, and takes care of the baby by the way she runs on about it. Any way I am glad she has it. She said James was 'very kind' now, and that the future looked brighter to her than it had done for many years. I grant you the victory, ma chère, in the argument we held last August in the arbor. That sewing-machine has revealed the angel in James Sherwood to my heretofore unbelieving eyes. Yes; I can see every feather in its wings, and every fold in its snowy drapery. Are you satisfied?"

IV.

But the sewing-machine was destined to reveal another angel to Kate; even the Angel of Love.

"See what an odd document somebody let fall in our office to-day!" said Guy Worthington, the superintendent of the salesroom of the sewing-machine establishment, to his friend and confidant, Fred Elmore. "The envelope was gone, so I couldn't send it to the individual for whose benefit it appears to have been written. Would you return it to the fair author, or preserve it as a curiosity?"

"What is it? A love-letter?"

"Doesn't strike me that it is. It appears to be addressed to a parson, and charges him with all sorts of iniquities; being a bear in his family, and what not; then there is a high-flown disquisition on love; and the document finally winds up with an exhortation to him to repent and change his course. Oh, it's rich! The lady is a regular little pepper-box whoever she is."

"Let's have it;" and Fred Elmore tipped back in his easy-chair, elevated his feet at some distance above his head, and was soon buried in the perusal of the manuscript in question.

"Kate Vivian. A pretty name," said Fred, as he threw the letter upon the table. "Pretty penmanship, too; has character in it."

"Character! I should think so. Won't the man who marries her catch a Tartar? Whew! Such high and mighty ideas on the duties of husbands! It fairly takes my breath away to think of it! She's smart though, by George! I'd give half a year's salary to become acquainted with her."

"You might send her the letter with a polite note, telling how it fell into your hands, and so worded as to require an answer."

"That's so! I'll do it!" And, suiting the action to the word, Guy Worthington drew up a package of note-paper and fell to writing. After several unsuccessful attempts, resulting in the sacrifice of considerable stationery, he at length produced a specimen of composition and chirography which Fred pronounced faultless.

"Hemlock Grove! Have you the least idea in what portion of our terrestrial sphere this very spicy grove is situated?" asked Guy, as he folded the note.

"There is such a place in the western part of the State, somewhere in the vicinity of the renowned village of Algiers, where I have an uncle. I remember hearing the name mentioned when I was there years ago."

"No doubt that's the very spot. At any rate here goes for 'Hemlock Grove, New York.' Heigh-ho! Shall I get an answer in a week?"

"If ever. What will you wager, now, she isn't an old maid between fifty and sixty, with gray hair and spectacles?"

"Any thing. I tell you she isn't over twenty-two, is tall and handsome, with large dark eyes and raven locks—and is brilliant, spicy, and original. I do like to see a woman who isn't run in the common mould."

"I hope you won't be disappointed; but I haven't the least idea she's under thirty."

"You're a bear. I shall ask her for her carte de visite in my next."

Guy watched the post-office anxiously for one, two, three weeks. At last a missive in a lady's hand, post-marked "Berlin Centre," appeared. He tore it open eagerly. It was a brief, dignified note of acknowledgment, giving no opportunity for a reply without positive rudeness.

"Any way, I've found out one thing. She lives in 'Berlin Centre,' wherever that may be."

A reference to the Post-office Directory showed Guy that it was in the same county with "Algiers."

"Hurrah! I say, Fred, don't you want to go up and visit your uncle this summer, with an agreeable companion? I've been thinking where I'd spend my vacation, and this is just the thing!"

"Of course I will. I've a pretty cousin there, too, who must be a young lady by this time. So if your divinity turns out to be a vinegar-faced spinster—which is more than likely—your cloud of despair will turn a silver lining!"

Accordingly the month of August found the young gentlemen ensconced in the ample farmhouse of Mr. Ira Harrison, with Miss Susie to do the honors for them.

Susie Harrison was a rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed farmer's daughter, full of health and cheerfulness, who churned butter, made cheese, swept, washed dishes, and sometimes helped milk the cows and feed the pigs. Guy, who had imagined her a delicate, golden-haired, ethereal style of maiden, like those in pictures, who spend their time sitting around in dells and grottoes dressed up in their Sunday's best, was disappointed. But Susie was pleasant, sensible, and well-educated withal; so that after the first few days they were the best of friends, and at the end of a week our hero might have been seen at the kitchen sink wiping dishes, with a mammoth checked linen apron pinned up in front of him, and a trim little figure with a merry face working at his side.

"Is there a place called Berlin Centre near here?" he had asked her, on the second day after his arrival.

"Oh yes; it's the nearest village, about four and a half miles distant."

"Do you know any family there by the name of Vivian?"

"No family of that name. There's a young lady teaching the select school there named Kate Vivian."

Guy glanced triumphantly at Fred as Susie said "young lady."

"What sort of a person is she?" asked Fred.

"Oh, she's splendid! You ought to know her. And that reminds me that her school is going to have a picnic next week, and we'll all go. She told me to invite my friends."

"All right, so far," thought Guy.

The picnic came in due time, and with it the long looked-for introduction to Miss Vivian. She proved to be not sparkling and sharp, as Guy had imagined, but reserved and dignified, with just sufficient spice and originality to make her interesting in conversation. Guy was satisfied.

The picnic was closely followed by drives, rambles, and so on. The four weeks' vacation passed all too rapidly. Fred carried away with him at its close a promise from the country school-mistress to correspond, and during the following autumn and winter lengthy documents passed weekly between Berlin Centre and New York. Guy Worthington, probably unaware of this, took a trip to Berlin Centre in May, staid three days, and returned to his business "a sadder and a wiser man."

The next August a double wedding took place at Hemlock Grove. Alice Graves became Mrs. Ned Armstrong. We hope she found her angel without having to carve him out of the block. Kate joined hands with Fred Elmore. Her bridal present from her husband was a sewing-machine—of whose make we know but will not tell; only be sure it was the best. "It has done a greater work than it ever promised," said Fred. "It has sewed two hearts together."

A DIXIAN GEOGRAPHY.

MRS. M. B. MOORE, "having found most of the juvenile books too complex for young minds, has for some time intended making an effort to simplify the science of Geography. If she shall succeed," she says, "in bringing this beautiful and useful study within the grasp of the little folks, and making it both interesting and pleasant, her purpose will be fully accomplished." The result of her well-meant labors lies before us in the shape of a dingy pamphlet of 48 pages, each containing not quite half as much matter as a page of this Magazine. It is issued at Raleigh, North Carolina, in 1864, and is declared to be "A new and popular book, entirely Southern, and finely adapted to the use of Common Schools." The price is three dollars, as announced by the publishers. Our copy, however, bears the bookseller's price-mark of five dollars. We suppose that the value of Confederate money had gone down.

The work opens with the usual "First Lessons," in which the young aspirants for geographical knowledge are told that "The earth is round, like a ball, and turns once in a day and night. The reason we do not fall off is that the earth draws us to its center. We call this drawing toward the earth's attraction. Were it not for this we should all fall off, like the water falls from a grindstone or a wheel when turned rapidly. God made the earth and put it in motion, and it will move until he commands it to stop. Should we not love him for making us such a beautiful home?"

By way of explaining the "Points of the Compass" it is said that "There is a certain star, called the North Polar Star, which you can always see at a clear night. There is a kind of stone, called the load stone, which, if a long piece of it be fixed on a pivot, will always point to the North Polar Star. There is one spot on the earth which is always turned to the Polar Star. This is called the North Pole. The just opposite is called the South Pole. These points are called Poles because of their relation to the Polar Star."

The "Races of Men" have a chapter. "Those in Europe and America are mostly white, and are called the Caucasian race. They have schools and churches, and live in fine style." The Asiatics, or Mongolian people, "are a quiet and plodding race, but when educated are sensible and shrewd. When they ever become converted they hold fast their profession, and are not fickle like some races." The Malays "are black and have wool on their heads, but not like the African. They are very fierce, and will die rather than be made slaves. They eat the flesh of their enemies, and are called cannibals." The African race, as most likely to be of interest, comes in for a longer account than is accorded to any other. Young Dixie is informed that

"The African or negro race is found in Africa. They are slothful and vicious, but possess little cunning. They are very cruel to each other, and when they have war they sell their prisoners to the white people for slaves. They know nothing of Jesus, and the climate of Africa is so unhealthy that white people can scarcely go there to preach to them. The slaves who are found in America are in much better condition. They are better fed, better clothed, and better instructed, than in their native country. These people are the descendants of Ham, the son of Noah, who was cursed because he did not treat his father with respect. It was told him that he should serve his brethren forever. That would seem a hard sentence; but it was probably done to show other children how wicked it was to treat their parents so. We can not tell how they came to be black and have wool on their heads."

This Dixian Geography wholly ignores the existence of Europe. Possibly this was intended as a practical way of punishing England and France for not promptly recognizing the Southern Confederacy. Of the United States it is said—

"This was once the most prosperous country in the world. Nearly a hundred years ago it belonged to England; but the English made such hard laws that the people said they would not obey them. After a long and bloody war of seven years they gained their independence; and for many years were prosperous and happy. In the mean time both English and American ships went to Africa and brought away many of these poor heathen negroes, and sold them for slaves. Some people said it was wrong, and asked the King of England to stop it. He replied that 'he knew it was wrong; but that the slave-trade brought much money into his treasury, and it should continue.' But both countries afterward did pass laws to stop this trade. In a few years the Northern States, finding the climate too cold for the negro to be profitable, sold them to the people living farther South.

"Then the Northern States passed laws to forbid any person owning slaves in their borders. Then the Northern people began to preach, to lecture, and to write about the sin of slavery. The money for which they sold their slaves was now partly spent in trying to persuade the Southern States to send their slaves back to Africa. And when the Territories were settled they were not willing for any of them to become slaveholding. This would soon have made the North stronger than the South; and many of the Northern men said they would vote for a law to free all the negroes in the country. The Southern men tried to show them how unfair this would be; but still they kept on.

"In the year 1860 the Abolitionists became strong enough to elect one of their men for President. Abraham Lincoln was a weak man, and the South believed he would allow laws to be made which would deprive them of their rights. So the Southern States seceded, and elected Jefferson Davis to be their President. This so enraged President Lincoln that he declared war, and has exhausted nearly all the strength of his nation in a vain attempt to whip the South back into the Union. Thousands of lives have been lost, and the earth has been drenched with blood; but still Abraham is unable to conquer the 'rebels,' as he calls the South. The South only asked to be let alone, and to divide the public property equally. It would have been wise in the North to have said to her Southern sisters, 'If you are not content to dwell with us longer, depart in peace. We will divide the inheritance with you, and may you be a great nation.'"

The character of the people of the United States is thus briefly summed up:

"The people are ingenious and enterprising, and are noted for their tact in 'driving a bargain.' They are refined and intelligent on all subjects but that of negro slavery; on this they are mad."

The Southern Confederacy naturally occupies the most prominent place in this "entirely Southern" Geography. The following is the general account of the Confederacy:

"These States lie South of the United States, and possess a warmer country. The latter are mostly suited to raising grain and cattle, while the former grow more cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar-cane, with some cattle and much grain. A large portion of the country lies on the sea-coast, and is level and sandy. The interior portions are hilly and mountainous.

"This country is well watered by large rivers, and has many fine harbors. On some of these harbors are large cities; but the Confederate States possess few ships, and her cities do not grow so fast as if there were more commerce. But we have reason to hope that in a few years we shall not fall behind any nation in point of commerce or ships to carry it on.

"This is a great country! The Yankees thought to starve us out when they sent their ships of war to guard our sea-port towns. But we have learned to make many things; to do without many others; and above all to trust in the smiles of the God of battles. We had few guns, little ammunition, and not much of any thing but food, cotton, and tobacco; but the people helped themselves, and God helped the people. We were considered an indolent, weak people, but our enemies have found us strong because we had justice on our side.

"The Southern people are noted for being high-minded and courteous. A stranger seldom lacks friends in this country. Much of the field work is done by slaves. These are generally well used, and often have as much money as their master and mistresses. They are contented and happy, and many of them are Christians. The sin of the South lies not in holding slaves, but they are sometimes mistreated. Let all the little boys and girls remember that slaves are human, and that God will hold them to account for treating them with injustice.

"The Southern Confederacy is at present a sad country; but President Davis is a good and wise man, and many of the generals and other officers of the army are pious. There are many good praying people in the land; so we may hope that our cause will prosper. 'When the righteous are in authority the nation rejoiceth; but when the wicked bear rule the nation mourneth.' Then remember, little boys, when you are men never to vote for a bad man to govern the country."

Then follow brief accounts of the separate States of the Confederacy, the "inevitable negro," and prophecies of the future, occupying a considerable share of the limited space at the command of the author.

In Virginia we are told:

"The higher class of society is noted for hospitality and high living. Some of these claim to be descended from Pocahontas, which they consider a great honor. The State has many fine rivers; the Potomac and the James are the largest. There are several railroads and canals, and one of the finest harbors in the world. Norfolk was the main sea-port town, and contained a fine navy-yard; but the enemy have spoiled it very much. Richmond city is the capital of the State. President Davis resides there, and Congress meets there to make laws. There is said to be much wickedness in the city.

"There are many planters who own large numbers of slaves. These are generally well treated, and are as happy a people as any under the sun. If they are sick master sends for the doctor; if the crop is short, they are sure of enough to save life; if they are growing old they know they will be provided for; and in time of war they generally remain quietly at home, while the master goes and spills his blood for the country."

In North Carolina—

"The people are noted for their honesty, and for being 'slow but sure.' No braver men fought in the war for independence than those of North Carolina. While some few cowards refused to fight for their country, it is a notable fact that nearly all of them were of the ignorant class, and many of them did not know what patriotism was. We should feel as much pity for them as contempt, because they had not been properly taught. Education was much neglected in the Old North State until within a few years past. She has now as many good schools and colleges as any sister State. Nearly every child can get an education here if he will be industrious. Who will be ignorant?"

South Carolina "is a small State, often called the Palmetto State:"

"This State was the first State to secede. Many persons blamed the South Carolinians for leaving the Union too soon; but it may have been best; it is impossible for us to decide. The war would have come sooner or later. God usually punishes wicked nations by war. I mean by this that when people become too wicked He gives them over to hardness of heart to work out their own punishment, and sometimes destruction. How much better for all to be good!

"The people of this State are noted for their chivalry. You do not understand this? Well, when any one imposes upon them, their motto is to fight. Also if they see a person badly treated, they feel bound to help him. Their leading men have sometimes been called 'hot-heads,' because they are so quick to resent an injury.

"The upper classes are educated and refined, but the poor are generally ignorant. Most of the labor is performed by slaves. These are hardly so well treated as in North Carolina and Virginia; but they have the Gospel preached to them, and are generally contented and happy.

"On the coast lie a chain of beautiful islands, which are covered with live-oak, laurel with blossoms as large as your hat, and the finest fields of sea island cotton. But the enemy have spoiled most of these, and stolen many of the negroes who tilled the land. They told the slaves they were free, and even formed regiments of them to fight their masters. But the negro is too cowardly for a soldier, and so he is of but little service to his Northern friends."

In Alabama "the people are mostly planters, and own many slaves. These are generally well treated, and have the Gospel preached to them." In Louisiana "the people have been robbed and sent from their homes in many cases, and the towns and cities pillaged and burnt;" but the State "has nobly done her part," and has "produced the gallant Beauregard, the General whose name is familiar in every household." Arkansas "has suffered terribly during the war. The enemy have ravaged nearly the whole of it, and the wrongs of the people are heart-rending. But there is a God of Vengeance, and ere long these sufferings will be avenged." Missouri is "the second State in size in the Confederacy. The people were much divided, and did not secede with that unanimity which most of the other States did. But the brave spirits there will yet conquer, and this will be one of the finest States in the Confederacy. The Indians, from Indian Territory, have joined the Southern army, and made themselves useful to our cause."—"Kentucky, like Missouri, was much divided in sentiment when the war broke out; but it is believed that when the matter is left to the people to decide they will declare themselves Southerners. Many of her gallant sons are fighting for Southern rights." Tennessee comes last; and of this State it is said:

"Many hard battles have been fought here during the war of Independence. But though she is oppressed now and suffers much, no one fears for Tennessee. She is nobly doing her part, and when the war is ended she will be one of our best States. Many pure spirits are praying for peace, and if we all humble ourselves as we should we shall soon be blessed with the glorious news. Peace! Peace!! Peace!!! Oh, who will not appreciate Peace when it comes?"

With this pious ejaculation closes Part First. Then comes a series of lessons in the form of question and answer. Of these we extract a few:

"Q.—If the people of the United States had always elected good men for rulers, what would have been the result?

"A.—We should have had no war.

"Q.—Why?

"A.—Because every man would have been willing to treat others justly, and there would have been no cause for war.

"Q.—Are these judgments for our sins alone?

"A.—They are partly for our sins, and partly for the sins of our forefathers.

"Q.—How do the Indians in Georgia stand in regard to the present struggle for independence?

"A.—They take sides with the South, and fight with vengeance.

"Q.—What may be said of the United States?

"A.—It was once the most prosperous country in the world.

"Q.—What is its condition now?

"A.—It is tumbling into ruins.

"Q.—What brought about this great calamity?

"A.—The injustice and avarice of the Yankee nation.

"Q.—Has the Confederate States any commerce?

"A.—A fine inland commerce, and bids fair, some time, to have a grand commerce on the high seas.

"Q.—What is the present drawback to our commerce?

"A.—An unlawful Blockade by the miserable and hellish Yankee Nation."

This last sentence, which closes the work, is so at variance with the pious tone which runs through most of the work, that we are inclined to suspect that it was added by another writer.

THE OUTSIDE WORLD.

A FACT opposed to a popular theory has always a struggle for its existence; and the working woman is such a fact. The theoretic woman is the gentle daughter, sister, or wife, defended from evil within the magic circle of home; and she is certainly more agreeable as an ideal than the wearied, worried, anxious working woman. Nevertheless the working woman is here among us, and in numbers. There are fifty thousand in New York and Philadelphia alone, not including those in domestic service; the mothers, sisters, widows, and wives of soldiers, who died, or were disabled in the cause of the Union; wives and daughters of men whose income died with them; young girls often the sole support of their families; any thing feminine, born or adopted, as a daughter of "the good goddess of Poverty."

Their world is an outside world of cold and darkness, having no point of contact with that woman-world in which women are the objects of the gallantry and solicitude of men. Female operatives are the worst taught and worst paid of the laboring classes. Investigation of their condition amply justifies the "Protective Unions" lately organized in their behalf, and furnishes pregnant matter for appeals through the press and lecture room. Investigation does more. It opens up as intricate a labyrinth as ever puzzled a reformer. The surface evils present enormous difficulties; but coming to tug at them we find that their roots strike down deep into our present system of living, which is not framed to meet the wants of woman as a worker.

The theory of female education, let parents and guardians deny it in what terms of elegant reprobation they will, makes a girl's early life a sort of probation before a marriage by which she is to be supported. Facts prove it. The majority of fathers are not men of wealth, and with a few exceptions no man expects to live forever; so the father educates his son with a view to a trade or a profession. If my young master whippers, shows want of pluck, or flags at his tasks, he is brought up sharply with "And how then do you expect to make your way in the world?" He is early indoctrinated in his future responsibilities, and every successive year is thus made to grind the axe with which the young man is to hew his way through the forest of difficulty.

Is the same anxious foresight exercised in behalf of the daughter, apparently liable to the same conflict, and worse armed by nature for the strife? The average girl is the answer; and it is only adducing facts, that have grown trite from frequent urging, to say that she is generally ignorant of the first principles of that school in which it could harm no woman to take a degree—the Domestic School; that it is a question, if she be any thing but a bungler, at that art of sewing to which women are not born as to breathing; that she has absorbed the miscellaneous mass of so-called accomplishments thrust upon her without reference to her tastes or mental calibre as a sponge does water; and that the two or three years succeeding school life will be tolerably sure to squeeze it all out of her, while her knowledge of the world is only "gleanings" from novels and the masculine element at home. Since our fathers and mothers are not the most heartless in the world, on the contrary, a tender and obedient race, will any one believe, in the face of the facts above stated, that there is deliberately anticipated for this most helpless creature that struggle for which her brother is so carefully armed?

I return to my premises. The practice of female education looks directly and entirely to what its theory so carefully eschews—marriage as woman's resource; and there is required properly to meet the case a husband insured against death, failure, illness, or tendencies to scoundrelism, because, in the event of either contingency, there is no adequate provision for her. Though we concede that a large number of women are born in the deepest poverty, and a large number never achieve marriage, and a large number become widows, or marry unhappily, and that such women are forced into self-dependence, there is a general feeling that business training, capacity, and energy are not for the ideal woman; and any proposition facing squarely the fact of woman as an independent laborer, and providing for its necessities, is met in the main by indifference or decided opposition. I have heard it argued that, by opening to women more avenues of labor at fairer rates, they would be made independent of marriage or unfit for it, and there would be an end of the census—an argument in which, it seems to me, there is only one good thing: the beautiful humility with which gentlemen consider themselves accepted as the least of two evils. I think that men not only wrong themselves by such arguments, but draw their conclusions from mistaken premises and a very limited knowledge of woman nature; for responsibility does not fit on feminine as on masculine shoulders. The majority—and I speak of the most energetic women I have ever known—assume the burden unwillingly, bear it wearily, and would lay it down most gladly; and surely such a woman is capable of an intelligent sympathy with her husband that can not reasonably be expected from the thoughtless and petted wife, who "can not see why Harry should be so tired and grave" ("cross," she calls it) "when he has nothing to do but to lounge down-town a few hours," and can never be made to comprehend that the man constantly carries house, wife, and children on his shoulders. There must be the same difference between the gratitude and tenderness of the two women as between experience and hearsay: the one knowing theoretically that her husband

"Commits his body

To painful labor both by sea and land,
To watch the night in storms, the day in cold, While she lies warm at home safe and secure;"

the other understanding experimentally what is the anxiety of that "labor," and what the severity of those "storms" from which she is so sheltered.

It is conceded that a helper or sympathizer, to be effective, must have some knowledge of what he is to do or speak about, and that a wife is to share and sympathize with the anxieties of her husband. How, then, is it one of her best qualifications to be entirely ignorant of their nature? The intelligent, self-controlled nature is capable of docility, can be moved by reason, can understand an argument, is open to conviction. The ignorant, undeveloped nature, unless a very rare one, is apt to be "mulish"—not a very flattering epithet; but I call multried husbands to testify if there is another word in the English language that so exactly sums the frivolous perversities and shallow wrong-headedness of their pettish and undisciplined wives? Which of the two natures is the true ideal? And if the question was put to ballot whether all women shall be instructed in a trade or profession as a resource in case of emergency, what do you think would be the vote of sick and dying husbands and fathers tormented with anxiety about helpless wives and children?

There are those who say that any effort to extend the province of women is in opposition to the will of God, as expressed in Revelation; but I can not find it so set down. When St. Paul says, "I will that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully," there is not only the law but the prophecy of whatever makes the delight of a woman's life; but there are the women to whom is never given the "house" to guide; there are the widows, some bereaved by death, and some by the devil; some with children, some without; there are the daughters and sisters, who become as mothers to their parents, or the younger members of their family. Is it any where said of these that they shall work at starvation prices, and under every possible condition of hardship? Does God really endow woman alone, out of the whole creation, with faculties which it is a sin for her to use? and does he place her daily and hourly in exigencies which it is a sin for her effectually to meet? In that case there should be only as many women as are quite sure of getting husbands, warranted, of course, to outlive them; for the present system of female labor is a monstrous injustice, and affords opportunity for much actual oppression; and all women should be after one model, for there is now a disheartening amount of power wasted on women.

There are many women whom no application, however conscientious, can make into model housewives and deft seamstresses, as there are many whom no process can turn out in any other shape; there are women with great executive ability, and women with a peculiar aptitude for teaching, and women with a taste for mathematics, and women with a turn for languages, and women with what are called good business heads. The century has been oppressed all at once with a Mrs. Browning, a Jenny Lind, a "George Elliot," a Mrs. Stowe, a Catherine Beecher, a Rosa Bonheur, a "Gail Hamilton," a Harriet Hosmer, a Florence Nightingale, to say nothing of the lesser lights that nearly put our eyes out on every side. Speaking with all due reverence, was it wise of the Lord to bestow these great gifts on women? for He did bestow them. Ought not these women to hide their talents in a napkin, like the man in the parable? If so, then there is better justice done to every frog that has not only disposition and legs but space to jump in; every caterpillar that comes to wings; every salmon that leaps up the falls; every fly that has leave to live its life. If not, if the opportunity for development be accorded to those women to whom God has given genius, is it not just as clearly due to women, to whom God has given labor for their portion? and once concede that it is right for a woman to work at all, and you have conceded that almost every other fact connected with the present system of female labor is wrong.

The very first consequence is the demand that more avenues of industry shall be opened to women who must work, and for whom there is not work enough; and yet our prejudices are a little startled when we find women at occupations more unusual than seamstressing and teaching. I confess to an individual shrinking from the thought of woman on the rostrum—a public speaker addressing a crowd; and yet I hear now of such a woman, who joins a woman's modesty to a rare eloquence, who uses her talents worthily, and who declares that she had tried to earn a living in ways usual to women, and had failed. Which is right, those who think that a woman should never be an orator, or God, who made her an orator? Granting that all women are adapted to the two occupations above quoted, which is by no means the case, all women can not live by them, because the supply of operatives in these departments is already far in advance of the demand. We shirk the fact of woman as a worker, and shrink from educating her to face it. As a consequence, in six cases out of ten, the woman, thrust suddenly down from the niche of home among the rough, struggling crowd in life's arena, finds herself at a loss, her faculties all abroad, and herself compelled to seize on the first method of money-making of which she has or can acquire a smattering. Hence the complaint that the majority of women who apply for employment understand nothing thoroughly. And here is one cause of the fact that female operatives are the worst paid as well as worst taught of the laboring classes.

Moreover, there is an idea extant that it costs a woman less to live than it costs a man; at least that is the excuse with which is glossed over the fact that women, performing the same work equally well, and having the same responsibilities, are paid less than men in similar positions. But the butcher, the baker, the grocer, the landlord, the coal-dealer, the shoemaker, the railroad companies charge her as much for self and children as they would paterfamilias. But granting the excuse. When a man, an institution, or a company pays men in his or its service, they are paid for so much work done. We don't find any body saying to them, "I pay you less to-day because I find it costs you less to live than I thought, and unless I look sharp after you you will be opening a bank account." When the man, company, or institution turns about to pay women for precisely the same work and responsibilities, as well performed and as well met, what has he or they to do with how much it costs a woman to live? Why not pay her also for so much work done, and let her open her bank account if she can? It would be done with the finishing of this paragraph if any of you who have the power could but once comprehend what those three little words, "a struggling life," mean for the majority of women on whose lots they are gravely; and though experience is the only exhaustive illustration, by subtraction and squeezing you may approximate the realizing sense.

Subtract from your own house cleanliness, conveniences, room, and ventilation, till you have reduced it to a room worth six dollars per month in a tenement house. Subtract privacy and quiet, as in such a house every room hears distinctly the clamor in every other room, and the din in the street and surrounding yards. Subtract every mouthful of fresh air, because whatever your personal cleanliness there will pour in at your door and windows the reek of all the unwashed rooms and people, drains, standing pools, horrible cookery, stables, and factories in the neighborhood. Suppose yourself and children there, because at the rate at which you are paid you can afford to live nowhere else. Squeeze out of your life all hope, because by working from early morning often till midnight you can just earn money to remain where you are, and every day you grow weaker. Subtract from your table every thing but poor bread and weak black tea, often without sugar and milk. Subtract from your life all visits, walks, books, newspapers, and rides for self and children, to say nothing of more ambitious pleasures. Subtract from your wardrobe all but the clothes in which you are ashamed to see your children and yourself, and which are to be continually washed, darned, and patched to be kept in their present decency; remembering that, as you are living now up to your last cent, new raiment is, of course, impossible. Squeeze out the strength and elasticity from your body, leaving only a dull sense of aching, fever, fatigue, and sleeplessness.

A frightfully large number of women in this way do achieve the magnificent income of thirty-three cents a day; but as I have not statistics from which to be sure that this is the average we will grant you a little more. Say that you earn from three to four dollars a week. Subtract all cheering prospect for your children; for at the earliest age possible they are to be set at work, to commence for themselves the life that you are now dragging out. You understand perfectly that there is no way out for you. You remember that you walked days in search of employment, and were on the verge of distraction; and considered yourself supremely fortunate to obtain this work, for which you are wretchedly paid, it is true, but you are paid the average price: your employers are fair men. You are not paid in uncurrent money, or cheated out of five or six cents on a dollar, under pretense of a general fund for illness, or obliged to wait two or three weeks for your money, or savagely abused and insulted, as happens to hundreds of others. You are not the exceptional case, but the average working woman, and have been tolerably fortunate, though you do work all the day and late into the night for an existence, in which there is no rest, no change, no pleasure, no beauty, no ease, no improvement, and no special aim or incentive possible beyond the common life-preserving instinct.

I have given an indifferent sketch after all, for I can find nothing gray enough to paint it to the life. There is too much spring and sparkle in our language to express a thing so thoroughly exhausted of flavor, coloring, and sweetness. But even as I outline it you would shudder at the possibility of a similar appeal being made in behalf of your wife and children. You are a wealthy man, a careful man, with property well invested, and every thing insured but said wife and daughters. Your wife is an admirable woman, who leans entirely on you, and who years ago acquired something facetiously styled an "education," which she has been forgetting ever since. Your daughter—I have a little china shepherdess on my table. She has pink cheeks, a simper, a blue kirtle, yellow slippers, and a hollow back. Turn her face to the wall and there is your daughter, in an emergency. You are a safe man; but so was your neighbor Kegge, of the great firm of Barrel and Co. He was President of the Pot of Gold Company, with a capital of five millions; and there was a map of the country around the foot of the rainbow, and a scrap of the rainbow itself, in his office. And yet Kegge's fine brown-stone house stares at you blankly now from out its curtainless windows, and you remember with a chill how you saw Mrs. Kegge stealing away in the twilight with her little ones, and thought, if that were your wife and Jennie! Ah! riches have wings, even when there is no Pot of Gold in the case; thieves break through and steal. Antonio's luck may be yours. And are there so many barriers, after all, between your wife and the working woman of whom we were talking?

At times you are concerned for your Jennie. She is the young lady about whose streamers, frisettes, train hoops, ankles, hats, back-hair, and general coquetry and shallowness, press and people are alternately serious and witty. But has she really any thing else allowed her besides development in back-hair and ends of ribbon? She is a healthy girl, with an exuberance of animal spirits. She is not intellectual: your library is to her the dullest room in the house. She is not musically inclined: she would cheerfully bid her piano good-by forever. The household labor devolves entirely on your servants; the responsibility on her mother. What is left her in life but diamond dust? She has surplus energy, and she works it off in her dresses and her flirtations. Suppose that instead she used it in acquiring the art of, let us say, printing? But now that I have written it I see that it looks absurd in this connection; and yet it is a profitable and desirable art, and would be an admirable thing just now for Arabella Kegge, who last year outshone Jennie at Saratoga.

There are hundreds of Arabella Keggess, who, in their day, have shone with varying degrees of splendor; there are thousands more who have never shone at all, but commenced the battle of life with their first recollection. Some of these find work on the hard and unequal conditions of which we have been speaking; some fail—and yet live—in an abyss of which we know nothing, unless from hints gleaned here and there from daily papers, and the reports of charitable societies. Of these, even while we pity, we may say that no one is forced into crime—that there are always resources—that God deserts no one. But let us also recollect that the devil is old and wise. He might slip into our hands the first stone to throw in behalf of outraged virtue, but he does not come to us, safe at home among our children, with suggestions revolting to womanhood, because that would be sheer waste of temptation. We are in condition to elaborate a dozen different ways out of the dilemma, and can always fall back on the river, which some one declares can always serve woman as a last resource. But the river shows blue and glancing through our windows as we sit and talk of it at our ease—no more like the cold, sullen water washing against the foul wharf than our present physical and mental condition is like that of a woman starved through successive days, benumbed, heart and body, made timid by continual failures and rebuffs, shivering, dying, faint, friendless—urged by instant dread of death, perhaps; frantic, perhaps, for her poor little hungry children, or brothers and sisters, at the end of all her little resources, shifts, and expedients—that is the pass at which hundreds are come, even now, as you read; and at this pass the tempter, repulsed a hundred times before, steps in again.

There are charitable institutions, it is true, and doors that are never closed against the miserable, and ears that are never deaf to a cry for help; and so there are houses, and inns, and fires, and lights, on the very roads on which travelers, bewildered between storm and darkness, walk off precipices, or wander blindly about till overtaken by despair and death; and there are women—you and I, madam, are, of course among them—who are born conquerors; there are women with faith and firmness, clear perceptions, and readiness of resource that nothing can shake; but this is the superior, not the ordinary woman. The only one who has met Satan face to face and conquered enjoined on us all to pray "that we might"—what? always conquer temptation? No; that we may be "delivered from temptation." Our place, then, is not on the judgment-seat, but by the world's highway, where, like the Samaritan, we may find and save those nigh unto death. There are those beyond our help. There are others, urged on behind them by want of all things, whose perilous condition is a direct claim on the interest of any and every woman. If you have not a surplus hour or dollar, you have influence; for if you think rightly you will find that good is just as infectious as evil. You are only a single drop to the stream; true, and the stream is dwindled, and trickles feebly around the old tree trunk imbedded in its midst.

The appeal in behalf of working women is not unfamiliar. From time to time the subject has been spasmodically agitated. Protective Unions have been formed and failed; those of the present day might receive more encouragement. We hear as many discouraging voices as the princess in the Arabian story heard from the stones in the hill. We are told that women are rash, lack self-control, are incapable of combined action, illogical, half-educated. Grant it all. The freedmen called out of yet profounder depths and were heard. It is said that men will oppose the movement; but where women faint and falter men will take the matter up, because the presence of a class in our midst under a pressure of hardship, that is constantly sinking them lower in the scale, is detrimental to the national life; and because it will at last be clearly understood that under the existing order of things no man's wife, sister, or daughter is secure; and so dear drop, though you are but one, do you see how drops rising from the mountain tarn, the meadow brook, the shallow pond, the rushing river, the ocean itself, and adding themselves to other drops, will descend again in a rainy impetus from heaven that will swell the stream to full flood, sweeping the old trunk before it, to strand it on some bank, where, rotting quietly, it shall enrich the earth it once cumbered?

WORKING THE BEADS.

WITH a touch as delicate as the Spring's
Are wakened the beaded blooms,
The fern that waves, and the moss that clings
Grow on the silken glooms,
And a dew of steel is woven in
By the noiseless finger-looms.

Airy festoons of swinging vines,
And butterflies dipped in gold,
And the meeting curves of Gothic lines
Drawn in the days of old,
Glitter in bright and pearly beads
By the quick, white fingers told.

The laugh is gay as the sparkling dyes,
And the wit flies steely-bright,
As pointless needles with broken eyes
Are passed in the failing light,
Till the beaded flowers are gathered up
In their silken folds at night.

I think while the beautiful work is done
Of the arabesques of thought,
I never forget to wind and run
Round the hard lines overwrought,
In life's mixed pattern of good and ill
Daily before me brought.

Here and there are some fadeless leaves
In the stony pattern cold,
And a few green blades give sign of sheaves
If the threaded roots but hold;
And a life perhaps I have beaded o'er
With a beauty not of gold.

Editor's Easy Chair.

JUST as we were commenting last month upon the charming evening reception at the Academy of Design the doors were opening to another evening for the private view of the Forty-first Exhibition. The peculiarity of private views is well known. It is that there is no privacy and no view. There is a gay company moving in a crowd through brilliant rooms, chatting, and glancing sometimes at the walls. But the evening walls of the Academy are dim. The pictures do not show well, and nobody asks that they should. The evening is merely a procession through the rooms, like a march around the table before dinner. You look at the tempting dishes and snuff the savory odors, but you do not propose to taste until you are quietly seated; and it is not on the evening of a private view that you are quietly seated.

The next day, perhaps, or some bewitching April morning—so perfect a swallow that you must needs believe in summer—you ascend those sparkling steps, pass the handsome portal, and taking out your critical pencil, you buy a catalogue. If somebody nudges a friend, and whispers to him as he points furtively at you, "There's a critic," you can hardly resist the temptation of stopping at the head of the grand staircase, and saying audibly to the spectators: "Heaven forbid, gentle Sirs and Mesdames! It is only an observer who likes to look at pictures, and who loves several painters. He has come to look at the exhibition and say what he thinks of it. His opinion is as valuable as that of the next man or woman; and if he expresses it aloud in print, do the types make it any the truer? The types merely lift his voice so that his friends in California, in Maine, in Iowa, and in Texas can hear what he has to say, and learn at least the names of the painters who have maintained or who have begun to make their fame."

Having closed your few remarks you proceed to express your impressions of the pictures in the following manner—the grave, sententious, methodical manner of those admirable but terrible persons who are really critics.

The Forty-first Exhibition of the National Academy of Design is now open. It is not superior to some late previous exhibitions, but there seem to us to be fewer very poor pictures. The full-length portrait is absent this year, which is a pleasant variety; and the old distribution of the pictures into portraits and landscapes is fairly abolished by the increasing number of interesting genre subjects and of special scenes.

Mr. Heade's "Brazilian Humming-Birds" are very interesting from the novelty of the subject and the delicate fidelity of the treatment; and "Rural Felicity," by Howard Hill, is a careful and conscientious picture of a familiar scene. In the same outer gallery hangs a bold charcoal drawing, evidently a portrait, by Wm. M. Hunt, who in the large room has another portrait. They are both free and vigorous, and show Mr. Hunt's admiration of the French school in which he was trained. An absolute contrast to this school in the spirit and philosophy of art is found in the pencil drawing of a Cat by Miss M. J. McDonald, and "Strawberry Leaves" by R. J. Pattison, who also exhibits an "Oriole" and a "Tortoise." These last are strictly of the Pre-Raphaelite style; but better than either is "Young Mullen" by the same artist. Mullen could hardly be more accurately represented. But the stones in the "Oriole" are not readily recognized as such. Miss McDonald's drawing is painfully elaborate and true. It is a pity that the skill had not been devoted to a more interesting subject; but much may be anticipated of so patient a talent and so faithful an eye.

In the "Interior of St. Marks" Mr. David D. Neal attracts the eye by a most careful study of the old church, skillfully executed. Near by Mr. Elliott's bold and broad touch assures us that he means still to dispute the palm of the master of portraits, while Mr. Eastman Johnson hangs a tender little song upon the walls in "Comfort in Weariness." It is a young mother in a poor room bent across the cradle of her infant. Every detail is affectionately painted, and with that exquisite freedom from exaggeration which shows calm and conscious power. The exact contrast of this impression is produced by Mr. E. Benson's "Cloud Towers," which must be called a strictly sensational picture. Mr. Johnson's two other works in the exhibition, "Sunday Morning" and "Fiddling his Way," are equally delightful. The latter, of course, from the similarity of the subject, recalls Wilkie's Blind Fiddler, but Mr. Johnson's is as purely American as Wilkie's is Scotch. The eye and heart would never tire of either. The exquisite skill with which the various aspects of childish pleasure are appreciated and represented in "Fiddling his Way" is sustained in "Sunday Morning" by a kindred insight. The youth leaning back in his chair and twirling the ring upon his finger, the sweet, sober maiden at his side, the utter jollity of the two frolicsome but quiet children behind their mother, the old people and the younger, and the very Sunday in the air, which broods over the picture, are all charming and simple and obvious, but to show them as they are, that is to paint pictures.

In "The Gun Foundry," by J. F. Weir, we have a striking picture by a son whose promise illuminates his father's fame. In the exhibitions of twenty years ago the father's pictures were always notable, and it is now clear that in future exhibitions the son's are to be so. Mr. Weir has chosen for his subject the interior of the Cold Spring Foundry at the moment of casting a huge Parrott gun. In the fore-ground the stalwart workmen are superintending the pouring of the molten metal into the mould. The glare is fierce, the sparks fly upward into the vast dusky heights of the building, while far away in the distance other workmen at other furnaces are revealed like Cyclops at their toil. As in witnessing the scene itself, so in looking at the picture the music of Schiller's Song of the Bell begins to roll through your mind. The subject is treated with the closest fidelity. It is a transcript of the actual grim and glowing event, and not adorned, as in Turner's daring picture of the casting of Wellington's statue, by any purely fanciful accessories.

Near by hangs Mr. Winslow Homer's "Brush Harrow." The tone of this picture is very low—too low, it seems to us—but the healthful reality of all Mr. Homer's works is delightful. Indeed his other contribution, "Prisoners from the Front," is to many the most thoroughly pleasing picture in the Exhibition. It is not large, but it is full of character and interest. A group of rebel prisoners confront a young Union General, who questions them. The central figure of the group is a young South Carolinian of gentle breeding and graceful aspect, whose fair hair flows backward in a heavy sweep, and who stands, in his rusty gray uniform, erect and defiant, without insolence, a truly chivalric and manly figure. Next him, on the right, is an old man, and beyond him the very antipodal figure of the youth in front—a "corn-cracker"—rough, uncouth, shambling, the type of those who have been true victims of the war and of the slavery that led to it. At the left of the young Carolinian is a Union soldier—one of the Yankees, whose face shows why the Yankees won, it is so cool and clear and steady. Opposite this group stands the officer with sheathed sword. His composed, lithe, and alert figure, and a certain grave and cheerful confidence of face, with an air of reserved and tranquil power, are contrasted with the subdued eagerness of the foremost prisoner. The men are both young; they both understand each other. They may be easily taken as types, and, without effort, final victory is read in the aspect of the blue-coated soldier. It will not diminish the interest of the picture if the spectator should see in the young Union officer General Barlow.

Mr. S. R. Gifford's rich yellow "October Afternoon" is mellow and broad. The warm, gorgeous light hangs over the boundless woods pierced by the gleaming stream; but there is an air of "composition" in the picture which harms it, although it has all the characteristic excellences of the artist's manipulation. The collection of Mr. Suydam's pictures tenderly recalls that modest man, that sincere and devoted artist, whose spotless memory will be always faithfully cherished by his companions of the Academy. The pictures are among his best in that special line of tranquil coast scenery of which he was so fond.

In a certain tenderness and tranquillity of feeling Mr. Suydam's pictures always suggest those of his friend Kensett, of whom he was so fond, and who exhibits a "Lake George," full of his peculiar merits. There is an exquisiteness of sentiment in the forms of this picture which is the truest mark of Kensett's hand, and which none of his friends surpass; and with it is that sincerity which is the chief charm in every work of art. Mr. Elihu Vedder's "Monk in Tuscany" is, like his "Fiesole Landscape near Florence," full of a broad clear daylight. Both are bold and of a masterly firmness, and the monk is a work thoroughly characteristic of Italy, like a scrap of Browning. So, too, in Mr. Cranch's "In the Harbor of Venice," which is the best work exhibited by him for some time; there is a local feeling as well as specific fidelity which are truly charming. Mr. Cranch has so thoroughly "felt" Venice that his Venetian pictures are very satisfactory. Mr. Church exhibits only one small picture—"A Glimpse of the Caribbean Sea from the Jamaica Mountains;" but from some peculiarity of treatment the curve of the distant shore seen from above looks like a precipice in profile, and singularly confuses the eye. But the tropical character of the Gulf scenery is unerringly represented by the obedient hand of the master who has so carefully studied it. Mr. Hennessy's "In Memoriam" is a delicate, ghostly work, but the fancy is not agreeable, while his "Drifting" is one of his most delightful works. A youth stretched in the bow of a boat gazes at two maidens seated in the stern, and all of them drift upon a sluggish stream by a twilight pasture, over which the watery moon is rising. It is in his best vein. So is Mr. Griswold's—"The Last of the Ice." A gray fog muffles the headlands of the river, upon which float a few fragments of ice. Mr. Griswold already stands among the first of the landscapists.

But what shall we do? We are only at the entrance of the large room, where hang portraits by Huntington and Hicks and Stone and Elliott and Hunt, and Mayer's "Love's Melancholy," and Gignoux's large picture of Mont Blanc, and Cropsey's "Gettysburg," and M'Entee's autumnal landscapes, full of the very soul of October; and beyond is the West Room, with some of Colman's Spanish architecture and young Parton's "Adirondack," and a cloud more of works that can not even be named. Of what we mention we can not speak further, except to say that the painters still hold their own.

You see, Sirs and Mesdames, that it is not a critic who has been strolling through the rooms. It is only a visitor like yourselves, who looks thankfully at the feast of color and form so plenteously spread, and departs grateful for the enjoyment. He sees, not without regret, that the Pre-Raphaelite brethren are very imperfectly represented—that Leutze is altogether absent, and that Gray has but three cabinet portraits. But there can be no doubt of the greater general richness of development which the Exhibition of 1866 indicates. Academies may not make great artists; but this Academy certainly gives them a chance to show what they have done.

FIFTY-SIX years ago Thomas Carlyle, a boy of fourteen, came to Edinburgh University. George III. was completing the fiftieth year of his reign. Wellington was drawing the lines of Torres Vedras. Napoleon was at the height of his power, and England at the depth of her weakness. The Tory Quarterly had been established the year before. Scott's "Lady of the Lake" was just published, and Byron was writing "Childe Harold." Between that time and this, more than half a century, the young student has placed his name among the first of Scotland, and will be always recognized as one of the masters of literature in his century.

But those who remember with what a fresh and stirring voice, like the note of a bugle at morning, Carlyle awakened their hope and faith and enthusiasm—who recall how gladly and confidently they leaned upon the vigorous, manly arm of the Mentor who was to guide them safely through the bewildering charms of Calypso's isle, and whose steady reproving eye would surely reduce every fair and false Lamia to the snake, can not but read with inexpressible sadness the words in which he spoke to the youth of to-day at his late inauguration as Rector of the University of Edinburgh. But before we speak of them let us see him as he was described by a shrewd observer when his moment came to speak:

"Mr. Carlyle rose at once, shook himself out of his gold-laced rectorial gown, left it on his chair, and stepped quietly to the table, and drawing his tall, bony frame into a position of straight perpendicularity not possible to one man in five hundred at seventy years of age, he began to speak quietly and distinctly, but nervously. There was a slight flush on his face, but he bore himself with composure and dignity, and in the course of half an hour he was obviously beginning to feel at his ease, so far, at least, as to have adequate command over the current of his thought. He spoke on quite freely and easily, hardly ever repeated a word, never looked at a note, and only once returned to finish up a topic from which he had deviated. He apologized for not having come with a written discourse. It was usual, and 'it would have been more comfortable for me just at present;' but he had tried it and could not satisfy himself, and 'as the spoken word comes from the heart,' he had resolved to try that method. What he said in words will be learned otherwise than from me. I could not well describe it; but I do not think I ever heard any address that I should be so unwilling to blot from my memory. Not that there was much in it that can not be found in his writings, or inferred from them; but the manner of the man was a key to the writings, and for naturalness and quiet power I have never seen any thing to compare with it. He did not deal in rhetoric. He talked—it was continuous, strong, quiet talk—like a patriarch about to leave the world to the young lads who had chosen him and were just entering the world. His voice is a soft, downy voice—not a tone in it of the shrill, fierce kind that one would expect it to be in reading the latter-day pamphlets. There was not a trace of effort or of affectation, or even of extravagance. Shrewd common-sense there was in abundance. There was the involved disrupted style also, but it looked so natural that reflection was needed to recognize in it that very style which purists find to be un-English and unintelligible. Over the angles of this disrupted style rolled not a few cascades of humor—quite as if by accident. He let them go, talking on in his soft, downy accents, without a smile; occasionally for an instant looking very serious, with his dark eyes beating like pulses, but generally looking merely composed and kindly, and, so to speak, father-like. He concluded by reciting his own translation of a poem of Goethe:

The future hides in it good hap and sorrow.

And this he did in a style of melancholy grandeur not to be described, but still less to be forgotten. It was then alone that the personality of the philosopher and poet were revealed continuously in his manner of utterance. The features of his face are familiar to all from his portraits. But I do not think any portrait, unless, perhaps, Woolner's medallion, gives full expression to the resolution that is visible in his face. Besides, they all make him look sadder and older than he appears. Although he be three-score and ten his hair is still abundant and tolerably black, and there is considerable color in his cheek. Not a man of his age on that platform to-day looked so young; and he had done more work than any ten on it."

We can not feel with the acute analyst of Carlyle in the April North American that he has become mechanical or factitious. It is the same face we knew, but grown haggard instead of hopeful, gloomy instead of glowing. The inextricable snarl of things at which his youth protested with a fire that foreshadowed the power to consume has conquered him, and he lies prostrate, but it is the sinewy form of a true warrior that we see.

It is true that he seems to acknowledge no power now but brute force; but it is that force inspired with a sincere and even religious purpose of doing the best that the wretched circumstances allow. The enormity that one human will should assert itself remorselessly by shot and shell, that a worm should ape divinity and prove its Godhead by stinging, does not appall him. His rage with weakness, with error, with stupidity, is so overpowering that he becomes vindictive; and even innocence, if weak, becomes to him despicable, not because he hates innocence, but because weakness is the source of such infinite perplexity. On the other hand, it is not the brutishness of the force, it is its energy, its organizing and executive quality, its yea for yea, and nay for nay, its positive determination, without which, somewhere, the whole scheme of things drifts to destruction, which commands his fierce applause. The world has become to him a gladiatorial arena—it is a vast humming Coliseum, and when the vanquished falls Carlyle turns his terrible thumb and shrieks for the death-blow. Yet he would as willingly see the victor vanquished. It is the power he applauds. If the stricken fighter rests upon his hand, this heart, indignant at the human folly that makes the scene possible, is steeled, and by tragical inversion of feeling, sneers at the deepest, divinest emotion of the spectacle as sentimentality. So at last the genius that vindicated Burns has come to shout hosannas to Frederick the Great. The hand that describes with painful detail the conquest of Saxony and the causeless campaigns in Silesia, protrudes from the dust bins in which it is fumbling to snap its fingers at the civil war in America as the burning of a foul chimney. There is no more pitiful tale in literature than that of Thomas Carlyle; and so deep is the sense of his sincerity that indignation is lost in sadness.

"And sees his young barbarians all at play,"

His Edinburgh discourse was spoken without notes, and occupied an hour and a half. He inculcated diligence, honesty, fidelity, obedience, humility, and, before all and over all, silence. "Silence is the eternal duty of a man." Oratory, in his judgment, is Beelzebub's most efficient organ at the present time. England and America are two great countries, but they are gone mostly away to wind and tongue. Health, too, that is half the game. You must keep your health if you would do any thing. But if you propose to do any thing you must not expect to keep your health. There are a few great books which every man should read, and Carlyle said nobly that the end of study is not knowledge but wisdom.

As for government, Thomas Carlyle's doctrine is Louis Napoleon's Cæsarism. There is something exquisitely absurd in his sitting at the feet of the hero of Strasbourg and Boulogne. The man who by hook or by crook can succeed in making himself Dictator, he is the man for your homage. His illustration, however, is not Julius Cæsar or Napoleon, but Oliver Cromwell. And then, he quotes Machiavelli against Democracy. He does not ask his hearers to agree with the Italian, but it was nevertheless Machiavelli's opinion that the mass of men can not govern themselves. Undoubtedly; and it was also the opinion of Lord Eldon, and Lord Sidmouth, and Lord Londonderry, and Lord Normanby—of George III. also, and Dr. Johnson—of King Bomba, and Count Bismarck. Cavour, we imagine, was quite as wise as Machiavelli. What did Cavour think of Cæsarism?

No preacher of the church of Cæsar ever attempts to answer the one vital question—how is he to be found without deranging the whole order of society? Select any Cæsar you please, Julius or Napoleon, or Frederick, or Cromwell, the best of them, or the present French representative of that rôle; they all come to the purple through crimson. The state is torn by a sharp civil war, and a certain executive energy and military genius and indomitable purpose enable Cæsar to emerge and constrain anarchy as he chooses. But these divine gifts of the dictator are individual. They can not be transmitted. They can not be known even until occasion proves them. When the individual dies, therefore, since masses of men can not govern themselves, they must relapse into anarchy until the heaven-appointed successor rises to the surface. But is it, after all, the perfection of wisdom to fire your house whenever a fire-engine gives out for the mere purpose of discovering which of the remainder has the longest squirt? If the Court may be supposed to know some law, the world, if not very wise, may be supposed to have learned something. The question is not whether a good governor is a good governor, but whether Caesarism has any where established permanent and progressive peace and justice. It is no answer to say that popular governments do not escape war and trouble. That the new shoes pinch does not prove that the old shoes did not leak.

Mr. Carlyle in this address is, as usual, the laureate of silence; indeed he talked for an hour and a half mainly to inculcate silence as the cardinal virtue. He was grimly witty about it, and it must have been delightful to hear the scornful thunders of his Scottish brogue against talking. "Oh, it is a dismal chapter all that," he exclaimed, "if one went into it—what has been done by rushing into fine speech.... There is very great necessity, indeed, of getting a little more silent than we are. It seems to me the finest nations in the world, the English and the American, are going all away into wind and tongue. But it will appear sufficiently tragical by-and-by, long after I am away out of it. Silence is the eternal duty of a man.... If a good speaker—an eloquent speaker—is not speaking the truth, is there a more horrid kind of object in creation?.... An excellent speaker of that kind is, as it were, saying, 'Ho, every one that wants to be persuaded of the thing that is not true, come hither!' I would recommend you to be very chary of that kind of excellent speech."

This must have been extremely entertaining to hear, but who is the orator? He is a man who for nearly forty years has been an incessant talker. He has talked often wisely, powerfully, sometimes scornfully and sadly; and that he might be heard the further he has talked with his pen rather than his tongue. For what is speech? Is it not addressing human beings in words; and is a word less forcible or foolish or persuasive because it is written instead of spoken? What are the splendid volumes with which Carlyle's genius has enriched English literature but his spoken opinions upon the subjects that interest him, and upon which he wishes to affect the minds of his countrymen and mankind? And what else are Mr. Gladstone's speeches, or Mr. Bright's, or Lord Derby's?

But there is another point to be considered in the midst of this loud declamation in favor of silence. If England and America are indeed the finest countries in the world, they are so because of speech and not of silence. They are so because they invite every man to say his say; to out with it, and not repress and suppress until the forces which can not always be more and more restrained explode the whole system of things into chaos. Asia is your silent country. Africa is the mother of silence. How does civilization like them? Count Bismarck means to make Prussia silent if he can. Count Bismarck is merely sitting on the safety-valve, and if he perseveres he or his successor will suddenly go flying skyward in several pieces. In this country, too, we had a system that imposed silence. Speech was as fatal to it as a spark to gunpowder. But speech touched it, and has blown it to destruction with a report distinctly audible to the Rector and faculty of the University of Edinburgh.

The truth is that speech is the salvation of civilization; and in every country we say better foolish speech than none at all, for the liberty of speech and nothing else secures the peaceful progress of society. Why, then, should so tremendous a talker as Carlyle, who has talked so much and so effectively, so vociferously talk against talking?

Of the many wise and witty and useful lessons in the discourse we do not speak, for we hope they have been faithfully read and pondered by all those who do not allow any wild phrase of so true a genius to obscure the value of such criticism as Carlyle's.

MR. DICKENS evidently seems so persuaded that Americans are hostile to him, and he has unquestionably for so long a time cherished a feeling toward us which is not exactly friendly, that he is not very likely to cross the sea again to visit us. Yet now that the war has antiquated and made obsolete so much that preceded it, we can surely, on our side, forget any quarrel with Dickens. If he did draw Elijah Pogram, we sat for the portrait; and sharp and scornful as many of his criticisms were, we can hardly deny that the facts justified, and alas! too often justify, them.

If he should, however, come to us and read as he does in London from his own works, his success would be so immense that it would surely tempt him could he understand it. In Lady Geraldine's Courtship Mrs. Browning declares that but Dickens's great dramatic genius enables him to read his own works as no one else can. The most delightful account of a reading by him was published a few years ago in this Magazine, and it has long been one of the good fortunes of travel to happen to be in London when he gives an evening. The charm is apparently inexhaustible. For an evening or for twenty evenings it is equally fascinating. Indeed we have been reminded of the pleasure we lose and the profit he loses by observing in a late letter from London that Mr. Dickens had reappeared after a considerable absence from the platform. The writer says:

"Charles Dickens gave one of his readings on Wednesday last—the first for more than two years—at Myddelton Hall, Islington, in aid of the funds of a local charity. The place was fairly mobbed. Dickens will be 54 years old next Wednesday. He was born February 7, 1812. It may hardly be news to speak of his personal appearance, but here it is: He is on the short side of middle height, his hair and beard almost or quite gray, the latter worn after the French or American fashion, with shaven cheeks, the former brought forward and, I should think, elaborately oiled. His eyes are dark, handsome, and vivacious, the lines below and about them deeply defined; the eyebrows appeared thick and arched to semicircularity, though this might be from his mobility of features in reading. His nose is of no particular recognized order, odd and full at the nostrils, the humorous line running from them to the corners of the mouth very marked and noticeable. His complexion is not very clear, and reddish about the rather sunken cheeks. He dresses in good taste, quietly, with dainty linen."

THE Easy Chair has often mentioned the Century Club, the Club that especially and fondly preserves the traditions of literature and art, counting among its members most of the conspicuous artists and many of the authors of the city of New York. A Centurian of fifteen or twenty years' membership recalls many an evening, many a feast, which are registered in memory with golden letters. One such recently occurred on the birthday of Shakespeare, the three hundred and second anniversary, when a dinner was eaten in memory of the poet.

The table was laid in the great room of the Club, a noble banquetting-hall, and forty or fifty guests sat down. Lang, the genial, the joyous, the nimble-fingered, had boldly sketched a transparency representing the man of men sitting among the chief contemporary actors of his plays. In front of it sat the President of the Century, Mr. Bancroft, with Mr. Bryant at his right. At one end of the long table sat the biographer and commentator, the head of the illustrious class of Shakespeare's scholars, Richard Grant White, and at the other end a faithful student and lover of the Swan, Judge Daly. Around them and along the tables were ranged representatives of every pursuit, a merry, sympathetic company. The delicate bill of fare was adorned with lines and phrases from Shakespeare felicitously selected by Mr. White, and excluding all that had ever done duty at any similar feast of the Century; and all were cheerfully chatty and happy except the doomed few whose abstracted eyes sweeping the ceiling and moody faces purged of pleasure, plainly revealed that they were to offer a few unpremeditated remarks when the fatal hour of dessert should strike.

It struck. The table rang and jarred with applause as the President arose, and in words pardonably proud and congratulatory recited the extraordinary claims of Shakespeare to the homage and love of mankind, in response to the first toast, which was simply the poet's name. "The commentators" followed, and in a vein of pleasant humor Judge Daly proved with magisterial dignity and professional acuteness that the bard had distinctly mentioned three of the commentators to be. It was excellent jesting, and the company heartily applauded the ingenious fun. Then came "The Century," and Mr. Bryant, who had not known that he was to speak, replied in a few words, saying that the drama generally reached its perfect development in the earlier years of a nation, and flourished but for a short time, and then by easy approaches he alighted upon the kindred arts, related that a famous foreigner had told him that landscape art was to have its finest development in America, and, sitting down, called upon Bierstadt and Kensett to finish his speech. Kensett politely yielded to Bierstadt. Bierstadt courteously waived his right in favor of President Huntington of the Academy, and he, in a few words, declared his belief that the famous foreigner was right, and pleasantly deprecated any artistic depression arising from undue severity of criticism as unjust in the artists to themselves and their mistress, Nature. To "The Drama" Dr. Lieber responded with thought and learning; and the last regular toast "Woman" was also acknowledged, but how could it be adequately answered, for who of us "is equal to these things?"

Rev. Dr. Francis Vinton, who had come in late from the feast of St. George, which is always held upon Shakespeare's night, was then summoned, and spoke like a father—of the church—to the birthday revelers. Then Mr. White disclosed the curious and interesting fact, that in all Shakespeare's poems, whether plays or sonnets, there is no abstract praise of woman except in the passage from "Love's Labor Lost," which was the motto of the toast:

"From woman's eyes this doctrine we derive,
They sparkle still the true Promethean fire;
They are the books, the art, the academes,
That show, contain, and nourish all the world."

Lovers praise their mistresses in all the plays; but the judgments of women other than that are the reverse of flattery. Mr. White, as his life of the poet shows, is of opinion that Shakespeare's early experience with Anne Hathaway and his blighted or unsatisfactory domestic life explain this phenomenon, although, of course, he feels with all the world that the creator of Virgilia and Cordelia revered the womanly nature as few men have. The lawyers have always a special interest in Shakespeare, and the President called Mr. William E. Curtis to speak for the Bar; and after a few words from Mr. Bayard Taylor in response to the President's summons, the last motto of the "Fruits and Pastry" upon the bill was verified—

"You have now a broken banquet."

WHILE still wondering at what Mr. White, the most competent of authorities, said of the strain in which women are mentioned—not created—in Shakespeare, this little song comes fluttering as if to put into music that feeling of the weird craft of woman. But, after all, it is not a woman, it is only a siren:

"LA SIRENE.

"Over the goblet, filled to the brim,
She sends a bewildering glance to him.

"Over the sea of pink-foaming wine
He reels in the light of her beauty divine.

"Deeper and deeper she dreamily dips
In the rose-tinted wine her rose-tinted lips;

"While over the glass she airily laughs
A pledge which he eagerly catches and quaffs;

"And he drinks in a madness wilder than wine
Through her smile, and her eyes bewildering shine.

"He drinks in delirium, danger, and death,
As over the goblet comes floating her breath;

"As over the flagon of rose-colored bliss
She wickedly, witchingly, wafts him a kiss.

"Then laughing a laugh derisive and sweet,
She is gone while he kneels in despair at her feet."

THE buds and blossoms of spring were backward this year. The northerly and easterly winds blew chill in the very face of the May queen, and the elms reluctantly unfolded their leaves. But already the promise of the orchards is plain, and unless the wise men are at fault we shall rejoice in a copious ruddy crop.

If the cholera hangs, a menacing shadow over the opening summer, we must remember how much of its terrors knowledge has shorn away. The dumb, dull terror before a mysterious pestilence has given way to the science and skill which steal its venom as the rod draws the sting from the thunder-bolt. The signs of the danger and the means of prevention and of relief have been made so intelligible and accessible, that the coming of cholera can be viewed with equanimity and even cheerful defiance.

Yet it will always be a shameful fact that when it arrived in the bay of New York we were really not ready for it. With a shiftlessness that is almost incredible there were no accommodations for the sick but an old hulk, the Falcon, which was not ready, and did not receive the patients until two nights after the arrival of the infected ship. Yet we had had a year's warning! If a man managed his private business as public matters of this kind are managed, he would fail, and always deserve to fail.

Let us hope that the terrors of the summer may not be what many fear—and, as we survey the whole country, trust that the good sense which is the main-stay of human affairs may be as conspicuous in relieving us from national trouble as from the breath of the pestilence.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 2d of May. The most important features of the month are the continued want of harmony between the views of Congress and of the President, as evinced in the passage of the Civil Rights bill notwithstanding his veto; various financial measures proposed; the projects for Reconstruction of the Union; the understanding between France and the United States in regard to the French occupation of Mexico; and the critical state of affairs in Europe, growing out of the dispute between Prussia and Austria.

THE PEACE PROCLAMATION.

On the 2d of April, the anniversary of the capture of Richmond, the President issued a Proclamation declaring the civil war at an end. The Proclamation recites the principal Executive and Legislative acts recognizing the existence of the war: (1.) President Lincoln's Proclamation of April 19, 1861, declaring that in seven States "the laws of the United States were opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed by combinations too powerful to be opposed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals by law." (2.) The Proclamation of August 16, 1861, declaring the inhabitants of eleven States "to be in a state of insurrection against the United States." (3.) The Proclamation of July 1, 1862, declaring that, with certain exceptions, "the insurrection still existed in the States aforesaid." (4.) The Proclamation of April 2, 1863, repeating in effect this last Proclamation. (5.) The so-called "Crittenden and Johnson resolution," passed by the House July 22, and by the Senate July 25, 1861, that the war has been forced upon the country by disunionists in the Southern States now in revolt, and that "this war is not prosecuted on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and all the laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease." This resolution, the President considers, "may be regarded as having expressed the sense of Congress upon the subject to which it relates." The Proclamation then declares:

"Whereas, By my Proclamation of the 15th day of June last the insurrection in the State of Tennessee was declared to have been suppressed, the authority of the United States therein to be undisputed, and such United States officers as had been duly commissioned to be in the undisputed exercise of their official functions; and

"Whereas, There now exists no organized armed resistance of misguided citizens or others to the authority of the United States, in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida, and laws can be sustained and enforced therein by the proper civil authority, State or Federal, and the people of the said States are well and loyally disposed, and have conformed or will conform in their legislation to the condition of affairs growing out of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting Slavery within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States; and

"Whereas, In view of the before-recited premises it is the manifest determination of the American people that no State of its own will has the right or power to go out of, or separate itself from, or be separated from the American Union, and that, therefore, each State ought to remain and constitute an integral part of the United States; and

"Whereas, The people of the several before-mentioned States have, in the manner aforesaid, given satisfactory evidence that they acquiesce in this sovereign and important resolution of the national unity; and

"Whereas, It is believed to be a fundamental principle of government that people who have revolted, and who have been overcome and subdued, must either be dealt with so as to induce them voluntarily to become friends, or else they must be held by absolute military power, or devastated so as to prevent them from ever again doing harm as enemies, which last-named policy is abhorrent to humanity and freedom; and

"Whereas, The Constitution of the United States provides for constituent communities only as States, and not as Territories, Dependencies, Provinces, or Protectorates; and

"Whereas, Such constituent States must necessarily be, and by the Constitution and laws of the United States are, made equals, and placed on a like footing as to political rights, immunities, dignity, and power with the several States with which they are united; and

"Whereas, The observance of political equality as a principle of right and justice is well calculated to encourage the people of the aforesaid States to be and become more and more constant and persevering in their renewed allegiance; and

"Whereas, Standing armies, military occupation, martial law, military tribunals, and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are, in time of peace, dangerous to public liberty, incompatible with the individual rights of the citizens, contrary to the genius and spirit of our free institutions, and exhaustive of the national resources, and ought not therefore to be sanctioned or allowed, except in cases of actual necessity for repelling invasion or suppressing insurrection or rebellion; and

"Whereas, The policy of the Government of the United States, from the beginning of the insurrection to its overthrow and final suppression, has been in conformity with the principles herein set forth and enumerated;

"Therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare that the insurrection which heretofore existed in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida, is at an end, and henceforth to be so regarded."

It will be noted that in this Proclamation no mention is made of Texas; for the reason that State had not at the time adopted a Constitution embodying the conditions considered essential for its recognition. The State Convention was however in session, and a few days after framed a Constitution, which is to be submitted to the people on the fourth Monday in June. This Constitution abolishes slavery, and provides that:

"Africans and their descendants shall be protected in their rights of person and property by appropriate legislation; they shall have the right to contract and be contracted with; to sue and be sued; to acquire, hold, and transmit property; and all criminal prosecutions against them shall be conducted in the same manner as prosecutions for like offenses against the white race, and they shall be subject to like penalties."

PASSAGE OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

The Civil Rights Bill, which was vetoed by the President, has passed both Houses of Congress by more than the requisite majority of two-thirds, and has consequently become a law. In the Senate, April 4, Mr. Trumbull, of Ohio, spoke in favor of the passage of the Bill. He reviewed at length the President's objections. He argued that by the Constitution, and by the general policy of the Government, all persons born within the United States, slaves only excepted, were citizens of the United States, and therefore of necessity of the several States in which they resided; but that the right of citizenship did not involve political rights, or rather privileges, such as the right of voting and holding office. The right to hold office under the Federal Government depends upon the Constitution of the United States, the right to vote and hold office in the States depends upon the legislatures of the several States. Thus a naturalized citizen could not be elected President, and must have resided a certain number of years in the country in order to be eligible as a member of Congress. But citizenship did involve certain rights; and this Bill was framed to secure the fundamental rights to all citizens in every State. Mr. Trumbull denied that the second section of the Bill did, as affirmed by the President, discriminate in favor of colored persons. The very object of the Bill was, he said, to do away with all discrimination. It was indeed designed for the benefit of the colored race, but this was simply because in certain cases he was discriminated against by State laws. Remedial laws like this were designed for the relief of those who needed relief; and when this was afforded they stood upon precisely the same footing with those who needed no relief. The President's objection that the Bill punished by fine and imprisonment those who made laws discriminating against persons on account of race or color was pronounced futile, for it imposed punishment upon those only who subjected any person to different punishment on account of race or color. The offense was the subjecting a colored person to discriminating punishment. Now to constitute an offense there must be not only an act, but a vicious intent in performing the act; so that a judge or officer who should execute such a law would not of necessity be punished therefor. If he acted innocently he would not be liable; but if he acted viciously and corruptly he ought to be punished. To the President's objection, founded on the number of officials required to execute the provisions of the Bill, Mr. Trumbull replied that it "was all copied from the statute known as the Fugitive Slave Law: machinery in itself always held to be constitutional and proper, and now used in the interest of freedom, as it originally was in the interest of slavery. As our soldiers employed the weapons we received from the rebels in putting down the rebellion, so the weapons of the law were sanctified in uses of freedom." Other provisions, to which the President objected, such as that for employing the army and navy in executing the law, were declared to be taken verbally from former laws to which no objections had been made. Mr. Trumbull went on to say that the Bill, which was drawn up by himself, was framed in accordance with what were supposed to be the President's views; that it was submitted to him substantially as it now stands; that he was requested, if he "had any objections to any of its provisions, that he would make them known to the friends of the Bill, in order that they might be remedied, if not destructive of the measure; for there was believed to be no disposition on the part of Congress, and certainly none on my [Mr. Trumbull's] part, to have bills presented to him which he did not approve. He never indicated to me, nor, as far as I know, to any of his friends, the least objection to any of the provisions of the Bill till after its passage. How could he, consistently with himself? The Bill was framed, as it was supposed, in entire harmony with his views, and certainly in harmony with what he was then and has since been doing in protecting freedmen in their civil rights, all through the rebellious States. It was strictly limited to the protection of the civil rights belonging to every freeman, the birth-right of every American citizen, and carefully avoided conferring or interfering with political rights or privileges of any kind. The Bill neither confers nor abridges the rights of any one, but simply declares that in civil rights there shall be an equality among all classes of citizens, and that all alike shall be subject to the same punishments in every State. All that is required is, that in this respect the law shall be impartial."

Mr. Trumbull animadverted in severe terms upon the general course of the President, and especially of "the spirit of his veto message; of the dangerous doctrines it promulgates; of the inconsistencies and contradictions of its author; of his encroachments upon the constitutional rights of Congress; of his assumption of unwarranted powers, which, if persevered in and not checked by the people, must eventually lead to a subversion of the Government and the destruction of liberty." He quoted from a speech of Mr. Johnson, then a Senator, upon the veto by President Buchanan of the Homestead Bill, in which he said, "The President of the United States presumes—yes, Sir, I say presumes—to dictate to the American people and to the two Houses of Congress, in violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution, that this measure shall not become a law. . . . I hope the Senate and House of Representatives, who have sanctioned this Bill by more than a two-thirds majority, will, according to the Constitution, exercise their privilege and power, and let the Bill become a law of the land, according to the high behest of the American people." Mr. Trumbull concluded his speech by saying:

"This Bill in no manner interferes with the municipal regulations of any State which protects all alike in their rights of person and property. It could have no operation in Massachusetts, New York, Illinois, or most of the States of the Union. How preposterous, then, to charge that unless some State can have and exercise the right to punish somebody or to deny to somebody a civil right on account of his color, that its rights as a State will be destroyed! It is manifest that unless this Bill can be passed nothing can be done to protect the freedmen in their liberty and their rights. Whatever may have been the opinion of the President at one time as to good faith requiring the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, it is now manifest, from the character of the objections to this Bill, that he will approve of no measure that will accomplish the object. That the second clause of the Constitutional Amendment gives this power there can be no question. Some have concluded that it gives even the power to confer the right of suffrage. I have not thought so, because I have never thought suffrage any more necessary to the liberty of a freeman than of a non-voting white, whether male or female. But his liberty under the Constitution he is entitled to, and whatever is necessary to secure it to him he is entitled to have, be it the ballot or the bayonet. If the Bill now before us, and which goes no farther than to secure civil rights to the freedmen, can not be passed, then the Constitutional Amendment declaring freedom to all the inhabitants of the land is a cheat and a delusion."

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, on the 5th of April, replied to Mr. Trumbull. The greater part of his reply was devoted to an elaborate legal argument to prove that "citizenship of the United States, consequent not upon naturalization, but upon birth in a State, is to depend upon the fact whether the Constitution and laws of the State make the party so born a citizen of that State;" and consequently that the Bill, in declaring all persons born in the United States citizens thereof, is unconstitutional. And in respect to the special rights conferred by the Bill, "the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, sell, hold, and convey real and personal estate, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white persons," Mr. Johnson averred that, "If there be any thing that might be considered as true in the Constitution and laws, it was that over every one of these rights, or, to speak more correctly, over every one of the subjects to which these rights are made to attach, the jurisdiction of the States was exclusive. This Bill, in my opinion, strikes at all the reserved rights of the States."

The question "Shall the bill pass, the President's objections notwithstanding?" was taken in the Senate on the 6th of April, and was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 33 to 15. All the Senators who voted in favor of the passage are Republicans. Of those who voted against it, Messrs. Cowan of Pennsylvania, Doolittle of Wisconsin, Lane of Kansas, Norton of Minnesota, and Van Winkle of West Virginia, are Republicans; the others Democrats. The seat heretofore held by Mr. Stockton of New Jersey had been declared vacant, and the vacancy had not been filled. Mr. Dixon, Republican, who, it was supposed would have voted to sustain the veto, was absent; but his vote would not have affected the result; there would still have been two-thirds in favor of the passage of the bill.—In the House the vote was taken on the 9th, and the bill was passed by a vote of 122 to 41; being within a single vote of a majority of three to one. All who voted yea are Republicans; all who voted nay are Democrats, with the exception of Messrs. Eldridge of Wisconsin, Latham and Whaley of West Virginia, Noel of Missouri, Phelps of Maryland, Randall, Rousseau, Shanklin, and Smith, of Kentucky, and Raymond of New York.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE UNION.

Various suggestions looking to the reconstruction of the Union have been put forth both in and out of Congress. Among the latter is one by General B. F. Butler, which deserves special mention, although not fairly coming with any official sanction. It provides: (1.) That the Constitution shall be so amended that no debt of the United States shall ever be repudiated; and no portion of the rebel debt, nor any claim for compensation for emancipated slaves, shall ever be paid by the United States or any State or individual. (2.) The qualification for electors to appertain to the States; but no State shall exclude a majority of her male citizens above the age of twenty-one; and no person qualified to vote on the 1st of December, 1860, shall be deprived of his right except by his own act. (3.) Representation shall be according to population, not including classes disfranchised by State laws existing December 1, 1860; but when such disfranchisement is removed it shall be according to the whole population. (4.) An act of Congress shall be passed enabling any State to be restored to the Union when she shall adopt the above constitutional amendments and enforce them by legislation; but no person who has held civil or diplomatic office in the Confederacy, who left the naval or military service of the United States, or, being educated therein, took service in the Confederacy, or aided in the rebellion, shall be qualified as an elector, or be appointed to any office under the United States, or be Governor of any State. (5.) Except as above provided there shall be a complete amnesty and restoration of rights to all citizens of the States so restored. (6.) As soon as may be, after the passage of these measures, Congress, after inviting the several States to ratify them, shall take a recess of three months, so that persons duly elected according to these provisions may be able to represent their respective States during the present session.

On the 30th of April the Joint Committee on Reconstruction presented a plan, embodying (1.) A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution; (2.) A bill providing for the restoration of the States lately in rebellion; (3.) A bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States. We give this important document in full:

A Joint Resolution Proposing an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

Article —, Sec. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in the rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

Sec. 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for members of Congress, and for electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Sec. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of the insurrection, or war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

Sec. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

A Bill to provide for the Restoration of the States lately in Rebellion to their full Political Rights.

Whereas, It is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union be restored to full participation in all political rights; and whereas the Congress did, by joint resolution, propose for ratification to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, an article in the following words, to wit (the constitutional article here inserted), now therefore,

1. Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the above recited amendments shall have become a part of the Constitution, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress.

2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing proposed amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax, under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assumed and paid by such State, and the payment thereof upon proper assurances from such State, to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act.

A Bill declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That no person shall be eligible to any office under the Government of the United States who is included in any of the following cases, namely:

1. The President and Vice-President of the Confederate States of America, so called, and the heads of departments thereof.

2. Those who in other countries acted as agents of the Confederate States of America, so called.

3. Heads of Departments of the United States, officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, and all persons educated in the Military or Naval Academies of the United States, Judges of the Courts of the United States, and members of either House of the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, who gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.

4. Those who acted as officers of the Confederate States of America, so called, above the grade of colonel in the army or master in the navy, or any one who, as Governor of either of the so-called Confederate States, gave aid and comfort to the late rebellion.

5. Those who have treated officers or soldiers or sailors of the Army or Navy of the United States, captured during the late war, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war.

NEW REVENUE BILL.

On the 25th of April the Committee on Ways and Means in the House reported a bill making important changes in the Internal Revenue Bill. Some of the most important changes recommended are as follows: Income-tax, five per cent. on the excess over \$1000 instead of \$600. Cotton, in lieu of taxes on the manufactured article, 5 cents a pound to be paid by the producer or holder, with a drawback upon goods manufactured and exported, equal to the whole amount of taxes paid. Distillers and brewers, \$100 instead of \$50. Apothecaries, innkeepers, and the like, not to be taxed unless their annual sales exceed \$1000; this does not apply to dealers in spirituous and malt liquors. Distilled petroleum, etc., 20 cents a gallon; oils distilled from coal, etc., and spirits of turpentine, 10 cents. Ground coffee, or any substitute therefor, 1 cent per pound. Sugar, $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound. Salt, 3 cents instead of 6 per hundred pounds. Wearing apparel, 5 per cent. Boots and shoes, 2 per cent.; ready-made clothing, 1 per cent.; but shoemakers, tailors, and milliners whose work does not exceed \$1000 a year not to be taxed, and articles of dress made for women by milliners and dressmakers not taxed. Cigars, 2, 4, and 10 dollars a thousand, according to price. Smoking tobacco, 10 and 25 instead of 15 and 30 cents a pound. Brokers' sales 5 cents on the \$100, except on sales of exchange, coin, which is 2 cents. Soap, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound, except perfumed, which pays 3. Schedule A is stricken out, with the exception of billiard tables and carriages valued at more than \$300; that is, watches, plate, pianos, etc., not taxed. Among other articles freed from tax are lucifer matches, cheap photographs, books, paper, starch, cheap soaps, and a very large list of manufactured articles upon the materials of which taxes have been paid. This bill, drawn up mainly in accordance with the suggestions of the Revenue Commission, noted in our last record, greatly simplifies the working of the Revenue system, and relieves from burden many branches of industry; the deficiency caused by the reductions it is presumed will be made up by the tax on cotton. It will not, if passed, go into operation until July 1; and so does not apply to the taxes for the last year, the payment of which is now due.

EQUALIZING BOUNTIES.

A Bill having been reported to Congress for equalizing bounties of soldiers, giving in effect $8\frac{1}{2}$ dollars a month to those who had not received bounties to that amount, the Secretary of the Treasury asked the opinion of Mr. Wells, the Chairman of the Revenue Commission, upon the question, stating that it would add probably \$200,000,000 or \$250,000,000 to the National debt. The reply was decidedly adverse to the measure. Mr. Wells said that the largest amount ever raised in Great Britain, except by loans, in one year, was \$375,000,000, while we were raising at the rate of \$540,000,000, mainly by taxation upon industry in its various forms. The present large receipts of revenue could not be relied upon for the future. They would probably be diminished during the next fiscal year, from various causes. "Under these circumstances," Mr. Wells says, "it would seem as if nothing but the salvation of the nation itself could warrant any immediate increase of the national liabilities or the people's taxes."

COLORADO.

In the Senate the vote was reconsidered by which the application of Colorado for admission to the Union was rejected, and on the 25th April the Bill was passed by a vote of 19 to 13; there were 17 Senators who did not vote, having paired off or being absent. The vote was not a strictly party one, several Republican Senators voting against the admission, because by the Constitution the right of suffrage is limited to whites. The Bill, which has yet to be acted upon by the House, declares in the usual form that Colorado has adopted a State Constitution and formed a State Government, and is therefore now a State in the Union.

TESTIMONY OF A. H. STEPHENS.

Alexander H. Stephens has been examined before the Reconstruction Committee in regard to the state of feeling in Georgia. He believed that an overwhelming majority of the people were anxious for the complete restoration of the Union; they were satisfied with the experiment of secession, and would not again resort to force to carry out their abstract opinions. The present relations between the freedmen and the whites were satisfactory; the blacks were generally at work, and, on the whole, their conduct was much better than the most hopeful anticipated. The amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery was not submitted to the people, but nine-tenths of them would have voted for it if submitted. The general opinion in the State was averse to allowing negroes to vote. He did not think the State would ratify an amendment to the Constitution making this a condition of representation in Congress. He thought if Congress—the eleven seceding States not being represented—should make negro suffrage a condition of restoration, these States ought to decline to accept it. He has always believed in the reserved sovereignty of the States, and though he opposed secession it was as impolitic, not as wrong; but when his State seceded, against his judgment and vote, he felt bound to follow her fortunes. He accepted office in the Confederate Government in the hope of perpetuating the principles of liberty established by the Constitution of the United States. His opinions on the abstract right of secession had undergone no change; but he accepted the issue of the war and the result as a practical settlement of that question. "The sword," he said, "was appealed to to decide the question, and by the decision of the sword I am willing to abide." Governors Johnson of Georgia and Sharkey of Mississippi testified to the same general effect as to the conduct of the freedmen and the disposition of the white population; and also as to their feelings in regard to negro suffrage.

New Jersey has failed to choose a Senator in the place of Mr. Stockton, whose election was pronounced invalid. In the State Assembly there was a decided Republican majority; in the Senate there were 10 Democrats and 11 Republicans, besides Mr.

Seovell, who was elected as a Republican; but he voted against the resolution for both Houses to go into joint ballot for the election of Senator unless the Convention would pledge itself to nominate one of several persons whom he named. This was refused, and the Legislature adjourned without making a choice; and as the vacancy occurred during the session of the Legislature the Governor has no power to fill it.

The election of Governor in Connecticut was looked for with special interest, as furnishing an indication of the popular feeling in relation to the controversy between the President and Congress. Mr. English, the Democratic candidate, was favored by the President. Mr. Hawley, his Republican opponent, was elected by a majority of about 600. At the previous election the Republican Governor had a majority of about 6000.

The steamer Virginia from Liverpool, with more than 1000 passengers, mostly emigrants from Ireland and Germany, arrived in New York on the 19th of April. The cholera broke out on board, and 37 persons died during the voyage. On the 23d the steamer England arrived with 1200 passengers. The cholera had broken out on board during the voyage, and the vessel was obliged to put into Halifax, where 150 died, in addition to 50 who had died previously. The vessels were quarantined; the sick removed to hospital ships. The disease made considerable progress on board both vessels; the whole number of deaths, including those who perished during the voyages, amounting to about 300. It has, however, as yet not spread beyond the infected ships.

THE FRENCH IN MEXICO.

The discussions with the French Government in relation to the French occupation of Mexico, which at one time threatened serious results, has been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. On the 12th of February Mr. Seward addressed to M. Montholon, the French Minister at Washington, an elaborate dispatch, stating the whole question and arguing in favor of the doctrine of non-intervention. M. Druyn de Lhuys had affirmed distinctly that "France went to Mexico to exercise the right of war, which is exercised by the United States, and not in virtue of any purpose of intervention, concerning which she recognizes the same doctrine as the United States. France went there not to bring about a monarchical proselytism, but to obtain reparation and guarantees which she ought to claim; and being there she now sustains the Government which is founded on the consent of the people, because she expects from that Government the just satisfaction of her wrongs as well as the securities indispensable for the future. As she does not seek the satisfaction of an exclusive interest, nor the realization of any ambitious schemes, so she now wishes to recall what remains in Mexico of the army corps which France has sent there at the moment when she will be able to do so with safety to the French citizens and with due respect to herself."

Mr. Seward replies, in substance, that whatever were the original purposes of France, though they have not been abandoned formally, yet they have become subordinate to a political revolution which would not have occurred if France had not forcibly intervened, and which would not now be maintained by them if that armed intervention should cease. He goes on to say:

"The United States have not seen any satisfactory evidence that the people of Mexico have spoken and have called into being or accepted the so-called empire which it insisted has been set up in their capital. They are of opinion that such an acceptance could not have been freely procured, or lawfully taken, at any time, in the presence of the French army of invasion. The withdrawal of the French forces is deemed necessary to allow such a proceeding to be taken by Mexico. Of course the Emperor of France is entitled to determine the aspect in which the Mexican situation ought to be regarded by him. We therefore recognize and must continue to recognize in Mexico only the ancient republic, and can in no case consent to involve us, either directly or indirectly, in relation with or recognition of the institution of the Prince Maximilian in Mexico." . . . "I do not pretend to say that the opinion of the American people is accepted or will be adopted generally by other foreign powers, or by the public opinion of mankind. The Emperor is quite competent to form a judgment upon this important point for himself. I can not, however, properly exclude the observation that while this question affects by its bearings incidentally every republican State in the American hemisphere, every one of these States has adopted the judgment which, on the behalf of the United States, is herein expressed. Under these circumstances it has happened, either rightfully or wrongfully, that the presence of European armies in Mexico, maintaining a European prince with imperial attributes, without her consent and against her will, is deemed a source of apprehension and danger, not alone to the United States, but also to all the independent and sovereign republican States founded on the American Continent and its adjacent islands."

Mr. Seward goes on to say that the single question which he proposes to discuss is the "desirableness of an adjustment of a question the continuance of which must necessarily be prejudicial to the harmony and friendship which have hitherto existed between the United States and France." He says that recognizing war as existing between France and Mexico, the United States assume no claim to interfere with the question of claims and indemnities; and disclaims all thoughts of republican propaganda, and declares that "the position which the United States have assumed has nothing incompatible with the existence of monarchical institutions in Mexico," and does "not create any necessary antagonism between the United States and the form of Government over which Prince Maximilian presides in the ancient capital of Mexico." He fortifies this statement by referring to the fact that the United States now hold diplomatic relations with the Emperor of Brazil, and in 1822 held similar relations with the Mexican Emperor Iturbide. The position of the United States is thus stated:

"Republican and democratic institutions on this continent are deemed most congenial with and most beneficial to the United States. Where the people of any country like Brazil now, or Mexico in 1822, have voluntarily established and acquiesced in monarchical institutions of their own choice, free from all foreign control or intervention, the United States do not refuse to maintain relations with such governments, nor seek through propaganda by force or intrigue to overthrow those institutions. On the contrary, where a nation has established institutions, republican and domestic, similar to our own, the United States assert in their behalf that no foreign nation can rightfully intervene by force to subvert republican institutions and establish those of an antagonistic character." . . . "We fall back upon the principle that no foreign State can rightfully intervene in such trials as those of Mexico, and, on the ground of a desire to correct those errors, deprive the people there of their natural right of domestic and republican freedom. All the injuries and wrongs which Mexico can have committed against any other State have found a severe punishment in consequences which legitimately followed their commission. Nations are not authorized to correct each other's errors, except so far as is necessary to prevent or redress injuries affecting themselves. If one State has a right to intervene in any other State to establish discipline, constituting itself a judge of the occasion, then every State has the same right to intervene in the affairs of every other nation, being itself alone the arbiter both in regard to the time and the occasion. The principle of intervention thus practically carried out would seem to render all sovereignty and independence, and even all international peace and amity, uncertain and fallacious." . . . "France has a right to make war against Mexico, and determine for herself the cause. We have a right to insist that France shall not improve the war she makes to raise up in Mexico an anti-republican or anti-American Government, or to maintain such a Government there."

Mr. Seward says that it would not be proper for the United States to give direct and formal assurances, either by treaty or otherwise, that they will not violate their own principle of non-intervention. But he adds:

"With these explanations I proceed to say that, in the opinion of the President, France need not for a moment delay her promised withdrawal of military forces from Mexico, and her putting the principle of non-intervention into full and complete practice in regard to Mexico, through any apprehension that the United States will prove unfaithful to the principles and policy in that respect which, on their behalf, it has been my duty to maintain in this now very lengthened correspondence. The practice of this Government from its beginning is a guarantee to all nations of the respect of the American people for the free sovereignty of the people in every other State. . . . Looking simply toward the point to which our attention has been steadily confined—to the relief of the Mexican embarrassments without disturbing our relations with France—we shall be gratified when the Emperor shall give to us, either through the channel of our esteemed correspondent or otherwise, definite information of the time when French military operations may be expected to cease."

To this dispatch, of which we have given only a few of the leading points, M. Druyn de Luhs replied, on the 5th of April, in a note to the French Minister at Washington. The following is the essential part of this reply:

"We never hesitate to offer to our friends the explanations they ask from us, and we hasten to give to the Cabinet at Washington all those which may enlighten it on the purpose we are pursuing in Mexico, and on the loyalty of our intentions. We have said to it at the same time that the certainty we should acquire of its resolution to observe in regard to that country, after our departure, a policy of non-intervention would hasten the moment when it would be possible for us, without compromising the interests which led us there, to withdraw our troops and put an end to an occupation the duration of which we are sincerely desirous to abridge. In his dispatch of the 12th of February last Mr. Seward calls to mind, on his part, that the Government of the United States has conformed, during the whole course of its history, to the rule of conduct which it received from Washington by practicing invariably the principle of non-intervention, and observes that nothing justifies the apprehension that it should show itself unfaithful in what may concern Mexico. We receive this assurance with entire confidence. We find therein a sufficient guarantee not any longer to delay the adoption of measures intended to prepare for the return of our army. The Emperor has decided that the French troops shall evacuate Mexico in three detachments, the first being intended to depart in the month of November, 1857; the second in March, 1858; and the third in the month of November of the same year. You will please to communicate this decision officially to the Secretary of State."

AUSTRIA AND MEXICO.

In the mean while it was reported that the Emperor of Austria was about to allow 4000 troops to be recruited in Austria for Maximilian and sent to Mexico. Mr. Motley, our Minister at Vienna, was, on the 19th of March, instructed to "Inquire concerning the facts; and, if they justify the report, to bring to the knowledge of the Austrian Government seasonably that the United States can not regard with unconcern a proceeding which would seem to bring Austria into alliance with the invaders of Mexico to subvert the domestic government of the republic, and to build up foreign imperial institutions. It is hoped that Austria will give us frank explanations. . . . You can not, while practicing the courtesy and respect which are due to the Austrian Government, be either too earnest or too emphatic in the protest you have been directed to make. In performing this duty you may be assisted by information of the actual state of the question concerning French intervention in Mexico at the present moment. With this view I give you, confidentially, a copy of my note addressed to M. Montholon on the 12th day of February. After reading that paper you will be justified in saying that the American Government and people would not be likely to be pleased with seeing Austria, at this juncture, assume the character of a protector to a foreign military power, which, claiming the power of an empire, is attempted to be set up on the supposed subverted foundations of the Republic of Mexico."

This report of a meditated Austrian intervention having been confirmed, Mr. Motley was directed, April 6 and 16, to represent to the Austrian Government that "In the event of hostilities being carried on hereafter in Mexico by Austrian subjects, under the command or with the sanction of the Government of Vienna, the United States will feel themselves at liberty to regard those hostilities as constituting a state of war by Austria against the republic of Mexico, and in regard to such war waged at this time and under existing circumstances the United States could not engage to remain as silent or neutral spectators.

. . . "The time seems to have arrived when the attitude of this Government in relation to Mexican affairs should be once again frankly and distinctly made known to the Emperor of Austria and all other Powers whom it may directly concern. The United States, for reasons which seem to them to be just, and to have their foundations in the laws of nations, maintain that the domestic republican government with which they are on relations of friendly communication, is the only legitimate government existing in Mexico; that a war has for a period of several years been waged against that republic by the Government of France, which was begun with a disclaimer of all political or dynastic designs; that that war has subsequently taken upon itself and now distinctly wears the character of a European intervention to overthrow that domestic republican government, and to erect in its stead a European imperial military despotism by military force. The United States, in view of the character of their own political institutions, their proximity and intimate relations toward Mexico, and their just influence in the political affairs of the American continent, can not consent to the accomplishment of that purpose by the means described. The United States have, therefore, addressed themselves, as they think reasonably, to the Government of France, and have asked that its military forces engaged in that objectionable political invasion may desist from further intervention and be withdrawn from Mexico.

"The last communication upon this subject, which was addressed by the United States to the Government of France, will enable you to satisfy the Government of Vienna that the United States must be no less opposed to military intervention for political objects hereafter in Mexico by the Government of Austria than they are opposed to any further intervention of the same character in that country by France. You will therefore act at this early a day as may be convenient. Bring the whole case in a becoming manner to the attention of the Imperial Royal Government.

"You are authorized to state that the United States sincerely desire that Austria may find it just and expedient to come up on the same ground of non-intervention in Mexico which is maintained by the United States, and to which they have invited France. You will communicate to us the answer of the Austrian Government to this proposition. This Government could not but regard as a matter of serious concern the dispatch of any troops from Austria for Mexico, while the subject which you are thus directed to present to the Austrian Government remains under consideration."

PRUSSIA AND AUSTRIA.

The present hostile attitude of Prussia and Austria is but a repetition of the old quarrel which in 1850 threatened to involve these powers in war. There has for years existed among the German people a strong wish to establish a united Germany, which would then take rank as a great European Power, not inferior to either France or Russia. It happens that the only good sea-ports in Germany are in the Duchy of Holstein, and this in 1850 belonged to Denmark, the King of which, as Duke of Holstein, was a member of the cumbrous German Confederation, the two leading members of which are Austria and Prussia. The minor German princes and Austria have always opposed the formation of a German nation. Prussia has at times favored it, when there seemed a probability of her being at the head of and virtually the nation to be formed; and especially when it was likely that she might gain Holstein, as in 1850. At that time the Germans of Holstein wished to get free from Denmark. Austria opposed and Prussia favored this. The question was finally settled by the Great Powers interfering, and guaranteeing Holstein to Denmark under certain conditions. At length, in 1864, the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, taking advantage of a dispute in regard to the law of succession, broke away from Denmark. Austria and Prussia, each fancying that some advantage could be gained to themselves, took part in the war which ensued, and compelled Denmark to give up the Duchies. The question then arose what should be done with them. Prussia wished to incorporate them with her own dominions; Austria, while not ostensibly claiming them for herself, but rather insisting that they should remain in a manner independent, was determined that Prussia should not have them, as their possession by Prussia would make her the predominant power in Germany. The dispute was for a while fought on diplomatic grounds, and with reference to the complicated laws of the Confederacy. Recently both parties have shown a disposition to have recourse to arms; each increasing its army, and each finding in the conduct of the other ground for demanding explanations and guarantees. Prussia singly is overweighed by the Austrian Empire; but if she can secure the support of the minor German Powers she will have the preponderance over Austria. To secure this seems to be the aim of Count Bismarck, her able and unscrupulous Minister. On the 24th of March he addressed a circular to all the minor German Powers. He declared that Austria, without provocation, had increased her armaments to a threatening extent, and now Prussia, in self-defense, must seek new guarantees. She prefers to seek these in Germany, and therefore desires to have a modification of the Federal Constitution. He asks therefore how far, in case of going to war with Austria, Prussia may reckon upon the support of the minor German Powers. In this there seems to be a covert insinuation that if these Powers will not engage to support her, Prussia will seek alliances elsewhere; that "elsewhere" being of course the French Emperor, who would of course claim certain concessions of territory in order to "rectify" the boundaries of France, and give them what has long been claimed by France as their "natural extension." These "concessions" can only come from certain of these minor Powers. The latest phase of the question, as it appears on paper, is that each Power demands that the other should take the initiative in disarming; that the minor Powers beseech Austria and Prussia to avoid hostile measures; and that Prussia demands the assemblage of a German Parliament, the members to be chosen by universal suffrage; to which Austria is willing to accede, on condition that all her provinces be represented, instead of only a part, as at present—Bohemia, Hungary, and Venetia, though portions of the Austrian Empire, not being included in the Germanic Confederation. If such a Parliament is convoked without this condition, Prussia will have the larger vote; with the condition, Austria will have the larger vote. The gist of the question, therefore, no matter in what shape it is phrased, is whether Austria dares to go to war in order to prevent Prussia from acquiring the supremacy in Germany. In the event of a war it may be assumed that the King of Italy would find or make a pretext for an effort to wrest the Italian province of Venetia from Austria, unless he were prevented from so doing by his virtual master, the Emperor Napoleon. Upon that sovereign seems now to depend, in effect, the question of peace or war in Europe. For Great Britain has lost the power and perhaps the inclination to interfere actively in European affairs; and Russia has little direct interest in the German question.

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO.

On the 23d of March the Spanish Admiral Nunez, who with a considerable fleet had been blockading the Chilean ports, sent in his ultimatum to the Government of Chili. The principal points were that Chili should declare that she had no intention to insult Spain, and that the treaty between the two countries was now broken, but only annulled, by the declaration of war; he, as Envoy Extraordinary, would then declare that Spain did not desire to humiliate Chili, or to seize her territory. The vessels captured on both sides were to be given up. He would then proceed to treat with the Government of Chili. These terms were rejected, and the Admiral gave notice that he should bombard Valparaiso. The foreign Ministers, among whom was our Ambassador, General Kilpatrick, remonstrated in vain. The Admiral gave notice that on the 31st he should open the bombardment, and requested that non-combatants should be sent from the city, and the hospitals and other charitable institutions should be denoted by flags. The city was entirely defenseless; but Villalon, the commander of the Chilean fleet, proposed a naval duel between his force and that of Nunez, the latter to leave out the iron-clad steamer Numancia. This proposition was declined.

The bombardment commenced about 9 o'clock, the Spanish vessels passing along the front of the city and delivering fire at a range of a few hundred yards, directed mainly at the Custom-house, Governor's palace, railroad dépôt, and other public buildings. The bombardment lasted about three hours, some 2000 shot being thrown. Fire soon caught in various places, and the Custom-house, several large bonded warehouses, containing much property belonging mainly to foreign merchants, and twelve squares of the business parts of the city were burned. The loss of property is estimated at $20,000,000. No resistance was offered, and as the inhabitants had left the exposed parts of the city, the loss of life was very small. After the bombardment ceased the people returned, and with the aid of a large body of sailors, mostly belonging to the American fleet then in the harbor, succeeded in extinguishing the flames.

Before the bombardment opened there was some talk among the foreign Ministers to prevent it by means of the fleets of their respective nations, Great Britain and the United States each having in the harbor a naval force nearly equal to that of Spain. It is said that the American Minister was in favor of this, but that the British Minister declined to unite with him. A public meeting of British subjects was held, at which resolutions were passed severely censuring the British Admiral, and thanking the American Minister for "his earnest endeavors to prevent, by co-operation with the British forces, the bombardment of the city, and regretting that those endeavors had not been more successful."

Editor's Drawer.

PORTE CRAYON—now a General, a real General, a General in the Union Army—once on a time wrote a series of articles in this Magazine. Who that read them has forgotten them? You remember the dark-complected coachman, who rejoiced in the name of "Mice." Those articles were as readable as the Drawer! So entertaining were they that there was hardly any need of a Drawer, or funny department, when Porte Crayon was along. Well, he is back again, and with this the first Number of a new volume he begins to give his "Personal Recollections of the War." The Drawer gives him a welcome, and so will all the Drawer's readers.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to the Drawer complaining that things are published in it which he has read before in books or newspapers. He closes his communication by sending a piece of poetry which has already been printed in the papers of the day. Another writer wishes to be paid for his contributions to the Drawer, and sends us articles copied from the Drawer!

A CORRESPONDENT in New Orleans writes to the Drawer:

I got a shot a short time since that is really good enough for you. Stopping at the National House, in Norfolk, Virginia, I was much pleased with the excellent attention paid me by "Page," a little fellow no higher than a chair, and certainly not over ten years old, who, besides being about as black as ebony, is also one of the best dining-room servants I ever saw. One day at dinner I turned to him with the common inquiry, "Boy, where were you raised?" "I'se not raised yet, Sar!" was the instant reply.

A WESTERN man says: We have a town-clerk here, a very bombastic little chap, much given to big words. At the annual town meeting the other day he read the report of the supervisors for the "physical" year ending March 31, 1866. After reading the report through, one in the crowd requested him to read the heading over again, which he did, making the same mistake as before. Whereupon the man moved that the word "physical" be stricken out, and "fiscal" inserted. The motion was carried with a shout.

THE gallant soldier who sends this to the Drawer is now at Washington—on duty, of course:

During the famous John Morgan raid through Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, my command, then serving in Western Virginia, was sent up the Ohio, as far as Buffington's Island, to intercept and prevent the escape of the "rough rider" and his lawless followers. We arrived at Pomeroy early in the morning, and found the inhabitants of that straggling little town in a state of the most intense excitement over the rumored approach of the enemy. At first we veterans did not credit the statements of citizen scouts, but a small detachment of soldiers, sent ashore to learn the situation and obtain reliable information, soon returned and reported John, with his whole command, to be rapidly approaching. The brigade immediately disembarked and hurried to the front, while I was directed by General H— to collect the numerous squads and straggling bands of armed citizens, effect something of an organization, and follow after the command. I immediately gave my orders to a score or more of volunteer aids, and in less than twenty minutes we had 500 of Ohio's stalwart youths and gray-haired sires and grandsires, armed with squirrel-rifles, superannuated muskets, revolvers, pistols, sabres, swords, etc., and every mother's son of them "spoiling for a fight." Not one of them had ever seen a soldier before, and they had no more idea of discipline and drill than had a rebel private of the "rights" for which he was fighting. But this was no time for instruction in the mysteries of war; so I formed them into two ranks, and telling them off into companies of 100 men each, selected the most intelligent for officers. Before "going out to battle" it was necessary to select a "Colonel;" and riding along the entire line I espied at the head of the column a venerable-looking, gray-haired man, who looked fight in every glance of his twinkling blue eye, commissioned him Colonel "on the field," and proposed three cheers and a tiger in honor of his promotion, which were given with a will. All was now in readiness, and giving the Colonel direction to move out "double-quick" and follow me, I rode to the head of the column. I noticed a little hesitation on the part of that worthy and high official, but it was only momentary; he moved rapidly to the front and centre, halted, faced about, and gave the following command, in the dialect peculiar to Southern Ohio:

"Look wild thar! tote yer guns; prepare to thicken and march endways! Go-a-flukin—git!"

And amidst such a yell as was never before heard in those "diggings" the gallant Colonel dashed off in search of the graybacks, followed by his impatient command.

It is needless to add that these rustic soldiers contributed not a little toward the capture of Morgan; but I doubt if even General Casey himself, the prince of tacticians, could have executed the march "by the right flank," "double-quick," in the requisite number of "times" and "motions" after the Colonel's command.

A LADY in Greene County, New York, writing to the Drawer, sends the next two:

Our little Will has a very sympathizing disposition. Last winter brother John attended singing-school, and became very enthusiastic on the subject of vocal music. Coming into the sitting-room one day, where Will was busily engaged with his playthings, he took up a singing-book and began to exercise his voice on the notes, to show us the proficiency he had made. Will dropped his toys and looked at him. Every thing was forgotten in his interest for John; and running up to him and laying his little hand upon his knee, he exclaimed, in a most pitying tone: "Poor Johnny! don't cry, Johnny! don't cry!"

A SHORT distance from us lives a gentleman of color, whose remarks are quite equal to Mrs. Partington's. One day last summer he happened to meet Mr. L—, the Sunday-school superintendent, just before our door. Mr. L— stopped to speak to him about some work he wished Sambo to do during the day, telling him that he would be unable to oversee it himself, "for," said he, "the Sabbath-school will have an excursion on the steamer next week, and I am going to A—to-day to engage a band of musicians." As he passed on, Sambo turned to the children, who were playing in the yard, and said: "Did you hear dat? Dere's goin' to be a great Sunday-school explosion on de steamboat, and Mr. L—is goin' to A—to 'gage a band of physicians!"

UNCLE PAUL K—, of T—, in Massachusetts, was refreshingly free from over-stating: he could never have become a Western orator. His way of "putting things" (as the country parson would term it) was the extreme opposite of hifalutin'; it was moderate—it was safe. Once on a time, in the spring of the year, when the snow-drifts had not all melted, and the roads were still miry, the team of a traveling merchant became stalled near his house. Uncle Paul repaired with a yoke of oxen to his assistance. The load not becoming speedily disengaged, the peddler raged and stormed, and belabored and swore with accumulating fury. Uncle Paul endured in silence till he could endure no longer, and, unhitching his cattle, drove home in disgust, leaving the itinerant merchant both mired and mazed. "I went," said Uncle Paul, in relating the incident, "to try to help him, but he talked so poorly that I came off and left him!"

SOME graceless boys, on their way to bathe, killed some young birds in their nest near Uncle Paul's house, and during his absence. On their return, having heard of their offense, he addressed them with his most severe and indignant reproof. They reported at the village, to the surprise of all, that "Uncle Paul had been swearing at them with all his might." "What did he say?" they were asked. "He said," they answered, "just as mad as he could be, 'Boys, I think you've been doing very poorly!'"

A YOUNG lady of most exemplary and beautiful character had, amidst the anguish of friends and the sorrow of the whole village, just died of lingering consumption. When Uncle Paul was informed of it he exclaimed, after a sad pause and with evident feeling, and meaning what he said for the warmest eulogy: "Well, I don't know any thing but what she always behaved as well as could be expected!"

"UNCLE SID" (meaning Consider D—, of D—, in Franklin County, Massachusetts) was at least peculiar, if not original. He died some ten years since, nearly one hundred years old. Many racy anecdotes are extant concerning him. He was very worldly, but very punctual in attending church, and even superstitious in his views and feelings. Rather hard of hearing, he sat near the pulpit; and once when his pastor exchanged, not "getting the hang" of the preacher, he at last impatiently inquired of his wife, in a tremendous guttural whisper, loud enough to be heard for several pews, and possibly by the speaker himself: "What on airth is the feller driving at?"

"UNCLE SID," though "fond of his coppers" (an old coin, familiar in the last generation, but now found only with antiquarians), was also a lover of "creature comforts," and seldom failed to attend a convivial party. With "an eye to the main chance," however, he would prepare himself for these entertainments (which were "for a consideration," as old Trapbois would say, supper included) by a due amount of fasting in advance. On one occasion such a party had been extemporized more hastily than usual, and Uncle Sid was called upon to go, to eat, and to pay, as late as the forenoon of the day on the evening of which the tea-party was to come off. "No, no," said Uncle Sid, emphatically; "I should have been happy to go if you'd gin me more notice. You ginerally charge about four times as much as the thing is worth, and if I can have time to git ready I can git about half my money's-worth. I'm sorry I can't go, but it's too short notice."

REV. T. M—, minister of one of the country towns in Massachusetts, was an athlete, a most eloquent pulpit orator, and a wit of the school of Dean Swift. He was the clerical wrestler concerning whom the anecdote every little while goes the rounds, who, called from his bed for the honor of the town, prostrated with ease the challenger from a distant place, and is even said to have thrown him over the fence. He was rather a worldly man, and was in the habit of letting money at rates considerably exceeding the legal six per cent. A deputation of the church, headed by one of its good deacons, visited him to remonstrate against the practice, which had become no slight scandal. Getting wind of their visit, he received them at his door with the courtesy few could practice better than he when he chose, and led the way into his parlor. After a few minutes of conversation on indifferent topics, the delegation hesitatingly and timidly (for they feared his sharp tongue) introduced the subject of their call; spoke of the current rumors of his receiving twelve per cent. annual interest on loans; and, in the name of the church, mildly protested against the habit. Mr. M—, who had listened with attention and deference, at the close of their address inquired, "Is this all?" On being told that it was, he said: "Brethren, be assured I will never hereafter be guilty of taking twelve per cent. interest. Set your hearts at rest on that matter." Relieved at having escaped a dreaded scene, they, after partaking of the accustomed "refreshments," retired, well pleased at their success. Mr. M— accompanied them to the door, and at parting, with gravity and dignity, said: "Brethren, let me again assure you I will never after this take twelve per cent., for I have found I can just as easily get eighteen!"

Soon after the assassination of the late President I met on the highway a countryman who, in common with his neighbors, was all agog for the details of that startling tragedy. Knowing that I read the papers he anxiously inquired for further particulars. In detailing them to him I stated that the murder occurred in Ford's Theatre, and that as soon as the assassin fired his pistol he jumped on the stage and made his escape. The countryman looked up and very naively replied, "I reckon the stage was jist riddy to start!"

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer in Baltimore sends this reminiscence:

Among the celebrated divines who have long since passed away, and whose eccentricities were of a remarkable type, was Rev. William Cravens, of the Baltimore Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was better known by the familiar sobriquet of "Old Billy Cravens." The wonderful incidents which marked his life would fill a volume.

Many years ago Mr. Cravens traveled a circuit which embraced in its limits the then small, but now large—and, prior to the war, flourishing—town of Staunton, Virginia. He was an inveterate enemy to the institution of negro slavery, and omitted no opportunity, in public or private, to denounce it in the most pointed language. In his pulpit ministrations particularly would he expose the cruelties of the system, and dwell upon its certainly fatal consequences. The Episcopalians had just completed the erection of a handsome church in the town of Staunton, and the "sale of pews" was announced to take place on a certain day. To possess a pew was considered an indispensable adjunct to the social status of those aspiring to be called the F. F. V.'s of that community. Mr. Waite was a citizen once in affluent circumstances, but his estate had recently been reduced to the possession of a few slaves. He had a large family of daughters, and they could not brook the idea of compromising their respectability so far as to be without their pew in church. So Mr. W. was compelled to purchase a pew, and to raise the money for such purpose he sold one of his slaves. Shortly after this occurrence Mr. Cravens had an appointment to preach in the town of Staunton, and the above incident being made known to him, he made a public exposé of the affair from his pulpit. It was at once reported on the streets, and produced great excitement. Mr. Waite threatened to prosecute the offender, and with this view consulted Judge Baldwin, of the Circuit Court. Mr. Cravens having left the town to fill an appointment elsewhere, a friend wrote to him, advising him of the excitement the sermon had caused, and that Mr. W. intended to prosecute him. Mr. Cravens promptly replied "not to prosecute him; he would preach an apologetic sermon."

This arrangement being quite satisfactory, Mr. Waite consented to waive the prosecution, and a day was duly fixed for the preaching of the "apologetic sermon." The church was crowded. Every class and condition of society was represented. Judge Baldwin was there. Mr. Waite occupied a chair immediately in front of the pulpit; for, be it remembered, the sermon was to be addressed to him! Presently Mr. Cravens entered, and passing rapidly down the aisle ascended the pulpit, and opened the exercises in the usual manner with singing and prayer. He then arose with the utmost gravity, and stated that he believed he was here to preach an "apologetic" sermon (emphasizing the adjective). He had searched the Bible through, from Genesis to Revelation, for a suitable text, and not being able to find one, he was driven to the necessity of making a text. And it was this: "Sell a nigger, and buy a pew." (Sensation.) Then fixing his eye on the injured Mr. Waite, he proceeded to deliver a scathing rebuke to the aforesaid individual for his inhumanity in bartering a slave for the privilege of a cushioned seat in the house of God. The audience was thunder-struck, and so was Waite, who, being unable to stand the pressure, sprang from his seat and beat a hasty retreat from the church, "Old Billy" crying out to him as he departed, "Hold on, honey, and I'll fill your other pocket!" The effect of the sermon was magical. Public opinion immediately inclined to Mr. Cravens, and he was not prosecuted.

YOUNG AMERICA was very fond of visiting the room of a lady who was staying at his father's house. One day when he was there, lying on the floor, his usual position, the lady asked him to get up and shut the door, which he declined to do.

"Why," said the lady, "I should think you would be willing to do it for me. If you wanted me to do any thing for you I should do it."

"Should you?" he asked.

"Yes—certainly."

"Well, then"—and he gave her an arch look—"won't you please close that door for me?"

It is needless to say that the lady closed the door herself.

"BEFORE the war" I was for a time an inmate of a family "way down South," where the sun shone a trifle warmer than here, and the breezes were not got up on quite so magnificent a scale as they are on these Iowa prairies. Among the house servants there was a little black-eyed, black-skinned, round-headed son of Africa, who was acknowledged by the entire household to be "a sort of genius in his way; and as all geniuses have their eccentricities, so Charles had his—one of which was that he never acknowledged ignorance on any subject whatever. I do not believe that the universal "I don't know, Sah"—the refuge of the whole non-committal negro race—ever passed Charles's lips. There was no word that he could not define, no remark which he could not understand. One evening his master, who was a physician, sent him to his office for a large bottle of ammonia. Charles started, light in hand, when his master stopped him with, "Now, Charles, be very careful, for ammonia is a combustible fluid;" then, thinking to trip Charles where he had never fallen before, he questioned—"Do you know what combustible means?" "Yes, Sah," was the ready answer; "it means it will knock me down if I smell of it!" It was impossible to keep back the laugh until Charles was out of hearing. All understood at once that he had gained this definition by actual experience.

At another time Charles was waiting, a little while after his usual hour for retiring, with a face which plainly indicated impatience for his release, when his master, somewhat jocosely, said, "It is unnecessary for you to remain longer, Charles. You can abscond." "Stop, Charles!" cried his young mistress, a child of thirteen years. "What does father mean by abscond?" Charles hesitated a moment; when, suddenly recollecting an order given earlier in the day but still unperformed, all doubt vanished from his sleepy face, and he triumphantly exclaimed, "That I see to kill the chickens for breakfast, Miss Eliza!"

OUR Corps, the Twelfth, passed through Frederick, Maryland, after the battle of Gettysburg, during a cold, drenching rain-storm, many of the boys shoeless and half clad, and all pretty well worn out after four days of hard fighting and many days of forced marching. The gallant Seventh Regiment New York Militia was doing duty then, posted at intervals along the streets of the city, and with their new and well-fitting uniforms, polished boots, white paper collars, and every thing looking as bright as a new bonnet just from the bandbox, they presented a striking contrast to our war-worn veterans.

The boys were disposed to poke a little fun at these fine-looking chaps. One of the devil-may-cares of the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania moved along our ranks, cutting high shines with a huge umbrella he had just "borrowed" from an indignant citizen, and seeing a fine-looking specimen of the Seventh standing on the sidewalk, stepped up to him, and with a comic mock-politeness addressed him with: "Say, Mister, you'd better come in under this umbrella; you might get damp out there!" The Seventh man wheeled about and disappeared, amidst the loud shouts and laughter of the boys. A little further on a sentinel, erect and in position, a perfect picture of the neat soldier, was posted. One of the boys stopped, and coolly surveying him from head to foot, turned to his comrades, and with finger pointed to the "soger," remarked: "I say, fellers, now wouldn't he make the puttiest kind of a corpse?" The Seventh man took the joke in good part, called up the "blue-belly, gave him a V, and told him: "You're a brick! I'd like to treat you to a good dinner over in York!" And the boys passed on, most comfortless and distressful in appearance, but always lively and ready for a joke.

A CERTAIN church in the city of New York, being without a pastor, invited a somewhat distinguished divine from Central New York to supply their pulpit for two Sabbaths. The minister complied, and when his mission was ended the trustees sent him thirty dollars in "legal tender." He accepted the amount, and left with a friend the following bill:

The Trustees of the ——— Church.

To I. O——, Dr.

For preaching two Sabbaths.....	$50
Expenses to New York and returning.....	18
Nine days' board	27
	$95
Cr. By Cash.....	30
Balance due.....	$65

Ordinary swindling is punishable at law, but such sharp practice under the garb of religion goes unrebuked. One of the members is a millionaire. We hope the "parson" will show pluck, and collect his bill with interest.

THESE two specimens of intelligence come to us all the way from Nevada:

Whether ignorance is bliss or not is immaterial, so long as it is pertinent to the present occasion to claim that it is another name for conceit. Let the following bear witness: An extremely ignorant but very conceited fellow in these parts got into a conversation with a well-informed gentleman with regard to the Speakership of the lower branch of Congress, when the gentleman informed Ignoramus that the Speaker was elected by the members of that branch.

"There!" exclaimed Ignoramus; "didn't I tell Mr. H—— that the members had no right to make speeches in Congress, but that all the speaking was done by a man elected by them for that purpose!"

If the above is not sufficient to convince you that we have at least one supremely happy man out here, then let the following display of blissful ignorance have a place in the Drawer:

A couple of individuals having located some mining ground which they were anxious to prospect, hunted up Ignoramus, and told him if he would take a one-third interest, and pay his assessments, he should have one-third of the proceeds of their labor.

Ignoramus replied: "If I can't have a sixth or a seventh I won't have any!"

ting evil we will agree to pay the forfeit of a bottle of Sonoma wine to him who shall send a better one to the Drawer.

A FEW years ago a new postmaster was appointed in the town of Canton, Pennsylvania, who was a gentleman of the "Old School." Entering upon the new duties of the situation, he for a time filled the office with dignity, and, to all appearance, with satisfaction. One day, a large number of persons being in the office, a man called for a letter the initial of the last name being M. Whereupon the worthy postmaster took down a large number of letters, and looking them over said that there was no letter there; adding that all of the letters nearly were for a Mr. P. M., and that he wished he would call and get them; "for," said he, "I don't know what to do with them. I have lived in Canton for twenty-five years, and I never heard of a man by the name of P. M. yet!" The roar that followed gave the P. M. an idea that there was something wrong.

A SHORT time ago, as we were on board a train of cars, a man was very much engaged in trying to prove that all men are growing wiser, when a half-drunken fellow staggered up to him, saying: "Mr. ———, what a big fool your grandfather must have been!" Mr. ——— at once changed the subject, while the car was filled with the most deafening shouts.

ON one of the San Francisco turnpikes, near a popular sea-side hotel, is a Chinese wash-house, the pagan proprietor of which asked a "Melican man" to write a sign for him. The obliging American complied, and wrote with a marking brush on a long board: "'Tis well—We may be happy yet—You bet!" The gratified Chinaman hoisted the singular legend to his roof, where it remains to this day, the washerman blissful in the belief that it informs the wondering passenger of "Washing and ironing done here cheap."

MANY years ago there was a grand Indian scare in one of our interior towns, and a rallying meeting was held for the purpose of gathering a force to fight the foe. Night came on, and as all were assembled, and every thing was in readiness to start early in the morning, the inborn American gift of gab broke out in the shape of an impromptu oration from a Mr. Winn, who took occasion to "fly the bird," much to the disgust of an honest Irishman, who, stretched on a bench in the back part of the room where the people were assembled, was trying to get some sleep, to be prepared for the early morning march. After turning and twisting in vain, he raised himself up and bellowed: "Misther Winn! Misther Winn!" several times. Securing the attention of the crowd and the silence of the speaker, he said: "Misther Winn, I say, it's my humble be-laf that ye're a Winn-dy customer!" There was no more speaking on that occasion.

A BUFFALONIAN says: The following amusing incident occurred at our Internal Revenue office the last time we paid our income-tax. S——, a well-known barber, made up his list, amounting to $537. The Clerk glanced at the footing and handed it back, saying, "No tax on incomes below $600." S——, however, waited some time, till noticed by the Clerk, when the following colloquy ensued:

CLERK. "Waiting for any thing?"

S—. "My $63."

CLERK. "What $63?"

S—. "Why, my income was only $537, and I understood the Government would make it up to me!"

A FRIEND in Philadelphia writes:

Several years ago I crossed from Palermo to Naples in company with other Americans, one of whom was a merchant of Boston. We went to the same hotel, and the day after our arrival paid a visit to Pompeii. Our Boston friend was disgusted with the appearance of things soon after he entered the ruined city, and was desirous of going back to Naples. He dragged along with us, however, for about half an hour, abusing the place all the time; until at last he stopped short, and said: "Now, who was this Pompey, any how?" This reads strangely of Boston, but it is true.

At Utica, New York, the following verdict was given by the jury impaneled by Coroner Munroe, at the inquest which was held on the body of the late William C. Champlin:

"We are of the opinion that the deceased is the body of William C. Champlin, and that he came to his death by hanging himself in his barn with a rope, on the morning of Wednesday, March 28, 1866, and thus died, and not otherwise."

Nor long since we were attending a Sabbath-school in one of the rural districts not a thousand miles from this city, where a worthy "brother" and exemplary Christian was called upon to open the school with prayer. Now this brother was given to much speaking, and was one of those who seem not to know how or when to end a prayer or an exhortation. He wandered on in his prayer, not forgetting to mention every thing in heaven above or in the earth beneath, and when at last he reached the final "Amen" at least two-thirds of the hour had passed away. It was customary to follow the prayer with singing, but upon this day the worthy Superintendent determined to dispense with that part of the regular programme, and proceed at once to hear the lessons, and he made the announcement in this wise: "As so much time has run to waste, we will proceed at once with the lessons!" A good commentary, I thought, upon interminable prayers.

APPROPOS to the anecdote in a recent Number of the Magazine in which the "one thing needful" was "a new cart," I send you the following real incident, for the truth of which the lady herself will vouch, if necessary:

Miss Kate W— having recently become Mrs. Kate S—, and commenced life in her new home, was called upon one evening by the very estimable Mr. and Mrs. James M—. After spending the evening very pleasantly in conversation upon general topics the worthy couple arose to depart, and Kate accompanied them to the door, Mr. and Mrs. M— the while congratulating her upon the appearance of her house, furniture, and prospects of future happiness; when, casting his eyes over the still unfinished front stairs, Mr. M— said, very solemnly: "And yet, Mrs. S—, there's one thing needful." "Oh yes," instantly and innocently replied Kate, "a stair-rail and balusters, and we are going to have them before long!"—when the good man's meaning flashed across her mind, and as the door closed upon him her blushes were overlooked in the hearty laugh which followed. Mr. M— has never alluded to the "one thing needful" since, doubtless thinking Kate "past redemption."

A FEW army stories are still left:

We had in my Company in the —d Iowa Regiment a member named Charley C—. Charley was the best-natured fellow you ever saw, and very talkative. Politics and military matters were his favorite themes, and he would talk to patient listeners for hours together, arranging every thing to his entire satisfaction. But no sooner was he contradicted than he would begin to argue, and before long wax hot and excited. At such times he would handle the English language rather roughly, and throw about with "big words" indiscriminately, as long as they had a semblance of sound to the one he wished to use. Talking about the merits and demerits of General Burnside one day, Charley suddenly burst forth: "Burnside! don't talk to me about Burnside! Look at what the old synagogue did down in Maryland!"

COMPANY "B" of our regiment boasted of a German named B—, who had quite a way of his own in getting off a "joke" or "hit" on somebody. In the month of April, 1864, while stationed at Pulaski, Tennessee, the whole division was ordered out one day, and drawn up in line on the principal thoroughfare of the "borough," to witness the drumming-out of three members of the —th Illinois Regiment for stealing. They were sentenced by court-martial to have "one side of their heads shaved, their buttons cut off their dress-coats, and each to have a board, two feet long and ten inches wide, with the word "Robber" inscribed upon it, tied to his back." Each regiment, as it stood in line, had to furnish a guard, whose duty it was to keep the citizens back on the opposite side of the street. B— was one of the number detailed from our regiment. After we had returned to camp and had been dismissed, B— walked up to the tent of the first sergeant, where quite a number of boys had gathered, and addressed them as follows: "Boys, I tells you someting! As I was valking my peat, just as dem fellows had passed, an honest-looking, gray-headed old citizen stepped up to me, and, pointing after dem fellows, ask me, "Soldier, are dey Quarter-masters?" Pretty good for a Deutscher, ain't it?"

AN old correspondent, now in Nevada, sends the three following:

In the palmy days of Democracy in California I was a member of the Convention which met at Sacramento, and which nominated M. S. Latham for its candidate as Governor. The greater lights at the altar of Democracy desiring to shine on that occasion were John B. Weller and M. S. Latham; among the lesser lights was Wm. L. Dudley. The latter was from Calaveras County. Feeling that his individual chances for the nomination were very slim, he intimated a desire to withdraw his name from the consideration of the Convention. So when his name was mentioned calls for "Bill Dudley" arose in the old Benton Church, and Bill went upon the pulpit stand and withdrew from the contest with thanks, etc., appropriately expressed, and closed as follows: "I have served the Democracy of old Calaveras faithfully for seven years, and received my Leah. I am willing to serve the Democracy of California seven years longer for my Rebekah!"

Such a reference to Scripture knowledge had never before come from the pulpit of Benton's Church, and never will again, I think. The Convention roared for a while.

In a late murder trial in our District Court at Austin, in Reese River, a dog was annoying the attendants within the bar by prying his nose every where and getting between the legs of the persons present. The Judge nodded to the Sheriff, who in an instant snatched the dog by the throat and jerked him out of the window. The shock of the seizure by the Sheriff was so great that the cur did not have time to yelp; whereupon a wag at the bar whispered loud enough to be heard, "That dog should have moved for a continuance upon the ground of surprise!" The seriousness of the murder trial was interrupted by quite a titter around the bar.

OUR Reese River District Judge is somewhat jokeative. A new member of our bar, who goes by the sobriquet of "Old Dignity," asked the Judge one day, "How long the prisoner was sentenced to?" The Judge replied, "He was not sentenced to long at all; he was sentenced to the Penitentiary," at which a laugh ensued at the expense of "Old Dig," who only mumbled out; "He thought there was the biggest set of children he ever saw around the court-house in this town."

ONE of the most estimable of men some years ago died and left a wife and several children. Among the latter was a boy of eight or ten years, who was the very personification of mischief. His mother, finding she could not control him, put him in charge of a reverend gentleman of the neighborhood, who made it a rule, whenever the boy committed a fault which required correction, to give him a taste of the rod, and then make him get on his knees and ask God to forgive the sin committed and bless his corrector. The boy proved to be too much for the reverend to manage. He was then placed in charge of a very excellent lady, who was distinguished for a long and pointed nose. Shortly after she took him in charge she was obliged to give him a flogging. As soon as it was through she was surprised to see him drop on his knees, and perhaps more surprised to hear him pray to be forgiven for what he had done—and "bless Mrs. J—, and lengthen out her days as long as her nose, only not quite so sharp!"

FROM Orwell, Ohio, the Drawer receives some pleasant contributions:

In the summer of '64, while the great military bridge was being constructed over the Tennessee River, at Chattanooga, the engineer in charge of the work made a requisition upon Captain Smith, the Dépôt Quarter-master, for two steamboat capstans, to be used in completing the draw of the bridge. As the capstans could not be procured in Chattanooga, a dispatch was sent to the Quarter-master at Bridgeport to forward the same without delay. The next day two burly-looking individuals presented themselves at Captain Smith's office, with a letter of introduction from the Bridgeport Quarter-master, stating that the gentlemen he had sent were intelligent and reliable men, and well qualified, by long experience, to take charge of any kind of river craft. Captain S— read the letter with profound amazement, not having at first the least idea why the men should be sent to him; but in a moment the truth flashed through his mind, and it was with a great effort that he was enabled to control his risibles so that his visitors' chagrin might not be unnecessarily augmented, when he informed them that the carelessness of the telegraph operator had caused them a trip for nothing, and that boat capstans, not captains, were wanted!

DURING the progress of the war I was sitting one day in the office of Able and Co.'s wharf-boat, at Cairo, Illinois. At that time a tax was collected on all goods shipped South by private parties, and it was necessary that duplicate invoices of shipments be furnished the Collector before the permits could be issued. Ignorance of this fact by many shippers frequently caused them much annoyance, and invoices were oftentimes made out with great haste, in order to secure shipment by boats on the eve of departure. A sutler with a lot of stores had made out a hasty list of his stock, and gave it to one of the youngest clerks on the boat to copy out in due form. The boy worked away down the list, but suddenly he brought up standing, and electrified the whole office by exclaiming, in a voice of undisguised amazement: "What the dickens is that fellow going to do with four boxes Tom Cats?" An incredulous laugh from the other clerks was the reply, but the boy pointed triumphantly to the list, exclaiming, "That's what it is—T-o-m C-a-t-s—Tom Cats, if I know how to read!" The entrance of the sutler at that moment explained the mystery. "Why, confound it!" said he, "that means four boxes Tomato Catsup!—don't you understand abbreviations?" The roar which followed can be imagined.

A YALE man writes to the Drawer:

The Freshmen and Sophomore classes were engaged the other evening in one of their periodical "rushes," as they call them, and had attracted a great crowd both of participants and spectators. Just then there came by one of the college tutors, a very tall and extremely nervous and excitable man, who of course deemed it his duty to put a stop to the affair. Accordingly, elbowing his way into the middle of the crowd, where his great height made him conspicuous above all the rest, he broke up the "rush" with these words: "Disperse to your several homes, or you will all be treated as such!"

FROM Illinois we have these two that follow:

Professor H—, of the Iowa Medical College, is an inveterate joker, as his friends know to their grief. His best joking field is among the students, who semi-annually throng his school for instruction in the healing art. But once upon a time an ex-military student of his class flanked and vanquished him by one of those deceptive movements known generically as "strategy." Professor H— was lecturing his class upon diseases of the cranium generally, and accidents to that locality specially; and, to conclude, quizzed them thoroughly on the difference between fracture of the skull and concussion of the brain, and was pleased to see that all understood it, but was annoyed and pained to find that the military man couldn't see it.

Now you can hardly see the point of the student's joke unless you can understand how fully in earnest the Professor is in all his instructions, and how anxious he is to have his class clearly comprehend every subject introduced. To this end he would, if necessary, spend a whole night in explanations.

On this occasion, when he found the young man still ignorant of the subject, he patiently went through a long and tedious explanation, in the most commonplace terms, and then asked, "What he would do if he had a case of concussion of the brain?" After several minutes of profound cogitation, he replied, "I think I would use the trephine" (an instrument only used in cases of fracture). At this reply the Professor seemed almost to despair of imparting the necessary knowledge to an understanding of the subject, but again gave the student a most elaborate description of the skull and its construction, and a very lucid discourse upon the brain and its functions—expatiating largely upon the different symptoms produced by a fracture of the one and a concussion of the other, and fully explained the treatment adapted to the separate cases, all in his earnest, energetic manner; and then asked, almost triumphantly, as having assisted the young man to surmount a huge obstacle to his ascent of the hill of Science, "Now, what would you do first if you had a case of fracture of the skull?"

"I think I would send for a doctor?"

Such a shout as greeted the disgusted Professor at this reply would have broken up a Western camp meeting. There was no more lecturing that day, and for a long time Professor H—— had "information on the brain" which made him very sensitive to any allusion to that organ.

THE Rev. John Henry, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, emigrated to this country from Ireland about the year 1829, and was sent to Eastern Circuit, Talbot County, Maryland, a short time afterward. He was a fine preacher and accomplished theologian, but as simple as a child pertaining to matters of the world. His many innocent and amusing blunders were often the subject of sportive remarks among his friends.

On one occasion he was called on by Hon. John Leeds Kerr, formerly United States Senator, who informed him that his horse had been in the habit of getting into a pasture lot belonging to him (Mr. Kerr), and suggesting that he had better take measures to prevent the trespass in future. "An', Mr. Kerr," said Mr. Henry, "have you a better place to put him?"

On another occasion he was preaching in a country meeting-house, the pulpit, as was frequently the case in those days, being elevated nearly to the ceiling, when he heard a tapping on the roof immediately over his head. He at once stopped and listened. "What's that?" said he. One of the brethren told him not to be alarmed; it was only a woodpecker pecking on the roof. "An' will he hurt my horse?" said he.

MR. DRAWER,—I notice in your collection of curiosities several from Michigan. I will give you another, which created some merriment when it was got off:

We were doing duty in the wilds of Arkansas, and were longing to hear something from our State, when Captain Isaac Wilson, known throughout the regiment (Third Michigan Cavalry) for his "dryness," his length of person, and slender legs—which were got up after the sucker fashion—came up fresh from the Wolverine State (having been absent on leave) to the sutler's tent, where were congregated a number of gossiping officers. After the greeting was over, and hands shaken all around, "Ike" was asked how matters stood in Michigan. "Right bad!" he said; "I came near being arrested for vagrancy." "Why, how was that?" asked several at once. "Why," answered the imperturbable Cap, "for having no visible means of support!"

HERE is another from the same source:

A number of officers were descanting on the business sacrifices each had made by entering the service. Several had expressed their losses in high figures, when the Captain broke in with—"I have lost more by entering the service than any other officer present; I lost ten thousand dollars in gold." "How did that happen?" said an officer who had placed his figures above the others. "When I entered the service," said Ike, "I thought of marrying a girl worth $10,000, but soon after I left the State she married another chap!"

WE saw Jake nailing up a box, the other day, containing some articles which he intended sending by express. From the nature of the contents we knew it was essential that the box should not be inverted on the passage. So we ventured the suggestion to Jake to place the much-abused "This side up!" etc., conspicuously upon the cover. A few days after we saw Jake. "Heard from your goods, Jake? Did they get there safely?" "Every one broke!" replied Jake, sullenly. "Lost the hull lot! Hang the Express Company!" "Did you put on, 'This side up,' as we told you?" "Yes, I did; an' fur fear they shouldn't see it on the kiver, I put it on the bottom tew—confound 'em!"

A COUSIN of mine visited Charleston, South Carolina, recently, and seeing a negro lounging on a bale of cotton, accosted him, saying:

"Well, Uncle, I suppose, you are enjoying your freedom?"

"Yes, berry much."

"What are you doing now?"

"Nothing at de present time."

"But 'nothing' won't feed you long."

He replied, with great deliberation: "I am not speaking for long; I am speaking for de present time!"

AMONG the "characters" who have passed away during the past few years is one who was known far and near as "Old Hat," though how he earned this respectful appellation is to the writer unknown. But he bore it well, and always answered to it. He came to Western New York at an early day, secured a competence, and then, resting on his well-earned honors, passed his years at the grocery, the shoemaker's, and the tavern, telling the most prodigious yarns that mortals ever heard. Here is one he used to tell with honesty and sincerity beaming from every feature:

"Yes," Old Hat would say, "that was a curious circumstance; but it's true, every word of it—true as I stand here. You see one of my horses was taken sick when I was plowing, and it died in less than ten minutes. It was powerful sudden. I never see the beat on't, and I felt bad, I tell you; but the animal was dead, and I was in a mighty hurry; so I jest cut the hide open, hitched t'other hoss to it, and—off it come! Well, I did it up and sent it to the tannery, but pretty soon I see the old hoss wasn't quite dead. It began to kick and breathe regular, and fust I knew it was up on its feet lookin' around, and not a bit of hide on except round the head. Well, you see it couldn't live so long, so I thought I'd try an experiment. I took four—no, three—no, it was four sheep—I want to keep to the truth—and skinned 'em, put their hides right on to the old hoss, tied 'em on tight, and they growed right tight to the critter, all except a leetle spot on the off fore-shoulder, and that I cured up in a little while. It's a fact; and some years I sheared more'n forty pounds of fine wool off from that ar hoss—just as true as I stand here!" And "Old Hat's" face would beam out with such genial self-satisfaction at his ingenuity, and so brim over with candor, that few were found who dared to throw suspicion on this startling feat of surgical skill.

"MONEY is no 'count to me," he would say. "I had so much stuff of one kind and another when I lived East it fairly pestered me. Why, when I came away I burned up a pile bigger than a meet-in'-house, because I didn't know what to do with it! I was in something of a hurry, and when I left there was twenty-two cows—or three—twenty-two, if I remember right—in a barn, one side a little ways, that I forgot all about; and the poor things bein' all tied up starved to death, I heard afterward. It was too pesky bad!"—"Old Hat" would add, his mouth overflowing with smiles and tobacco-juice—"too bad, but I clean forgot 'em!"

OLD JO Philips is a character known far and wide through this section of country (Connecticut) as a vendor of fish; very much given to his cups, but a man of good education and considerable wit. About five years ago his eldest son, who is also rather inclined to the use of the flowing bowl, wished to go on a whaling voyage; so old Jo furnished him the needful, and the boy started for New Bedford to ship, but while there he got on a spree and spent all his money; he then concluded he would like to return to his home and give up his proposed voyage, so he wrote to his father for the wherewith to return. Old Jo being a little set up at the time of the receipt of the letter, went to the telegraph office and sent the following message: "If you want to come home sell your oil!"

THE little son, only four years old, of a gentleman in Chicago had received, as a present from his father, some chickens and a little dog. Soon after coming into possession of his treasures the chickens commenced to lay, and, as a matter of course, he was much interested in gathering up their eggs. One day he found an egg in the dog-house—a circumstance that to him conveyed only one meaning. When his father came home he ran to him and imparted his bright idea in the following words: "Oh, papa, I think that dog's dittin to be a chitten, he's laid an egg!"

THERE lives in Lexington, Missouri, a grand old patriot, Major W. B. Smallwood, now nearly ninety years old. Major Smallwood is emphatically a Western man, having moved from Virginia to Ohio about the year 1800, where he continued to live until some ten or twelve years ago, when he came to Missouri, whither most of his boys had emigrated before him. The old patriot of whom I write served his country in the war of 1812; and when treason raised its standard sheet he was not slow to espouse the cause of his country, and sought to inspire all around him with like patriotic sentiments. At the time General Price's army reached Lexington, on the occasion of his last raid into Missouri, Mr. S. was staying at his son's residence, about one mile from Lexington. General Shelby's brigade was already encamped all around the house and in the orchard. The old veteran could not keep still, nor stay in the house, but hobbled about with his cane, denouncing traitors as freely as if he had an army at his back. One evening he was standing at the front gate when a rebel officer rode up and accosted him.

"Old gentleman, can you tell me where General Price's head-quarters are?"

"No; Sir; but I can tell you where they ought to be."

"Well, where do you think they ought to be?"

For an instant the blood of his youthful days returned, and the old soldier replied, shaking his faithful cane in the face of the officer:

"In hell, Sir!—in hell!"

A FUNNY story is told of Elder Allen, an aged minister in a part of New England where, at that time, the decorum usually observed in public worship had been but imperfectly developed. The Elder had been greatly annoyed, especially during prayer, by the restless demeanor of members of his congregation. The aisles resounded with the footsteps of those who saw fit to go out, and again echoed to the tread of the laggards who, detained by discussions of cattle, crops, and politics outside, had just seen fit to come in. The Elder, though strong in exhortation, was but weak in grammar, and his soul was vexed within him. Pausing in his prayer, and leisurely surveying his flock, he gave vent to the wish that "them that was in would stay in, and them that was out stay out, and put a stop to this eternal trampoosein!"

A STORY is preserved among the legends of a New England town of a pair of worthy old ladies—sisters-in-law we believe they were—who were quite inseparable; indeed it was a standing joke in the town that if Aunt Sarah should get to heaven her first inquiry would be, when safe inside the gates, "Is Sister Champlin here?" The old ladies had many tastes in common; among them was a somewhat singular one—a passionate desire to attend all the funerals in the region round about. One morning a report was circulated of the death of old Mr. Sharp, the minister in a neighboring town. The hour for the funeral services had not been mentioned, but judging that they would occur on the second day, Aunt Sarah and Sister Champlin, each arrayed in a new black silk apron, as being eminently appropriate for funeral wear, set forth at sunrise—determined, at all events, to be in time. Aunt Sarah being the proprietress of a "one-horse shay"—a rickety concern drawn by a lazy old mare—had called for Sister Champlin, and by dint of much persuasion of the obstinate beast, the pair by nine o'clock reached the borders of the town where the minister had resided. At this point they met Mr. Sharp's hired man, driving a yoke of cattle. The old ladies drew up, and Sister Champlin, as spokeswoman, inquired what hour had been appointed for Mr. Sharp's funeral. "Why, bless yer soul, Miss Champlin, the minister ain't dead yet!—shouldn't be surprised if he held out till fall; he's got the wear in him, the old man has!" Aunt Sarah drew up the reins with an air of resignation, as if to turn round. Suddenly she dropped them. "Sister Champlin! Sister Champlin! dew ask the cetur if he don't know of a funeral we can go to!"

RUIN OF OLD CHURCH NEAR CHARLESTOWN.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR. BY A VIRGINIAN.

[Second Paper.]

PATTERSON'S CAMPAIGN.

DURING the fortnight between the 30th of May and 14th of June I find no event recorded worthy of special comment. The news of Kelley's victory at Phillippi and Butler's defeat at Big Bethel were received and commented upon according to the faith and sympathies of the commentators. The day of vehement protest and passionate discussion was past. Since the voting on the 23d of May Unionism in Jefferson was dumb. All interest was centred in the adverse preparations for the coming struggle. One party gloated in silence over exaggerated rumors of the martial power concentrating at Chambersburg and Washington, while the other with wide-mouthed vaunts told of the invincible hosts at Manassas and Harper's Ferry; yet with the advent of actual war quarreling had ceased in a great measure.

The thunder of the opening cannon had begun to dissipate illusions in which many had indulged. Blood had already flowed. This mustering of armies might, after all, turn out to be something more serious than "a log-cabin and hard-cider demonstration," as some had fondly hoped it would be. We are told of certain savage tribes who believe that an eclipse of the moon is caused by the endeavor of a great codfish to swallow that planet; consequently when an eclipse takes place they get up a mammoth charivari to frighten the fish and make him disgorge. Now there was a very prevalent idea among those who were aiding and abetting Secession that all this military demonstration was nothing more than a grand charivari, calculated to frighten the great Yankee codfish into loosening his hold on the National Government which it was supposed he was about to swallow. As the grim reality began to force itself upon them these dreamers grew thoughtful, silent, and some even manifested a willingness to retrograde from their extreme position; but they had kindled a fire which they could not quench, and had raised a storm which would overwhelm them and their infatuated victims in common ruin. It was curious to observe the psychological phenomena of these days. In January, the indignation against South Carolina was universal. A call for volunteers to suppress her would have been answered by a general uprising. In February, indignation had calmed down to simple disapproval, and a disposition to leave South Carolina and the rest to the castigation due from the General Government; yet one who would have publicly advocated the Secession of Virginia ran a risk of being stoned in the streets. In March, advocacy of Secession under certain circumstances was tolerated, and Unionism began to be modified with many an "if" and "but." In April, surprised and overwhelmed by the sudden action of the Richmond Junta, backed by extraneous armed force, Unionism in Eastern and Middle Virginia (after a short and unavailing resistance) yielded soul, body, and estate in ignominious submission to the remorseless conqueror. In May, many of those who had been most positive and uncompromising in their resistance of Secession were now found among its most zealous partisans.

During the prevalence of epidemic diseases it is observed that on their first appearance the cases are of a milder type and slow in development, but as the contagion spreads and progresses its symptoms increase in virulence and intensity; the premonitions of an attack are shorter, and frequently do not appear at all—the incipency, development, and fatal conclusion all occurring within the space of a few hours. It was thus with the great political epidemic of 1860-61, as observed in the district occupied and covered by Joe Johnston's army. By the month of June the circle of more robust characters that still retained their political sanity was small and diminishing daily. They did not drop off now after long and lingering arguments, painful doubts, rallyings, and relapses as formerly; but a normal mind would fall suddenly into incoherence and frenzy. Principles based upon the education and habits of a lifetime, sustained by the clearest views of interest, the pride of consistency, and every sentiment of honor, would perish in a night, like the gourd of Jonah. This change was easily discernible in the countenance and demeanor of its victims. Yesterday your friend looked in your face with a clear and earnest eye, and discussed questions calmly and logically. To-day he shunned you, his eye was restless and unsteady, his manner painfully excited, his talk full of incoherencies; in a short time you would perceive there was a total absorption of all his previous opinions, idiosyncrasies, social sympathies, and antipathies, moral and intellectual characteristics, in the prevailing frenzy.

These phenomena, which at first excited indignation, grief, and amazement, in the course of time ceased to surprise, and became subjects of merriment. Among ourselves we speculated jocosely as to who would "go under" next; and in the privacy of our own souls entertained the question, whether it was the world around us or ourselves that was mad.

It is useful, perhaps, but not the less humiliating to human pride, to test the depth and power of individual principle and will, to ascertain precisely for how many days and hours one's best-founded opinions and most positive convictions will maintain themselves unsupported against the current of society and the menaces of power. From the observations of these few months I have become convinced that no amount of clear conviction, rectitude of purpose, or moral heroism can long maintain a passive defense against the assaults of an active and fiery enthusiasm. Organization must meet organization; passion blaze out against passion; the audacious and unscrupulous spirit of revolution must be counteracted by a spirit as bold and remorseless as itself. The idea is expressed with more point and brevity in the popular epigram, "One must fight the Devil with fire."

The National Government had thus far lost every thing by its temporizing and conciliatory policy. The conservative and deprecatory Unionism of Jefferson and Lower Virginia generally was by this time virtually dead. The Secessionists had justified their boasts, and now owned the souls, bodies, and estates of the late Union majority by as absolute a tenure as that by which they held their African bondsmen. It was a despotism, moral, social, and political, the most absolute that was ever seen or conceived of. As time passed it was interesting and amusing to gather up the arguments, motives, plans, reasons, and hopes upon which men based and justified their action. The expressions of the rank and file rarely reached beyond the commonplace and indefinite gabble about "Southern rights," "Our slave property," "Sacred soil," "Virginia is gone out," "No right to coerce a State," "Damned abolitionists," and such other catch-words and phrases as had been furnished by their adroit and subtle leaders. As many of these fellows were neither native Virginians nor even native Americans, and most of them entirely innocent of the crime of slave-owning, it is to be supposed that they had but a dim comprehension of the significance of these phrases; yet they were not the less zealous for that.

A more knowing class would inform you that the United States Government had become utterly corrupt, rotten to the core, and was hastening with fearful rapidity toward anarchy and agrarianism. The South, to preserve her purity and vitality, must separate herself from this foul body. You might answer that the Government had worked well enough when pure and able men directed it; and if of late years it had become corrupt and feeble (a truth in which I fully concurred), had it not deteriorated under the management of the very men who now appeared as the self-constituted founders of a Southern Confederacy? But the experiment of popular government is a failure. It has been tried and found wanting. The extension of popular rights, universal suffrage, elective judiciary, and all similar concessions to the great popular whale must be withdrawn. This could only be done by the secession and separate nationality of the South. We will establish there "a government of broadcloth and brains." This, I believe, was a characteristic epithet invented by Senator Wigfall, and was usually repeated sotto voce, emphasized by a complaisant glance at the speaker's own coat, and a significant touch with the forefinger upon his frontal sinus. It might again be remarked that such declarations, coming from men who had attained power and place by asserting the most extreme Democratic ideas, must convince the country that they were either grossly incompetent as statesmen—having labored so long under a delusion—or that they were hypocrites, utterly unworthy of confidence. They must per force accept one or the other horn of this dilemma. Moreover, how is this governing body of ἄριστοι to be designated? The vast wealth which is to inundate the South six months after a proposed date will enable every man to wear broadcloth ad libitum; but how is the question of brains to be settled?—by accepting a man's own estimate, or by turning him over to a Committee of Congress?

"Pish!" exclaims our impatient interlocutor, "all these details will be arranged afterward. The plan is, that no man shall be recognized as a gentleman or have a voice in the government who does not own a nigger."

"One poor nigger!—Bah!—that will be a cheap entrance-fee into your House of Peers, scarcely equal to the old property qualification which these same gentlemen were so eager to abolish ten years ago."

A PATENT OF NOBILITY.

"Let us put the qualification up to twenty negroes, or a hundred, if you like."

"Any arrangement will suit, my friend, so that you and I are of the anointed."

A third saw in the Confederacy the realization of an idea such as none but the brain of a Southern statesman could conceive. An assemblage of independent sovereignties, forming a national league, so nicely and delicately adjusted that while each State should have the right to nullify, veto, and despise the decrees of the central power and secede from it at pleasure, at the same time the combination would be powerful enough to overawe Yankeeedom, enforce alliances with France and England, annex Cuba and Mexico, reopen the slave-trade, raise cotton, and bully the world.

The next fellow you met was cock-a-hoop for a monarchy—elective or hereditary, it didn't matter. Popular rights was a humbug. The insolence and ignorance of the masses had become insufferable; "οἱ πολλοί—οἱ κακοί." State Sovereignty was also a humbug—a synonym of anarchy, best illustrated by the fate of the Kilkenny cats. State lines were to be abolished, and absolute centralization established under a king—ay, call him a king, and let him wear a crown. "When a government fails for want of power to sustain itself, falls into disintegration from excess of the Democratic idea of local and individual independence, to what possible end can a revolution lead if not to establish principles the opposite of those which have caused it?"

"There is philosophy in what you say, my neighbor, but how is your kingdom to be established?"

"We have the power already in our hands, and the men—"

"The monarch, the court, and aristocracy are doubtless ready; but where are your subjects? Can you convert the hereditary freeman of five generations into serfs by a simple edict?"

"Yes. They have not so far to go as you might suppose."

To those familiar with the workings of political power in the Southern States, these assertions will hardly appear rash or unfounded.

Again, those who had large interests in the slave-breeding States, fearing the depreciation of their peculiar wares, did not admit the African slave-trade into their plans. The cotton planters reveled in visions of free trade with all the world; while it was confidently proclaimed that under a tariff, high enough to prohibit Yankee competition, Virginia and the other Border States would grow up vast manufacturing interests, and Richmond would in a few years rival Birmingham.

Many were still sanguine enough to believe that the great end (whatever it might be) would be accomplished without a serious war. A strong political party in the North was pledged to acquiescence in the movement; the commercial interests of the Free States would render them averse to war; the modern Samson, whose hair was cotton (Sea Island growth, long fibre), would control them as he would the rest of the world. In short, England and France could not and would not permit a long war—they were pledged.

The Confederacy then was an accomplished fact. All that remained to be done was to complete the arrangement of details, about which every body differed radically and irreconcilably; and to portion out the honors and profits of the new concern which every body coveted. Youthful enthusiasts reveled in dreams of unbounded wealth, pomp, luxury, and innumerable negroes; while some of the more judicious were troubled with doubts lest the star of the new nation might be prematurely dimmed, and its vigor corrupted by the very vastness of its assured prosperity. Indeed it was difficult to find one of the so-called thinking classes who had not a theoretic plan for the new government; a plan which, while it secured the expounder's especial interests, was calculated at the same time to raise the prospects of the Confederacy to an amazing height.

A quondam friend—Stephen Mansfield, of happy memory—once an humble actor in county elections, etc., calling on an acquaintance for the purpose of expressing his sentiments, and incidentally to borrow a dime, declared himself in favor of the new movement. As he had been told that under Secession "every white man would be obliged to own land and niggers," while he had never been able to possess either under the old Government, he thought the change would be an advantage to every body. If this proposition of simple Stephen was in any wise more absurd or impracticable than those emanating from more pretentious sources, I was unable to perceive it.

Beneath this froth of excitement and hallucination there was a solid basis of sincere and educated opinion. The dogma of independent State Sovereignty, in its fullest significance, was conscientiously maintained by a large class of gentlemen in the South and elsewhere. The traditional pride of the Virginian rendered his mind a congenial soil for the cultivation of this plant of local growth. Its roots had struck deep and its branches overshadowed the land. From a mere political dogma it had developed into a pervading social, I might almost say religious, sentiment.

Many who denied the expediency of Secession accepted its accomplishment, and prepared with heavy hearts to maintain it at all hazards. Many who with prophetic vision foresaw the impending destruction armed their souls with fortitude to meet it in the name of Virginia. Many who denied the justice of Secession and abhorred its leaders shrunk from the idea of fratricidal war, and bowed in acquiescence to a power which demanded blood, exile, or submission. Many continued to protest until their sons drew the sword and their daughters wore the colors of the Confederacy. It then appeared there were no Brutuses in Virginia. Perhaps it is fortunate for society that men of that type are scarce.

While there were still a few men found who stubbornly struggled against the sweeping current, the women of all ages and conditions threw themselves into it without hesitation or reserve. Their voluble tongues discussed the great question as rationally and philosophically as might be expected under the circumstances, while their nimble fingers aided more intelligently in solving the problem of clothing and equipping the hastily levied defenders of "God's glory and Southern rights."

THE HAVELOCK.

Sewing societies were organized, and delicate hands which had never before engaged in ruder labor than the hemming of a ruffle now bled in the strife with gray jeans and tent cloth. Haversacks, knapsacks, caps, jackets, and tents were manufactured by hundreds and dozens. The gift most in vogue from a young lady to her favored knight was a head-dress imitated from those worn by the British troops in India and called a Havelock. Laden with musket, sabre, pistol, and bowie-knife, no youth considered his armament complete unless he had one of these silly clouts stretched over his hat. Woe to the youth who did not need a Havelock; who, owing to natural indisposition or the prudent counsel of a father or a friend, hesitated to join the army of the South. The curse of Clan Alpin on those who should prove recreant to the sign of the fiery cross was mere dramatic noise compared with the curse that blighted his soul. His schoolmates and companions who had already donned "the gray" scarce concealed their scorn. His sisters, rallied, reproached, and pouted, blushing to acknowledge his ignominy. His Jeannette, lately so tender and loving, now refused his hand in the dance, and, passing him with nose in air, bestowed her smiles and her bouquet upon some gallant rival with belt and buttons. Day after day he saw the baskets loaded with choice viands, roasted fowls, pickles, cakes, and potted sweetmeats, but not for him. Wherever he went there was a braiding of caps and coats, a gathering of flowers and weaving of wreaths, but none for him—no scented and embroidered handkerchiefs waved from carriage-windows as he rode by. The genial flood of social sympathy upon which he had hitherto floated so blandly had left him stranded on the icy shore. Then come the cheering regiments with their drums and banners, the snorting squadrons of glossy prancing steeds, the jingling of knightly spurs, the stirring blast of the trumpets. There they went—companionship, love, life, glory, all sweeping by to Harper's Ferry!

Alas! poor boy, what sense of duty or prudent counsels could hold him in the whirl of this moral maelstrom? What did he care for the vague terror of an indictment for treason, or the misty doctrine of Federal supremacy? What did he know of nationality beyond the circle of friends and kindred? What was his sneaking, apologetic, unsympathetic life worth after all? The very bondsman who held his horse as he mounted for his morning ride seemed to reproach him, as, touching his hat, he remarks, suggestively, "Young master, dis boss of yours is mighty proud and mettlesome—he would look fine in the cavalry." Very well; in two days—more or less—you might see young master in the cavalry, prancing gallantly with the rest of them, a Havelock flapping about his ears, spurs jingling on his heels, the light of manhood rekindled in his eye, and a fresh posy in his button-hole, atoning for his former hesitancy by distinguished zeal in the great cause.

But according to my judgment the greater number of these young volunteers were moved neither by social pressure nor political prejudice. The all-pervading love of adventure and fighting instincts were the most successful recruiting officers of the occasion. For they had heard of battles, and had longed to follow to the field some warlike lord—so at the first roll of the drum they rushed cheerily from school-house and office, counter and work-shop, field and fireside, earnest, eager, reckless fellows, marching with a free and vigorous step, sitting their horses like wild Pawnees, most admirable material for a rebellion, just as good soldiers for the Government if perchance the rub-a-dub of the Union drums had first aroused their martial ardor.

Looming up behind and above this cloud of anarchic passion one can observe the powers that have assumed to direct the storm. The inner circle composed of the so-called statesmen of the South—the Lucifers of the republic—some engaged in devising curbs and bridles for this wild tornado, upon which they hoped to ride, but which has already begun to alarm them; others luxuriating in visions of prospective empire, so vast and dazzling that the greatness of their present crime appears as nothing in comparison. They may be fairly likened to a boat's crew of adventurers drifting in the current of the upper Niagara—some with anxious faces hold the tiller, tug at the ropes, and turn the sails, while others with cheery shout point to the iridescent clouds that float over the verge of the impending cataract.

As the season advanced the military preparations on either side approached completion, and the air was filled with rumors of movements from every quarter. Bridge-burning on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad had already commenced, and a skirmishing warfare initiated all along the line of the upper Potomac between picket guards and independent zealots, who expended much ammunition and valor in firing at each other across the river. During the three or four weeks that this fighting continued I never heard of any one being hurt on the Virginia side, but, if any reliance can be placed on the reports brought into Charlestown, the slaughter on the Maryland bank must have been prodigious.

Although the leaders at Harper's Ferry kept their own counsel, their preparations afforded unmistakable evidence that they would evacuate that place on the first advance of the national troops. What was clear to a military eye was so little credited by the people of Charlestown that those were bitterly denounced and menaced with arrest who ventured to express the opinion that Harper's Ferry would not be held. A prominent and eccentric politician had once called it the "Thermopylæ of America," and thereafter the people of the vicinity regarded Harper's Ferry as the impregnable bulwark of the State and the Southern cause. So on the afternoon of the 14th of June, when the advanced brigade of Johnston's army passed through Charlestown, announcing that the evacuation had actually commenced, there was the greatest consternation among the Secessionists, and a corresponding elevation of spirits among the loyal.

June 15.—To-day the main body of Johnston's army passed through town, moving by the turnpike toward Winchester. The force consisted of fourteen regiments or organizations of infantry, twenty-three pieces of artillery, and about six hundred cavalry under Colonel J. E. B. Stuart, with a train of two hundred and forty wagons. Including the brigade which passed yesterday, the whole numbered about twelve thousand men. The day was intensely hot and the roads dusty. The troops moved so deliberately that the column seemed to crawl rather than march. The halts were also very frequent and long continued, so that their passage through the village occupied the whole day.

This easy marching gave the army a fair opportunity of testing the hitherto unfathomable hospitality of this village. During the entire day the whole population, white and black, devoted themselves to cooking and serving the soldiers. Of the ten or twelve thousand men that passed, covered with dust and devoured with the chronic hunger and thirst of marching armies, no man asked for meat, drink, or refreshment of any kind which was not cheerfully and gratuitously furnished him. The houses were thronged with officers, the curb-stones lined with soldiers resting under the shade trees, while men, women, and children were circulating among them offering refreshments to all. For that day, at least, all remembrance of political strife and division of sentiment was absorbed in the humane joy of ministering to the hungry wayfarer. Half the available young men of the county were marching with the army, and there was not a mother, wife, sister, or bright-eyed child whose hospitable service was not stimulated through the weary hours by the thought of a son, husband, brother, or father who had donned the gray and was marching to an uncertain future; not one whose heart did not swell with the voiceless prayer, "May the bread which I give to this stranger be returned to my dear one when he shall have need!"

By sunset the army was gone and the town quiet. They encamped for the night on Bull Skin Run, about four miles on the road toward Winchester. During the day I had a full opportunity of criticising the appearance and material of this army. The infantry, despite its rags and dust, had a dangerous look. The regiments from the Gulf States were apparently of picked men. The Tenth Georgia (I think it was), numbering eleven hundred, was the finest-looking regiment I ever saw. Looking along the line you were struck with the uniformity of size and height, all healthy, athletic men, between the ages of twenty-five and thirty-five. In the Second Virginia and First Maryland regiments there appeared, on the contrary, to be many boys under size and under military age.

Each regiment was followed by a gang of negro servants all bearing arms of some kind, and apparently as much interested in the cause as the whites. Men must be totally blinded by passion not to perceive the sinister significance of this servile armament. Is it to be expected that after having become familiarized with the license of camps and the excitement of campaigning that these men will resume their former lives of rural simplicity and contented bondage? Will the hand that has acquired the usage of pistol and sabre quietly take up the shovel and the hoe again at the bidding of a master? This seems only an example of the general fatuity—a war instituted ostensibly in defense of negro slavery, against the only power on earth which had the will and ability to insure its protection—a war which must inevitably destroy the institution it professes to defend.

Johnston's artillery impressed me as being inferior both in guns and equipment; and it was manned chiefly by raw volunteers, who had had so far very little experience in handling the pieces. Pendleton's Battery was reputed the best drilled in the command. The cavalry, under Colonel J. E. B. Stuart, was admirably mounted, and better equipped according to its needs than any other arm. It was composed almost entirely of volunteers from the rural gentry and independent landholders of the country, who furnished their own horses, arms, and accoutrements. They generally appeared on picked animals, and armed with a greater variety of ordnance stores than was either needful or convenient—not omitting the Havellock obligé. These young fellows were bold and dashing riders, good shots, full of spirit and emulation, and promised, with experience and iron discipline, to constitute a formidable body of cavalry. The habits and opinions of the times, however, had developed in them that exaggerated individuality which would render the strict enforcement of discipline almost impossible, and they already had begun to exhibit decided Cossack tendencies.

General Johnston himself appeared in plain citizen's dress, with common round hat, his deportment and manner altogether as unostentatious as his dress. His person seemed to be rather under the medium size, erect, vigorous, with a military whisker and a handsome face. It required no imagination, however, to see through this unimposing exterior the leading attributes which the world characterizes as soldierly.

As the army broke camp at Harper's Ferry the railroad bridge over the Potomac was blown up and burned. The wooden bridge at Shepherdstown was burned the night previous. Those at Berlin and Point of Rocks went several days before, as did the viaducts at Opequan and Martinsburg.

As we sat upon the porch enjoying the evening coolness a squad of infantry, which had been on picket duty somewhere, was passing by to overtake its regiment. They were talking earnestly among themselves, roundly damning their bad luck, and accusing certain officers of favoritism. "If," said one, "there is a bridge to be burned, or shops to be blown up, or any other fun going on, we are sent out on picket, and are never allowed a chance." This was voted a grievous wrong, and their further murmurings died away in the distance. It was a very fair exhibit of the animus which led many of these young patriots into the rebellion.

June 16, Sunday.—Accompanied by some friends I visited Harper's Ferry to-day, hoping to find it occupied by the Union troops. On Bolivar Heights we found seven heavy guns which had been abandoned, the pieces spiked and choked, the carriages burned, and a quantity of ammunition scattered over the hill-side. The whole place was in a state of filthy desolation. A few meagre mountaineers were strolling about to see what they could pick up, while hogs, dogs, and buzzards were disputing over the offal of the recent camps.

The bridge over the Potomac was gone, the débris still burning where it had fallen between the piers. The machinery from the armory, except some very heavy pieces, was also gone—sent to Richmond, I was told, and followed by a number of the artisans with their families.

Some of those who had taken refuge in Maryland during the rebel occupation were already returning in boats to rejoin their families, who awaited them at the landing in Harper's Ferry. A considerable number of men, women, and children were collected, when a young girl came running at full speed, and, all rosy and flustered, whispered some startling tidings. There was a sudden scattering of the adult males who had recently landed, some disappearing in adjacent sewers and cellars, while others hastily took the boats and paddled back to Maryland.

It had been rumored that Ashby's cavalry had appeared on Bolivar Heights; but this, it seems, was without foundation. Disappointed at not finding the National army here we returned home to Charlestown. Here we heard that Patterson's army had crossed the Potomac at Williamsport, and was advancing on Martinsburg, while Johnston had suddenly wheeled about at Bunker's Hill, and was hurrying to attack the Federals on the Martinsburg turnpike.

June 17.—The news of yesterday being confirmed by couriers this morning, I mounted my horse and rode to Martinsburg, hoping to witness the battle, and feeling confident of the defeat of the rebels. During my ride of sixteen miles I did not meet a human being on the roads, generally much frequented. When in sight of Martinsburg I met some market people coming out who informed me that the United States army was within two miles of town advancing, and the Southern army had just passed through to meet them. Expecting at each moment to hear the opening cannon, I accelerated my movements, and on entering the main street perceived it was deserted, and the houses closed. A few moments after I saw a body of Confederate cavalry, with a splendid tri-barred flag, wheel in from the Winchester road, and push rapidly in the direction of Williamsport. A friend here informed me that the National army was still reported at Falling Water, eight miles distant, while Johnston with his main body lay between Bunker Hill and Winchester. The only rebel troops which had yet appeared in Martinsburg were the cavalry I had seen—a body about three hundred and fifty strong under Stuart, which had gone forward to reconnoitre. Betwixt hope and impatience the evening passed away, and we went to bed at length, expecting to find the town occupied by the National army on awakening.

June 18.—Every thing quiet as the grave last night. I walked up street, and found the citizens in a state of great excitement, with varying reports from the front. Country folks who had seen them represented the Federal hosts as glittering with Assyrian splendor, covering the whole land with their numbers. Some affirmed that they were sweeping crops and dwellings from the face of the earth, sparing neither age nor sex. While others gave more reasonable accounts, insisting that they treated the inhabitants with great civility and paid for all they took. The Union people were on the streets and at the windows, hungry with impatience, and scarcely able to restrain themselves in presence of the Confederate troopers, some squads of whom still occupied the town. The feeling among the women was intense, as the young men of Martinsburg were about equally divided between the adverse armies.

Toward mid-day came the astounding and mortifying intelligence that the Union army was falling back. An hour later tidings came that they were actually recrossing at Williamsport. About sunset Colonel Stuart with his cavalry returned, reporting that they had swept the Yankee invaders from the sacred soil.

Bewildered and humiliated I returned to the house of my friends. As we stood upon the sidewalk the triumphant troop rode by, and the political status of the family being a matter of public notoriety, three cheers for Jeff Davis were called and given with unction. The column having reached the end of the street counter-marched, and on repassing gave three awful groans for Abe Lincoln. It was quite evident that the troop had made an unnecessary detour and indulged in this yelping demonstration for the express purpose of insulting the loyalty of the venerable patriot around whom we were grouped. Then in his eighty-second year, the high social position, stainless character, and comprehensive intellect of PHILIP C. PENDLETON had hitherto commanded the respect and reverence of all who approached him. If the chivalric Colonel Stuart, who rode at the head of this troop, could have witnessed the serene smile, or have heard the expression of benignant pity which this coarse demonstration elicited, I will do him the justice to believe he would have blushed.

To the rest of us it was a dark closing to a day which had dawned so hopefully; but we swallowed the dirt, which was our portion I trust, with becoming resignation, and then, with undying faith in the speedy reassertion of Federal supremacy over our land, we turned into the house and spent the remainder of the evening at a cheerful game of backgammon.

June 19.—I returned to my family at Charlestown. While these exciting events occupied the public mind certain civic humanitarians were carrying on an entertaining and somewhat peculiar by-play in Jefferson. It was reported that during the halt of the army on Bull Skin Run three of the soldiers had died, and were buried by their comrades in a very hasty manner. Indeed some visitors from the adjoining county of Clarke said this sacred office had been so slightly performed that portions of the bodies were visible above ground, and they would in all likelihood become a prey to hogs and dogs if the neglect was not speedily remedied. This story circulated, and, to the honor of the community, caused a great deal of horror and some indignation; but as the weather was suffocating, and it was nobody's especial business, nothing was done. The Berryvillians were disgusted, and insisted that if the people of Jefferson had no more respect for themselves than to suffer this stain upon their humanity, the people of Clarke would invade their county sovereignty and give decent burial to the patriot soldiers. The Jeffersonians yawned and intimated that their neighbors were meddlesome. These retorted by saying that people who would leave the bodies of their defenders a prey to swine were not much better than Abolitionists and Yankees.

Aroused at length, the Jeffersonians took immediate steps to vindicate themselves from so foul an imputation. Three neat coffins, with decent grave-clothes, were forthwith prepared and placed in a light wagon. The undertaker, grave-digger, and clergyman mounted beside them, departed to fulfill their worthy mission. The heat was intense, the dust suffocating, but the missionaries were resolute. Arriving in the vicinity of the late encampment they inquired at all the farm-houses for information concerning the locality of the bodies, but to their surprise no one could tell them precisely. The greater part of the day was consumed in going from house to house, vainly seeking for some one who could guide them to the spot. Every body had heard of the story, and every body had some new circumstance of horror to add to it. They visited every grave-yard, public and private, within a circuit of several miles, without finding a grave under twenty years of age. Wearied, vexed, and somewhat mystified they were on the point of giving up the search when, about sunset, an old negro told them he had seen the soldiers burying something in a corn-field at the end of the meadow. Having a superstitious dread of dead people he had not dared to approach the place, but, stimulated by a fee, he led them to the spot.

There, near the brook, they saw the fresh turned earth of three shallow graves, each marked by a rude stone at its head; and there, pitiful and revolting sight! they beheld portions of the dead men's clothes appearing among the hastily turned clods. Men were not accustomed to such sights in those days. In solemn silence the coffins were lifted from the wagon, opened, and laid in order side by side. Three decent graves were dug with much toil and sweat, the old negro assisting. These arrangements completed, the attendants drew near with pick and shovel to exhume the bodies. The moment was impressive and painful. The minister took off his hat and stood with book in hand, prepared to read the Burial-Service, prefaced by some extemporaneous remarks which he had thought over as they rode along, setting forth the awfulness of death under circumstances like the present. A few turns of pick and shovel revealed, not three festering corpses, but three empty Confederate uniforms, ragged, filthy, and all alive. An exclamation of surprise, a gesture of disgust, and the coffins were quickly hustled into the wagon, and the burial party trotted back to Charlestown; not sadder, perhaps, but wiser men than they had gone forth in the morning.

The Secessionists perceiving that the National troops hesitated to advance, and that Johnston's retrograde from Harper's Ferry was not to be looked upon as a retreat, again took heart and became more offensive than ever in their demonstrations. Wearied and disgusted with the tardy progress of events, I determined to return with my family to the Berkeley Springs. The accustomed mode of travel by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was now completely broken up, and a tedious trip of two days by the ordinary country roads was before us.

On the 20th of June we started for Martinsburg. I on horseback, my family in a carriage under the guardianship of a friend who kindly volunteered to accompany us, it being considered unsafe to trust a servant alone with the horses in these troublesome and uncertain times. As we approached Martinsburg late in the afternoon we heard a strange singing and screaming in the air which resembled the notes of a gigantic Æolian. These sounds grew more distinct and definite as we advanced, and still nearer the town we perceived immense columns of black smoke rolling up between us and the setting sun, and tinging the whole landscape with a coppery hue. As these clouds rose from the direction of the railroad shops it was easy to imagine their origin; but the accompanying sounds were unaccountable, until, turning into one of the lower streets of the town, a scene was suddenly presented to us which more resembled a dream of Dante's Inferno than an exhibition of real life.

Jackson's brigade were performing a grand "auto da fé" upon the rolling-stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The fore-ground of the picture was occupied by a ruin of classic form and beauty—that of the pillared viaduct which had been destroyed some weeks before. On the open space in front of the work-shops stood, ranged upon the tracks, between forty and fifty locomotives roasting amidst the flames of a thousand cords of wood, distributed, refreshed, and stirred up continually by a brigade of wild Confederates. The rocks, hills, and houses which surrounded the place of execution were crowded by many hundred spectators, the old men, wives, and children of those who had depended on the road for their subsistence.

Twilight was approaching, and as the lurid light of the fires prevailed the aspect of the scene grew still more unearthly. The rebel soldiers, with their bronzed faces, raggedly picturesque costumes, and fiendish activity, were not unworthy representatives of the familiars of Beelzebub. They worked in silence too, with the sullen and desperate look of men who were executing the work of Fate rather than their own will. Motionless and mute the groups of citizens looked on, terror-stricken, yet every pallid face lowering with dumb execration. The locomotives, as the flames licked their iron bodies, and the heated air rushed through the steam-whistles, despite of mechanism and natural philosophy, impressed the spectator with the idea that they were living victims, who moaned and shrieked with an agony surpassing human comprehension. It was a fitting overture to the Great Drama of the nineteenth century, typifying coming events. A frantic war of barbaric pride, ignorance, and passion against the empire of art, industry, and civilization.

At our house we found a servant who had been left in occupancy, and in due time a comfortable supper was spread for us. We were too much excited to eat, and after the pretense of a meal hurried to bed. To bed, but not to sleep. The house had been dismantled for the season, and our curtainless windows looked toward the railroad. All night long the red light glared and flickered on the walls, and, assisted by semi-somnolent fancies, painted terrible and prophetic pictures in tints of fire and blood. All night long the tortured Leviathans sung in our ears their shuddering anthems of woe.

June 21.—The dawn of morning dispelled these distempered fancies, but brought with it no reviving cheerfulness. Between dreams and realities there was not so much difference after all. On the railroad we could see the wilted and discolored bodies of the locomotives lying amidst the smoke and ashes of their funeral pyres. Their wailings had ceased, and the general feeling of relief thereat was expressed by one of the negroes, who thanked God they were "out of their misery."

I had resolved on my own account not to ask any favors from the rebel head-quarters, but to take the road and run risks of getting through without a passport. My friend, who expected to return to Charlestown with the carriage, fearing that he might be separated from his family by crossing the lines, insisted that he would go no further unless he had a permit to pass and return with the carriage. Consequently I started out after breakfast to find Jackson's quarters, and, following directions received from stragglers, presently found myself in a piece of wood about half a mile in the rear of our house. Here I found the brigade en bivouac, sleeping in line behind their stacked arms. Those that were awake had a jaded, frowzy look, and such as I conversed with did not seem to be in good spirits. The General Head-quarters was not here, but in a house nearly a mile distant. Arrived there, I stated my wishes to the Adjutant General, and the permit was given without difficulty. While talking with this officer, who was an acquaintance, a man came out of an adjoining room, and calling him aside conversed in an undertone. This person, notwithstanding the extreme heat, wore a heavy military over-coat and a plain slouched hat. A stern, sun-burnt face, a short black beard, crisped and grizzled slightly, a serious and resolute air, were the only external characteristics that impressed themselves on my memory during the few moments that I scanned the rebel General—he that was afterward the famous Stonewall Jackson.

Friday, June 21.—We took the road for Berkeley Springs. The old road, once so familiar and busy at this season, was now lonely and desolate. Superseded as a fashionable highway by the railroad, it had for some years fallen into disuse, and we found many of the old farm-houses and stopping-places deserted.

At Tibkenzy's Branch we made our mid-day halt to rest our overheated animals and refresh ourselves from the lunch-basket. We took our meal beside a cool spring bubbling from the rocks beneath the shade of some spreading sycamores. The Blue Mountains were visible in every direction, and we breathed the air with a sense of freedom which we had not experienced for many days, while the unharnessed horses, lately so hot and jaded, rolled in the sand and kicked up their heels with a jollity entirely in unison with our thoughts and feelings.

After an hour or two of refreshing repose we resumed our journey. As we drew near our destination we were a good deal surprised to meet a number of men, women, and children in holiday attire returning to their homes in the hills. On Sunday such an exhibition would have been nothing unusual, but as it was Friday it indicated some extraordinary event. The idea of a wedding was suggested. But not on a Friday—that was too serious a joke. So we drew rein and stopped a troop of sallow-skinned, tawny-haired girls to inquire.

"Why, to be sure, didn't we know?" replied one, with an expression of mingled pity and surprise at our ignorance. They had been to the hanging at Berkeley. We knew, of course, the Pennsylvanian that killed his wife and chopped her up with a corn-cutter. A short time after we passed the gallows, thanking Providence that this guardian of civilized society still exercised its functions within sight of our mountain home.

At Berkeley we found our friends all well, and pleased with the accession to their social circle. Our news from the seat of war was eagerly discussed, and we heard in return interesting items from the free and loyal mount-ains. The change was absolutely delicious. We felt like persons escaping from an ill-ventilated, howling ward in Bedlam into the fresh air and coherent society.

The loyal Virginians of the west had risen in arms to defend their Government, their homes, and their native land. They had declared the State Government lately engulfed in Confederate treason to be vacated and of no authority, and had established a loyal State Government based upon popular rights and the Constitution of the country. This movement centred at Wheeling, and was headed by Francis H. Pierpont. We knew nothing of its details; but, amidst the chaos of twaddle, stultification, treason, and timidity, it rose, the first act of clear, vigorous, and comprehensive statesmanship to which the occasion had yet given birth. It was this movement which saved the nation; and so it will be written when impartial Time shall have set his seal upon the records of History.

It could not be expected, however, that our cheerful social circle would be left undisturbed in times so troubled and uncertain. Morgan County unfortunately occupied the corner of what might be called a double political and military frontier. On the north she touched Maryland, which was occupied by the United States forces, and her western boundary was formed by the mountains which were now the military and political line between loyal and rebellious Virginia. Thus claimed by all parties, accessible to all, to be harassed and plundered by all, it was impossible that either party could occupy or protect her. The people were almost universally opposed to Secession; but the wretched blockheads who managed county affairs were almost to a man in the interest of the rebellion. From Winchester, the headquarters of treason in the Valley, these people got their backing and authority, and used it in a manner which recalled the days of the Prussian conscript officers and the British press-gang. Troops rode over the county, penetrating the most secluded nooks, conscripting men and pressing horses and forage in the name of the Confederacy. A large number of men of military age had already escaped into Maryland and Pennsylvania, where they found employment in the United States army or elsewhere. Those who were caught were handcuffed or roped like felons and driven to Winchester, "to fight for their freedom," as they phrased it. They volunteered cheerfully enough on arriving at the rendezvous, and deserted on the first opportunity. The morning report of the Morgan militia regiment at Winchester usually exhibited the following: Colonel, 1; Lieutenant-Colonel, 1; Major, 1; Adjutant, 1; Quarter-master and assistants, 3; Commissary and assistants, 2; Surgeon, 1; Chaplain, 1; Line officers, 15; rank and file, from 3 to 15, according to the luck of the conscript officers and the state of the weather as favorable or unfavorable for desertion.

These conscripting gangs occasionally came into the village, and one day I was warned by a friendly neighbor to be on my guard. A dozen or fifteen of these fellows, he said, were at his store drinking and planning my arrest. It seems that some persons, whom they had been harassing, had twitted them with cowardice, and dared them to conscript me. They resolved to do so, and purchased a jug of whisky to steam up their courage to the point. I immediately went to my house and loaded my whole armory of guns and pistols, seven pieces, allowing sixteen shots. My wife, who observed these preparations, asked what was the matter? I replied by telling her to crawl under the bed if there was any firing. She said she would prefer to stand by and load the guns for me.

I told her I rather apprehended there would be no occasion to use the present charges. Having finished loading I laid my weapons in convenient positions for use, and sat down near the window with a book in my hand. My wife continued her sewing, looking a little paler than usual perhaps, but otherwise emotionless. I did not read to much advantage, I am sure. At sunset, my fellows having devoured all their whisky, found it not sufficiently stimulating, and rode off yelling and firing their pieces in the air.

I was seriously disappointed at this impotent conclusion of the day's excitement. Indignant at the manner in which the Union men permitted themselves to be hunted, plundered, and bound, I hoped the conscript gang would have afforded me, personally, some justification for a high-handed and decisive act that might have served as an example.

They were careful to afford no such opportunity, even though I afterward threw myself in their way and courted a collision. I should have been ashamed to have sought a quarrel with these "heartless hinds" but for the motive assigned.

At night I always slept with doors and windows barred, and with my loaded weapons within reach. On one occasion, about an hour after midnight, I was aroused by an alarming outcry of yells and oaths mingled with the screams of women and children. The idea of midnight arrests immediately flashed upon me. My cousin, Edmund Pendleton of Martinsburg, had distinguished himself in the late Convention by his firm and uncompromising opposition to Secession. He had persistently refused to recognize or acquiesce in it under any circumstances, and had become in consequence very obnoxious to the revolutionary fomenters. When below I had frequently heard him menaced with arrest, and now supposed that a party had followed him to his retreat at Berkeley. I hastily dressed, and, taking my double-barreled piece charged with sixteen buckshot in each barrel, went down into the street resolved to give the contents to the invaders if I did not find the party hopelessly numerous. Before going far I met an acquaintance aroused by the same noise, who informed me it was only a drunken row among the villagers.

These incidents are recorded as illustrating the daily routine of life on the Border. Each hour had its rumors and excitements, every night its strange alarms.

One day the children were holding a tournament, riding their stick horses and catching the ring on mimic lances. Every male child in Virginia is born with an innate idea in his head in the form of a colt, which grows with his growth until it becomes a horse, which hobby he rides from the cradle to the grave. Thus it is that the earliest sports of the children are chivalric. I was acting chief marshal, and the tournament was proceeding with due pomp and ceremony, Union flags adorned the arch where the ring was suspended, and "Sir Knight of the Union," a chevalier of six summers, flaunting his Union badge, had just set his lance in rest for the charge when the martial clangor of fife and drum in the street announced the advent of some new excitement. A moment after several officers in rebel gray were added to the company of spectators in the court-yard where the lists were erected. Their presence did not check the sports. The "Knight of the Union" proclaimed with a trumpet voice, rode his career, and took the ring handsomely. The Union flags kept their places, the officers laughed with the rest, and the tournament was pronounced a decided success.

The party which had arrived was a sort of independent legion, consisting of about sixty infantry and thirty cavalry, under the command of one Tom Edmondson, late a Member of the United States Congress, now holding a Colonel's commission from the Richmond government. He seemed to be roving about with his command without any fixed military purpose, and actuated with a wild desire to do good generally (for the cause). The presence of this force at first chafed and irritated the Union sentiment of the place excessively. Edmondson made several arrests, and endeavored to frighten or persuade the villagers to take an oath of allegiance to the Confederacy. This was persistently refused, and he very judiciously waived the point.

The day after his arrival a sergeant, with two men, came to my house, and, knocking authoritatively, demanded admittance. I thought the critical hour had arrived, and belting on my revolver went to open the door. The sergeant very civilly presented a politely-worded demand for my arms. I wrote a reply politely declining to part with them, on the ground that I had purchased all the arms that were in my possession, and desired to keep them for my private use. The sergeant presently returned with a note of explanation and apology from Edmondson, saying he had made the demand on information that I had arms belonging properly to the State. The subject was not alluded to afterward.

These first difficulties over, I was relieved to find the invaders a very modest and harmless company. The commander, finding himself surrounded with adverse opinion so universal and determined, did not think it prudent to attempt the coercive, but sought to attain his ends by persuasive means. The men were more orderly and inoffensive than could be believed. They bought a few sheep with orders on the Confederate treasury, took some horses on the same terms, picketed the roads so that we could not visit to Hancock to get Union news, but were otherwise not troublesome. Yet it is very wearing to rise up and lie down, to talk, eat, drink, and live, with the consciousness that you are at the mercy of an irresponsible armed power, without adequate means of resistance or self-protection. Men do get accustomed to this state of things, I suppose; but at Berkeley it was new to us, and we felt it grinding day by day.

Some rumors of Patterson's movements reached us on the 3d of July, but altogether vague and uncertain.

July 4.—Colonel Edmondson delivered a Fourth of July oration in the Methodist church to-day. Curious to know how he would view the national anniversary from his present position I went with my wife to hear him. The oration was a political stump speech of four solid hours' duration. I listened for about an hour, and left the church in disgust, having heard nothing but the flattest egotism, varied with violent abuse of Union men, and clenched with the standing threats of confiscation, exile, and the gallows.

My observations during the last three months had satisfied me as to the true character of the contest which was opening. To my mind it presented the simple choice between a Government and Anarchy. The idea of a Southern Confederacy, a separate nationality, or a tolerable government of any sort being based upon the intractable and irreconcilable elements of which the Southern portion of the United States was made up, struck me as absurd and impossible. Viewing the subject in the most favorable and even flattering light, I could conceive of no other result from the success of the rebellion than bloody and hopeless anarchy involving the whole nation. In the stability and sufficiency of the National Government I had not much confidence; yet we had lived under it in peace and honor for nearly a century, and it was now our only hope. It would stand or fall as the people who created it should determine. In such a crisis I considered that no citizen could claim the privilege of neutrality. I had some time since decided definitely on the course of action which duty demanded of me; yet I hesitated and lingered; I was held in bondage by social and domestic ties that were hard to break. I was an only son. My father was old and feeble, and appeared to need my presence and support. As I was situated it seemed as if my life belonged more to others than to myself. I doubted my capacity to render the Government services sufficiently important to justify the personal sacrifices I would be obliged to make. Thus I debated with myself, lingering from day to day.

Anger supplied the needful stimulant to action. Edmondson's speech was "the feather that broke the camel's back." The same evening I sought a private interview with my father, and informed him that I had determined to join the National Army. I had fortified myself with arguments to combat his objections and console his grief. They were not needed. No sooner had I announced my intentions than he seized my hand with both of his, his eyes flashed fire, and his face glowed as if the blood of youth again warmed his veins. "Go, my son, and take my blessing," he said. "It is, of all others, the position I have most wished to see you occupy. I have but one regret," he continued, as the tears began to gather; "it is that my age and infirmities will prevent me from standing beside you in the ranks of battle. I have sometimes thought to go even as I am. A soldier's death in such a cause would not be hard, but I could not support the incidental fatigues and privations, and I may, perhaps, be able to render more efficient service in sustaining and encouraging these people around me."

After this interview I considered myself enlisted for the war, and only awaited the opportunity to fulfill my engagements.

This afternoon we had news of a battle fought between the National forces under Patterson and the rebels at Falling Water. Several of our mountaineers, according to their usual custom, had gone down into the Valley to assist in cutting the harvest. The forces joined battle on the farm where they were employed, and at the first discharge of artillery they took to their heels, and got home yesterday morning, having run about thirty miles during the night.

July 5.—Our military occupants are evidently uneasy. Couriers are going and coming, and their wagons are packed ready for a move. It is reported that Colonel Lew Wallace's regiment of Zouaves is moving down from Cumberland by the national turnpike.

July 7.—To-day our unwelcome visitors are gone, bag and baggage, moving toward Winchester. The Indiana regiment is reported passing through Hancock. From the hill we can hear the drums.

July 9.—To-day I started for Martinsburg on horseback, taking an obscure road to prevent suspicion of my intentions. After traveling through the woods for several miles I saw a log-cabin in a clearing, and rode up to inquire whether the road was safe. As I approached I saw six or eight men escaping from the opposite side of the house and hiding in the adjacent thickets. At the house I found no one but a little girl, who received me with decided composure, and in reply to my inquiries, said there was no one at home and she knew nothing about the road. I then asked her what men those were who had just left the house. She was confused and silent.

I rode toward the thicket, and announcing my own name in a loud voice, told the men to come out. First one head and then another appeared among the bushes, and presently recognizing me the whole company gathered around. They had met to devise measures for escaping or resisting the rebel conscription, but on seeing me approach they mistook me for one of the officers, and incontinently fled. I recommended to them to keep their rifles loaded, and to shoot the first State agent or conscript officer that attempted to meddle with them. They promised to follow my counsel.

As I continued my journey I found the whole population in alarm. At the houses I saw none but women and children, all the adult males having taken to the woods. The political bias of the country was unmistakably expressed in favor of the Union. At one house, however, a sharp-eyed, buxom dame returned me the usual "Not at home" with a knowing leer, which induced me to ask where the men had gone. "Gone to Winchester, of course, where they ought to be." As I rode on she screamed after me a warning that I would be picked up myself before I got much farther on my road.

As I neared Sleepy Creek Mountain, in passing through a dense wood I was halted by the challenge of a sentinel—a wild-looking mountaineer armed with a squirrel gun. I named my name and unbuttoned my pistol-holster, uncertain as to what welcome I might receive.

I found a party of friendly refugees all around and bivouacked in a laurel brake. They were glad to see me, and thankful for the encouraging news I gave them. They reported the country toward Martinsburg quiet and safe.

From hence to Hedgeville I rode without meeting a human soul. I arrived here about noon, and stopped at the tavern to procure food and rest for myself and horse. While dinner was preparing I went into the parlor to sleep. I presently was disturbed by some wrangling in the hall, and directly after the landlord entered and told me some of the citizens had called and insisted on seeing me, and on knowing where I was going and what my intentions were. He had resisted them, however, and refused to let them disturb me. I told him to inform these officious gentlemen that I was not disposed to answer impertinent questions, and if they persisted they might expect a bullet for an answer. I got my nap and my dinner in peace, and was permitted to pursue my journey unmolested.

Within three miles of Martinsburg I met a foraging party from Patterson's army, and passed with them into the town, which was environed with the Federal camps. The streets were full of loose soldiers, and a sentinel stood at every house to protect the inhabitants from injury or annoyance. I rode directly to look after Norbourne, our family mansion, which had been seized and used as a hospital by the rebels. I found it occupied by the medical staff of one of the Pennsylvania brigades. The establishment had been so roughly used by their predecessors that the new occupants could not injure it further. I made myself known to the surgeon in charge, and received his promise that the property and surroundings should be cared for.

The same evening I presented myself at the army head-quarters, and made the acquaintance of the general staff and most of the officers in command. I proposed to General Patterson to let me have a hundred cavalry for twelve hours, and I would insure the capture of Edmonson's party, which lay at Muger's, eighteen miles distant. The General declined to make any detachments, saying he could not afford to weaken his force. Colonel George H. Thomas, who commanded the cavalry, favored the proposition, and seemed anxious to undertake the raid, upon the principle that these little successes, easily obtained, inspirited the troops, and gave them more confidence when decisive action was required. After-knowledge has convinced me that General Patterson was entirely right. "The game was not worth the candle."

Our picket lines I found were but a short distance south of Martinsburg, and were continually pressed by an active and audacious enemy. Our foraging parties rarely went out without being fired on or stampeded. Most exaggerated ideas of the rebel force prevailed at head-quarters. The most judicious estimated them at twenty-five or thirty thousand. In talking with Colonel Fitz John Porter, chief of staff, and Captain Newton, of the engineers, I put Johnston's numbers at fifteen thousand effectives. I did not think it possible he could exceed that number; and as I knew he had a large number of sick, and that desertions had been very frequent, I thought it probable that his effective force would fall below that estimate. I did not think it worth while to compute the militia at all, as they were chiefly Union men and enforced conscripts, and would doubtless run away at the first fire. I must confess I was somewhat irritated at the cavalier manner in which my estimates were received by these men of war. They seemed to be entirely satisfied with information obtained from other quarters, and I was equally well satisfied that this information had been furnished them by persons in the employ of the enemy.

Throughout the camp the battle of Hainsville was the all-absorbing topic. The most preposterous relations are given of the feats of arms performed on that day, and the heaps of rebel dead that covered the field. The staff officers say it was only a lively skirmish, the advance of our column engaging Jackson's brigade, about three thousand strong. The Federal loss was three killed and seven wounded; the loss of the rebels certainly not greater. As the Federals advanced the enemy retreated at a double-quick, leaving their camp equipage and knapsacks on the ground. This circumstance gave point to the victory, inspirited the troops, and delighted the Union people extravagantly.

Lieutenant Kirby Smith, of the Topographical Corps, narrated an incident of the advance which illustrated the innocent simplicity of our soldiers on that day. The skirmishers, excited by the novelty of the occasion, hurried forward until they had left the main column a mile in the rear. Here they were halted to await its approach; and being heated by their exercise, determined to economize time and make themselves comfortable. Consequently about half a mile of the line gathered in about a farmhouse, stacked their arms in the fence corners, and betook themselves to drinking milk, whistling, sleeping, and other jovial and nonchalant amusements. In the midst of it a company of thirty or forty mounted men was seen approaching through the fields. A civil soldier jumped forward and let down the bars, which admitted them into the lane. The next moment he fell with a pistol-ball through his head, and the rebel yell, accompanied by a volley of pistol-shots, informed the astonished skirmishers of the wide difference between a ginger-pop celebration and actual war. Forty-three men surrendered, and were carried off in sight of the main army. Lieutenant Smith mounted and rode off, followed by a rebel horseman. Finding himself in a closed lane, or cul de sac, he turned on his pursuer and exchanged two pistol-shots with him, at about twenty paces' distance. At the second fire the trooper turned tail and rejoined his company. Smith broke through the fence and retreated on the main body, followed by a mingled shower of oaths and bullets.

Captain Perkins of the regular army, commanding a battery of light artillery, was also riding carelessly about half a mile in advance of his battery. He was suddenly accosted by three officers, one of whom exclaimed in a familiar voice and manner:

"Hallo, Perk, I'm glad to see you; what are you doing here?"

The Captain, recognizing in the speaker his old West Point chum, J. E. B. Stuart, returned the salute heartily, recalling his college sobriquet:

"Why, Beauty, how are you? I didn't know you were with us."

"Nor did I know you were on our side," replied Stuart. "What command have you?"

"There's my command coming over the hill," replied Perkins, pointing complaisantly to the well-equipped battery that was approaching with Union colors displayed.

"Oh, the devil!" exclaimed Stuart, wheeling suddenly and plunging into the forest. "Good-by, Perk."

As Colonel Stuart was accompanied by two aids, and Captain Perkins was alone, unguarded, and out of reach of timely assistance, he expresses surprise that he was not called on to surrender. He does not know whether to attribute Stuart's forbearance to his sudden surprise on discovering his real position, or to a generous sentiment which forbid his taking advantage of an old comrade's inadvertency.

July 10.—The temper of this army is eminently imaginative and romantic. The most trifling incident furnishes sufficient material for a Dime Novel. I heard a sergeant of the Indiana regiment narrating, to an assembled crowd of soldiers and citizens, the particulars of the combat, in which he had slain Captain Turner Ashby and his brother Dick, and numerous others of their command. This fight it seems occurred between Cumberland and Romney. Dick Ashby I know was killed; but I had heard nothing of the other's death, and doubt the statement.

I am much pleased with the tone of sentiment about head-quarters. They seem to understand that the inhabitants of this region have been bullied and deluded into their present false position, and the policy to be pursued toward them is to be mild and conciliatory. Their property and persons will be protected, and their negroes returned to them if they take refuge in the camps. This is certainly the true policy as applicable to the mass of the population. They have not been, and can never be, aught else than the dupes and victims of designing men. The Government owes them protection and pity. For the rest I am not sure but a judicious use of hemp would advance the interests of humanity as well as those of law and government.

Our citizens here have fraternized most cordially with the army. Indeed, I do not know where I have seen so many gentlemen of liberal views, polished manners, and varied accomplishment collected together as may be found among the officers of this command. Free, social intercourse with such men will do much to enlighten and liberalize our people, whose prejudices have arisen not so much from ignorance as from seclusion.

July 11.—To-day I visited Captain Simpson of the Topographical Corps at his tent. After some general conversation in regard to the geography and topography of the Valley he proposed to me to take the place of assistant in his party. I replied that I was seeking a position where I might be useful. I knew something of military matters theoretically, but had never had any experience in the field. He explained the duties attached to the position he offered, dwelt upon their importance, and urged me to accept the place. I agreed to take the matter into consideration. The same afternoon I reported to him and concluded the engagement.

July 12.—Head-quarters was jubilant to-day over the news of McClellan's victory at Rich Mountain. I visited Norbourne and selected three quilts and a piece of oil-cloth to serve me for a camp bed. I also unearthed half a dozen bottles of old port which the soldiers had forgotten. My pony was transferred to the staff-stables and took his first bite of Government oats. My scanty equipage was transported by a negro to the tent of Lieutenant Kirby Smith, with whom I had already become agreeably acquainted.

Now fairly enlisted in the service I began to get some knowledge of the plans and objects of the campaign as well as of the means of carrying it on. On my arrival in town I had been informed by discreet and truthful citizens that the national forces numbered forty-five thousand men with seventy guns. I now learned to my astonishment that we had less than twenty thousand men with only sixteen guns. It was also evident that the commanders were dissatisfied with the line on which they were operating. With both wings "in the air," and communications exposed to attack from an active and well-informed enemy, the disadvantages of their position increased with every march they might make southward. The prevailing opinion seemed to be that the army had no business here at all but should be at Leesburg. Councils were held and plans suggested for moving the supply dépôt to Harper's Ferry. These opinions I heard expressed from time to time; but there was a good deal of reticence about head-quarters, and I was not fully informed as to the general intention of the campaign.

July 13.—I had some conversation with Colonel George H. Thomas to-day. He is a Virginian from the south side of James, a fine commanding figure, and bearing eminently martial. He is said to be remarkable for his tenacious courage and coolness in danger. He seems gratified to find so much loyal feeling among the men of light and leading in this district. He fully appreciates the weight of the social pressure which has been brought to bear in favor of the rebellion in other portions of the State, and respects the moral courage which is stern enough to bid defiance to it. The sympathy arising from this parity of views and position will lead, I hope, to better acquaintance. I was also introduced to Major Doubleday commanding the heavy battery, with his Lieutenants Hall and Elder. They are fresh from Fort Sumter, and gave some interesting details of the proceedings there and in Charleston.

July 14.—We heard to-day of Pegram's surrender. The Western Virginians seem to be doing their work effectually. Every body is in high spirits, and the trains are all loaded for a move to-morrow. I hope there may be no delay, for I wish to see this infernal fire quenched before it has time to burn out the vitals of the State.

July 15, Monday.—Clear and warm. This morning the army moved on Winchester. It was a day of deep interest and high excitement to many, but to none more intensely interesting than to myself. It was my first military campaign; but a life of varied experiences with its share of stirring adventure had inured me to novelty, yet nothing that I have ever seen surpassed the scenic splendor of this march. The atmosphere was deliciously genial, the country clothed in the full luxury of its summer array, neat farm-houses with white-washed fences dotted the fields all golden with the ungathered harvest. Chains of blue mountains on either hand inclosing a picture of smiling beauty seldom equaled outside the Valley of the Shenandoah. A full regiment of infantry deployed as skirmishers led the march, flanking the road for half a mile on either side; the picturesque lines moving irregularly, now over open fields of grass and clover, now wading waist-deep through yellow, waving lakes of uncut grain; anon climbing fences and disappearing in tangled thicket and patch of forest; again reappearing and forming groups upon some sharp ledge of limestone rock to scan the country in front; strong reserves supported the centre and extreme flanks of this line; ever moving, changing, breaking, and re-forming to suit the character of the ground. A body of four hundred regular cavalry, with Captain Tompkins's Rhode Island battery, led by Colonel Thomas, moved next. After them was seen the main column of ten thousand infantry with artillery and supply trains stretching out in interminable perspective. A column of six thousand men, led by Colonel Stone, moved by a parallel road to the left out of sight but within supporting distance. All along the route we found traces of the opposing army in deserted bivouacs, extinguished fires, broken fences, overturned wagons, and dead horses.

At Darksville our skirmishers came upon the enemy's cavalry pickets, and some scattering shots were exchanged. This firing was occasionally repeated all the way to Bunker's Hill.

About a mile beyond Darksville, several squadrons of rebel cavalry appearing in front, a section of Tompkins's battery was brought forward with a rush, and unlimbering upon an open hill-top, discharged half a dozen shell into the wood where the enemy had disappeared. At Bunker's Hill our skirmish line came upon the main body of Stuart's cavalry posted behind Mill Creek. There was a brisk and exciting fusillade for about twenty minutes without any especial result that I could perceive, when a section of artillery was again brought up, and, obtaining a cross-fire on the enemy's position, drove them out. On the left of the turnpike the skirmish line had advanced about half a mile beyond the village. A group of the enemy's cavalry still crowned a hill about twelve hundred yards in front, observing our force. Captain Tompkins very quietly brought one of his rifled guns into a position masked by some trees. The shell was selected, and the piece, loaded carefully, was sighted by the officer himself. The point aimed at was a snow-white Havelock which shone in the centre of the group of horsemen. The skirmish line had halted, and every body stood still to watch the effect of the shot. The word was given, the missile whizzed through the air. Five seconds after there was a whirling among the Havelocks on the hill, as when the wind strikes a heap of dried leaves. The whole troop then started at full speed toward Winchester, the white Havelock bobbing up and down pre-eminently until lost in the distance and the dust-clouds which they had kicked up.

A citizen who came into camp shortly after reported that a sergeant had been killed by that shot, but I never heard this verified. Thus ended the modern battle of Bunker's Hill. About two o'clock in the afternoon the army went into camp on the field, not a very bloody one for the rest, for I did not hear of any killed or wounded on our side, and did not see the enemy's loss. We picked up ten or a dozen prisoners during the day, captured some forage and horses, but accomplished nothing else of importance. I spent the remainder of the day in trying to protect the inhabitants from plunder and annoyance. Notwithstanding the best disposition on the part of the commanding officers I found this a difficult business.

Colonel Stone's column, having had a rougher road to move upon, did not get in until four o'clock in the afternoon. The topographical camp was located in an orchard, near General Cadwallader's head-quarters, a pleasant spot.

July 16, Tuesday.—Clear and warm. Slept heavily. I am told there was a great deal of firing on the picket line last night, but I take no account of these alarms, feeling assured that the enemy does not mean to attack. If he fights at all it will be at Winchester, where he is secure of the advantage of position. This, it seems, is not the opinion at head-quarters. A brigade of infantry with a battery moved toward Winchester this morning to make a reconnaissance. I was rather surprised to find that the army would not move.

During the day I talked with Captain Simpson about the roads to Winchester, Berryville, Strasburg, and Millwood. Without being fully informed as to the object of the campaign, I was led to infer he wished to know how we could flank Winchester by a movement to the left or the east. I indicated Berryville, seventeen miles distant, as a point from whence the roads leading eastward from Winchester could be commanded. The Captain was decidedly of opinion that we ought to go there.

While we sat at dinner the cannonading at the front became so rapid that our horses were ordered. Before we mounted, however, the firing ceased, and shortly afterward the reconnoitring force returned, reporting that they had advanced to a point within five miles of Winchester without encountering any other force than cavalry. The roads were blockaded with fallen trees, and every thing indicated a defensive policy on the part of Johnston.

During the afternoon we got hold of two white-headed youths, brothers, who had deserted from Winchester, and had given information in regard to matters there. We took them to our tent, and finding one of them intelligent, examined him very carefully. The information he gave us corresponded precisely with my knowledge of localities at Winchester, and previous knowledge of the forces and armament. Upon his information we put down Johnston's force of effectives at seventeen thousand men, and thirty-one pieces of light artillery. Two brigades of infantry and a battery of eight guns having been added to the force which I saw pass through Charlestown on the 15th of June. He described the works as accurately as an inexperienced youth could be expected to do, and said they were armed with ten heavy guns from the Norfolk navy-yard—probably old navy 32-pounders.

I was perfectly satisfied that this information was sincerely given and approximately accurate. He had named all the regiments and their commanders, and we had made our aggregate by allowing eight hundred men to the regiment. There had been much sickness and desertion. I felt assured we had over-estimated the force of effectives somewhat. When these views were presented at head-quarters, what was our astonishment to find that they were totally discredited. They had satisfactory information there that the enemy had a force of forty-two thousand men and seventy guns.

I was indignant and mortified that this "invention of the enemy" should obtain credence, and endeavored to combat it by argument. It was utterly impossible that the Confederacy could have set on foot such a force in addition to what they had at Manassas. They had not the means of arming or supplying so many men at Winchester. If Johnston had half the force attributed to him he would not have put us to the trouble of following him to Winchester, but would have made us feel him before this. His blockading the roads to impede our advance was an indication of weakness rather than of overwhelming superiority. In short, I was morally certain that there could be no such force in Winchester.

In reply, I was curtly told by a staff officer that my "deserter" was a rogue and would be hung some day. I did not dispute his assertion, but insisted that an intelligent rogue and deserter could give very accurate information when it suited his purpose to do so, and I did not doubt that my man had told me the truth. In short, I found the forty-two thousand men and seventy guns the accepted belief, and no discussion permitted.

Being a stranger in camp, and without credit at head-quarters, I retired to my tent, sketched a map of the route to Charlestown, and went to sleep with a contemptuous sense of security.

July 17, Wednesday.—Clear and warm. We broke camp this morning at two o'clock. When we mounted it was still dark, and the adjacent slopes were blazing with fires, at which the troops were cooking breakfast. At dawn the whole column was in motion on the road to Smithfield, leading eastward and retrograding from Winchester. Colonel Frank Patterson's Pennsylvania regiment (called the Roundheads from the shape of their hats) led the march. As we descended the bluff to Mill Creek, near the Opequan Bridge, a body of men was seen on an overlooking hill, and the Roundheads opened on them briskly, firing twenty or thirty shots before they discovered that it was one of our own posts established the night previous to guard the bridge.

Crossing this bridge we ascended the limestone ridge on the eastern bank, from whence we had a magnificent view of the Valley to Winchester and twenty miles beyond, terminated by the Fort Mountains. The town of Winchester, located in a basin, was not visible, but near its locality we observed a large column of smoke rising as if from the destruction of some buildings or bridges. As our regiments successively filed up from the misty vale of the Opequan their burnished arms and banners caught the rosy light of the sun just rising over the Blue Ridge. It was an inspiring and martial scene. If we had not been on the retrograde I should have enjoyed it more.

At Smithfield we still had choice of roads, one led to Winchester fifteen miles distant, another to Berryville, between Winchester and Snicker's Ferry, about twelve miles distant respectively from Winchester and Smithfield. The third route led to Charlestown, eight miles off and twenty-two from Winchester. A brigade, by way of feint, moved a short distance on the Winchester road, but the main column took the Charlestown route. The van-guard halted about a mile from Smithfield, and seeing something resembling a body of cavalry drawn up across the road a gun was sent for. It was posted and loaded, but a closer examination showed our enemy to be a six-horse team with a load of hay, and consequently the battery did not open.

As I was riding alone some distance in advance of the column, a tall negro man ran up and addressed me with great earnestness.

"Oh, Sir, why don't you hurry on to Charlestown? Be quick, and you will catch the people that hung that good man John Brown."

"Indeed, Uncle, and so you think John Brown was a good man and should not have been hung?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir. He was a man sent by the Lord to do justice on earth and give liberty to the oppressed, and I don't know how it happened after that the Lord permitted him and them that were with him to die in that miserable way."

The advance of the troops interrupted our conversation, and I rode forward a short distance to speak to a white man who sat on horseback near his gate. I found he was the owner of the slave who had first addressed me, and inquired of him with some feeling of interest, if he had observed any restiveness among his blacks since the National army had entered Virginia? He assured me, in a boastful tone, that he had never known them more contented and obedient, and had no fear that any of his would leave him.

This was only an expression of the fatuity which seemed to have possessed the minds of most slave-owners of late years. No class of men had better opportunities of knowing that subtlety, the armor of the weak, is the especial characteristic of the hereditary slave. In the ordinary affairs of life they placed no reliance whatever on the sincerity of his expressed opinions, knowing they were invariably put forth to please and flatter the questioner, especially if he happened to be of the dominant race. Yet now, blinded by passion, they insisted that the slaves feared and hated the Yankees, and would not accept the boon of freedom if offered.

I found a practical commentary on this opinion when I returned to the head of the column. About a dozen negroes, men and women, had come out of the adjoining fields equipped for traveling with their Sunday clothes and bundles. They had evidently prepared themselves beforehand and waited the approach of the army. The spokesman among them was my recent acquaintance. He asked a soldier of the Massachusetts regiment "if this was not the army that was come to set them free?" The soldier replied, "No, my man, we have come here solely to execute the laws. To set you free, or to do any thing contrary to the law of the land, is not our mission. Go, therefore, serve your master faithfully, and be content to know that you are in all probability better off under his protection than if you were free."

The negro looked alternately at the speaker and at the armed host that was sweeping by with an expression of mingled perplexity and disappointment. His companions, although listening with open eyes, mouths, and ears, had scarcely caught the meaning of the soldier's remarks. They turned their chop-fallen countenances toward the big negro as if for further enlightenment.

He repeated, sadly, "Dey say dey ain't come to set us free." A girl, with shining face and yellow headkerchief, retorted, spitefully, "Den what de debble dey come here for, I'd like to know, burnin' people's fences and spoilin' dere corn?" Knowing that according to the proclaimed policy of the Government fugitives would be returned to their masters from the camps, and that in a military point of view they could not be tolerated, I felt it my duty to explain to these poor creatures the true state of the case, and to recommend to them not to commit themselves by relying on a refuge with the army. The leader thanked me politely and slowly turned away, looking perplexed, like one who has been awakened from a long-cherished dream.

At the ruin of the old Episcopal Church—the first built in the valley—the main column halted, and detachments were sent forward to the right and left to inclose the town and capture the militia, which were reported to be assembled there. The army entered Charlestown with drums beating, colors flying, and all the pomp of a grand review. The streets were silent and deserted, the houses generally closed, and only a few negroes and children appeared to witness the "grand entrée." As the column passed a Confederate flag was displayed from the upper window of a storehouse. The doors were instantly crushed in and the offensive emblem replaced by the Stars and Stripes. Otherwise every thing was quiet. The sentiment of the army was conciliatory, while, from terror or sullenness, very few of the inhabitants showed themselves on the streets. I assisted my chief in posting the troops as they came in, and at night, weary and dispirited, retired to our camp in a field beside the Harper's Ferry turnpike.

July 18, Thursday.—I am informed to-day that our movement from Martinsburg via Bunker's Hill to this place was a flank march to cover the transfer of our supply train to a new base at Harper's Ferry. The enemy's cavalry picked up a couple of our sutler's wagons yesterday. A reconnoitring party has moved out toward Berryville. There was some spirited shell-practice this afternoon which sounded like a battle, while from the continual crackle of small-arms through the camps one might infer there was a chronic skirmish on hand. One of these desultory shots wounded a horse belonging to Perkins's light battery. The Captain, who was fiery, loaded a section with canister and turning the guns on the camp from whence the shot came, declared if another ball was fired into his purlieu he would open on the offenders. The infantry got ready to take the battery, and it required some authority to settle the difficulty.

My principal business to-day was mediating between the citizens and the military.

After dark this evening I was informed that Joe Johnston was crossing at Berry's Ferry, moving toward Manassas.

July 19, Friday.—Clear and warm. This morning before breakfast I received positive information that Johnston's whole army had crossed the Shenandoah at Berry's Ferry. A loyal citizen, who was eye-witness of the fact, had ridden during the night to bring the news. I immediately communicated it to Captain Simpson, who said it was important, and hurried over to head-quarters. After a brief absence he returned somewhat irritated, and said the report was not credited at head-quarters. I told him my information was positive and of indubitable authority, although for good reasons I could not reveal the source from whence I obtained it. He expressed full confidence in it, and then questioned me as to the roads from our position leading across the ridge into Loudon, saying we should move immediately by the shortest route toward Manassas. My opinion was that the roads spoken of were scarcely practicable for heavy trains. The troops using them must move light. Johnston would, in any case, have the short line, and nearly two days' start of us.

All the while our force, composed of three months' volunteers, was rapidly melting away. The time of nearly all of them had expired. One or two regiments turned back at Martinsburg before this march began. Three regiments left at Bunker's Hill, marching homeward while the guns were sounding at the front.

To-day other regiments were departing. General Patterson had several regiments whose terms were expired paraded near head-quarters. He came out and addressed them, urging them to remain until the campaign was ended. Colonel Wallace's Zouaves volunteered to remain ten days longer. Some other organizations followed their example. The general feeling among the troops, however, was to go home on the day their engagements terminated, without regard to circumstances.

I was busy to-day getting citizens released from arrest and soliciting protections for the houses and property of others. As we have failed to make any favorable military impression, it is our policy to produce as favorable an impression otherwise as possible.

While I was at head-quarters a committee of soldiers appointed from one of the regiments called on the Commanding General. He received them on the portico of the house, and inquired their business. The committee, composed of three lanky, tallow-faced fellows, took off their hats, and the spokesman, who was especially tall, lanky, and tallow-faced, stood forward and took from under his arm a large package folded in a piece of tent cloth. This he unrolled with great deliberation, and displayed a side of the whitest and fattest pickled pork that could be conceived of. Then rolling his eyes imploringly upon his chief he began, in a lackadaisical tone:

"General, we've been appointed a committee by our regiment to come and show you how we poor soldiers are treated by our commissaries, and what sort of rations we git. Look at that, General!" he exclaimed, rousing himself to energy. "We've fought hard, and marched hard, but we can't stand it much longer—we're most gone:" and to present more emphatically the exhausted condition of the army the speaker leaned languidly against a pillar of the portico. The two assistants responded with faint groans, and leaned corroboratively against adjoining posts.

The General meanwhile had examined the corpus delicti.

"That looks very fine!" he exclaimed; "what's the matter with that?"

"General," gasped the astonished committeeman, leaving the support of his post in his excitement, "we men can't live on that sort of meat: it's all fat!"

"Well," replied the General, "I thought fat pork was always considered the best."

"But," persisted the orator, "this is all fat. Men can't march and fight all day and all night as we've done unless they git some lean."

The eye of the 'old soldier twinkled as he dismissed them, promising to give orders that the Commissary should issue none but lean pork hereafter. The fellows shouldered their greasy grievance and marched off as jauntily as if they had won a victory.

July 20, Saturday.—Clear and pleasant. We received information of the collision between our forces and the enemy at Bull Run on the 19th. It was regarded as a check, and produced a feeling of dissatisfaction and uneasiness.

Our pickets were all night long skirmishing with cows, stumps, and imaginary enemies. I think the men on guard get lonely and frightened, and fire their guns to get up an excitement and relieve their minds. I obtained some valuable maps for the Topographical Department to-day. They are needed, as the Government seems to lack geographical and topographical information in regard to this region especially. This evening Lieutenant Smith is ordered to lead a brigade to Keyes's Ferry. This indicates that we will fall back to Harper's Ferry.

July 21, Sunday.—Clear and pleasant. This morning we broke camp and moved for Harper's Ferry.

Such was my mortification at the result of the campaign that I made it convenient to get off without taking leave of my friends in town. As we drew near Harper's Ferry a tall, thin man, on horseback, saluted Captain Simpson, and reported himself as William Luce, an assistant draughtsman, ordered from Washington to join us. I was presented to my new companion, and we rode together to Harper's Ferry.

To-day it was frankly revealed to me, for the first time, that a decisive battle was to be fought at Manassas Junction, and was probably in progress. The motive of our late movement was explained, as was also the fact that it had signally failed.

At Harper's Ferry head-quarters were established at the house of the Superintendent of the Armory, while the topographical party pitched their tents near the dwelling of the late paymaster. Some of the officers remarked that Uncle Sam had recovered his own again, but it was only the empty shell. A place more thoroughly gutted could not be imagined.

July 22, Monday.—Warm rain. Lieutenant Smith rejoined us to-day, the troops guarding Keyes's Ferry having returned. The troops whose terms of service have expired are leaving us by regiments, fording the Potomac above the island, every man and officer carrying with him some cumbersome memento of the campaign, in shape of a brick, a cannon-ball, or burned musket-barrel from the ruins of the Arsenal.

I started with my commanding officer to reconnoitre the crest of Loudon Heights, where, it is reported, the enemy had constructed some block-houses. We took an escort of fifty sharpshooters from Brigadier-General N——'s brigade, the General and his staff accompanying us as spectators. Crossing the Shenandoah by an unusual and very rough ford, we ascended the mountain by a winding road shaded by tall forest trees and bordered by the delicious wild-bloom of the season. On the summit we found a cleared space of about twelve hundred yards in length by three hundred wide, with three block-houses so located as to flank and support each other. On the roof of one of these we took lunch, and while thus engaged were accosted by two citizens, who informed us that there was a picket of rebel cavalry in the valley below. It was determined to extend our reconnoissance in that direction, the Captain hoping to hear some tidings of the battle which was probably fought yesterday. We descended by a narrow path winding through dense thickets and scarcely practicable for horses. From the foot of the ridge we made our way across some meadows, fording a pretty stream, and finally reaching the main turnpike leading from Harper's Ferry, via Hillsborough, to Leesburg. Calling at a house we were answered by a country fellow, who replied to our questions in so vague and unsatisfactory a manner that he was taken into custody.

Moving on toward Hillsborough our guide pointed out two men mowing in a field. One of them, named Dorrell, he said, was a troublesome man, who had been very active in hunting up "volunteers" for the Confederate army. The man thus indicated justified the accusation brought against him by throwing down his scythe and fleeing toward the mountain as soon as he espied us. The chase was immediately opened; a dozen of the Dutch sharpshooters on foot, and the General with staff and orderlies on horseback, started in full cry after the fugitive. The chase, with all the dodges, leaps, and turns of pursuers and pursued, was in full view for half a mile. Dorrell ran like a buck, while the Dutchmen followed stanchly with whoop and halloo. The hunted party, however, had the advantage of speed and knowledge of localities, and finally escaped to the mountain. The other mower, with superior firmness or a better conscience, kept quietly at his work and was not even questioned.

Gathering up after this unsuccessful chase, the detachment moved on several miles further to Neersville, a village of a dozen houses. Here separating into two parties our escort took open order and closed around the village, like Highland hunters upon their game. Their rush into the town with fixed bayonets and a cheer was dramatic, and took the inhabitants by surprise. But one adult male was captured, who upon examination was found to be a lame idiot. Finding himself cornered he took off his hat and gave three cheers for Jeff Davis; but the strange oaths and menacing bayonets of the Teutonic guard convinced him of his mistake. He then volunteered three hearty hurrahs for Abe Lincoln, whereupon he was liberated with the following commendation, "Dat's a coot feller; he's all right!"

Two miles beyond Neersville we found Dorrell's house. The proprietor was absent from home, of course, but our zealous Dutchmen searched the premises as carefully as if they expected to find him. The only opposition they met was from an old woman who cackled at them and a house-dog that barked. A volley of German oaths silenced the old woman and drove the dog under the house. The only practical result of this search was a huge black stallion that was found in the barn. This animal was led forth shining with fatness and faithful grooming, but with none of the bold, obstreperous airs of holiday fairs and militia muster-days. He appeared, on the contrary, with drooping head and tail between his legs, pulled, cuffed, and kicked by his captors, the most humble and cringing creature imaginable, doubtless fully appreciating the fact that he had fallen into the hands of the Hessians. Having accomplished this capture the expedition wheeled to the right about, returning through Neersville.

The cavalry post we had heard of had been withdrawn to Hillsborough. There were some vague rumors of a bloody battle near Manassas, with great loss on both sides. This report was so vague that it might have referred to the affair of the nineteenth. The inhabitants generally seemed well disposed, but they had no information of any importance. At Neersville the Federal oath of allegiance was administered to several citizens, including the principal saddler and the idiot. This latter at the conclusion of the ceremony again vociferated for Jeff Davis, and was again obliged to change his tune. The orderly who led the newly-recruited horse helped himself to a halter that hung at the saddler's door, pleasantly suggesting to the proprietor that in recognition of the loyalty which he had just proved by taking the oath he would be permitted to contribute something to the great cause.

A guard was sent to arrest a county magistrate named Price, charged with being a zealous administrator of Confederate laws and oaths of fealty to the so-called Government. When arraigned the magistrate firmly asserted his opinions, and was detained under guard. His son, who stood by, then voluntarily proclaimed himself a rebel, and was also taken into custody. I was touched with this exhibition of filial piety, and rode beside the young man for the purpose of relieving any apprehensions he might have in regard to the safety or civil treatment of his father. He recognized me and called me by name, asking why his father had been arrested. I replied, he had been guilty of high treason against the United States in undertaking to administer the laws of a rebellious government. The young man looked as if in a maze.

"The State of Virginia has ordered him to do it, and being a magistrate of the State, how can he refuse?"

I endeavored to explain to him the theory of National Supremacy as it had been taught to me; but he suggested a practical difficulty which the theory did not meet.

"Our State authorities," said he, "threaten us with confiscation and death if we do not obey them, and the United States menaces us with worse if we do. Now what in the name of God are we to do?"

"My young friend," I replied, "your question is a pertinent one, and difficult to answer. It is even now in process of solution, by the last argument of kings and governments. When that thundering debate shall have been closed we may be able to speak advisedly on this subject. Meanwhile, permit me to say that I have been touched by your manly bearing, and will interest myself to procure the speedy release of your father and yourself."

The expedition continued its movement by the Hillsborough pike toward Harper's Ferry. On a tree by the road-side was discovered a written placard ordering the assembly of the militia, and signed by a Captain Tevis. A military ruse was planned by one of the officers, which resulted in the capture of Captain Tevis (whose house was near at hand) and the confiscation of his military dress and equipments.

This exploit concluded the adventures of the day. The rain had ceased, and as we wheeled around the base of Loudon Heights a glorious sunset burst suddenly upon us. The whole western horizon was ablaze, while rivers and rocks, ruins and camps, appeared all glittering with the golden light. It was a scene of surpassing grandeur, and one calculated to bring into impressive contrast Infinity with the littleness of men.

We returned to Harper's Ferry, having successfully accomplished the serious object of the reconnoissance. If the farcical by-play which I have narrated had added nothing to the military prestige or moral force of the Government, it at least indicated what was to be the fate of the Border people during the coming wars.

July 23, Tuesday.—Clear and pleasant. Mr. Luce, the new draughtsman, who has been lost since Sunday, reported again to-day. I was pleased to find him a clever artist with his pencil. While he, Lieutenant Smith, and myself were amusing ourselves caricaturing each other, Captain Simpson appeared at the door of the tent looking very much flushed and excited.

"Gentlemen," said he, "look at my countenance, and read the news."

"What is it? What of the battle?" exclaimed one and all.

"We have been beaten at Manassas—beaten disgracefully. The troops ran, and were cut to pieces like sheep, abandoning artillery, baggage, and every thing else in their panic."

The pencils were laid aside. Going up to head-quarters with our chief, we heard on all sides the fiery curses of rage, mortification, and disappointment. A proposition to march rapidly on Winchester with a column of five or six thousand men was under discussion. But the decisive battle had been fought, and this tardy effort to retrieve error and disaster could have accomplished nothing to justify the risk. It was very properly dismissed. I did not forget my promise to the Loudon prisoners, who received some judicious counsel, and were discharged—all except the horse.

July 24, Wednesday.—Clear and warm. Our discharged troops are still streaming across the Potomac by regiments, homeward bound. I met some Union refugees from Martinsburg this morning, who told me that Allan's regiment had been dreadfully cut up at Manassas. They named among the killed several young men of my acquaintance and kindred. The bodies had already been brought home and buried. The whole county was in mourning.

The National cause was, for the present, entirely lost in Virginia. I foresaw the effect this victory would have upon public opinion, and trembled for the safety of my friends and family at Berkeley. Having obtained leave of absence, I started the same afternoon to visit them. At Sharpsburg I took supper, and, to shorten the next day's ride, pushed on seven miles further, to Jones's tavern, on the Hagerstown road. I was informed that I could be comfortably lodged there if I could succeed in arousing the landlord, who was notoriously sleepy-headed. I got to the house about ten p.m., and spent the next hour shouting and pounding at the door. My perseverance was at length rewarded, and I got fairly to bed at eleven.

In reviewing the campaign of General Patterson by the light of experience and fuller information, I am led to the conclusion that its futility was insured in its conception. The movement of the National army by the line of Martinsburg and Bunker's Hill must, of course, leave it entirely optional with Johnston whether to reinforce Manassas or to hazard a battle in a position of his own selection. No manœuvre of the Federal commander from that direction could interfere with the free-will of an active and well-informed enemy. Every march which General Patterson made toward Winchester withdrew him from the decisive field of action, while by every retrograde Johnston was thrown nearer his unbroken lines of communication and the vital point of the campaign. Whether General Johnston really intended to hazard a battle, or to defend Winchester at that time, is best known to himself; but he well knew, as every one else now knows, that the most stunning defeat inflicted on Patterson's army could not have rendered it more useless than it would have been at Winchester, or at any other point in the Valley of the Shenandoah, on the day of the decisive battle at Manassas. Nor does it seem at all probable that an able and subtle enemy would have cared to waste his limited supply of ammunition on a force that was melting away of itself, and in a few days would have been reduced to a mere handful.

This expedition, to have been successful, should have moved from Harper's Ferry on the eastern side of the Blue Ridge, or through Leesburg, as its commander suggested. But the bad policy of operating on exterior lines against an enemy on interior lines is too well understood at this day to require discussion.

MIDSUMMER.

Past many a shady nook,
The babbling meadow brook,
'Twixt grass-grown banks with feathery fern abounding,
Glides on its devious way
Through all the livelong day, While fields and woods with summer song are sounding.

Far off across the vale,
Where the light vapors sail, Veiled with thin mist the purple hills are sleeping;
And in the ripened field,
Amid the summer's yield,
The farmers now the golden grain are reaping.

The locust sings unseen
Behind some leafy screen,
While the hot sun looks down with fiery glances;
All Nature seems to swoon
As toward its highest noon,
From heat to heat, the glowing day advances.

The deep creek, winding, flows
By shelving shores where grows
The silvery willow marked with sun and shadow,
And in its glassy wave
The cattle come to lave
Their sweltering limbs from feeding in the meadow.

Steeped in the blinding light,
The clouds, all deathly white,
Across the vault with listless motion sailing,
Below me in the plain,
Along the bending grain,
Their grateful shadows o'er the earth are trailing.

From farm-yards far and near
The shrill horns, sounding clear,
With answering echoes from the hills are blending;
The laborers' work is stopped,
The whetted scythes are dropped,
And homeward now their eager feet are tending.

Beside the cottage porch,
The sunflower's shining torch,
That marked with rings of flame the summer's coming,
Stands in proud splendor there
Where all the noontide air
Is drowsy with the sweet bees' idle humming.

Within the garden blows
The fragrant summer rose,
Whose blushing leaves with sweet perfume are laden;
And swaying gently there,
The lily, passing fair,
Hangs her meek head like some retiring maiden.

Oh, glorious summer! stay,
Nor hasten yet away
From the sweet fields with thy warm beauty glowing;
My life has reached its prime,
Its radiant summer-time,
And all my blood with added warmth is flowing.

The day at last declines,
The west with splendor shines
As slantwise now the sun's last beams are falling.
And all the dazzling air,
Bright with the sunset's glare,
Is filled with myriad voices blithely calling.

MOUSE-NEST IN A BOTTLE.

SOME CURIOUS HOMES.

THERE are very few animals among the Mammalia who venture to exert their skill upon aerial architecture. Consequently the Harvest Mouse, found in many parts of England, is regarded with special interest; and this not only because its home is suspended above the ground in such a manner as to entitle it to the name of a true pensile nest, but also on account of its intrinsic beauty and elegance. The nest is generally hung to several stout grass-stems; sometimes it is fastened to wheat straws; and occasionally it is found suspended to the head of a thistle. It is a very beautiful structure, being made of very narrow grasses, and woven so carefully as to form a hollow globe, rather larger than a cricket-ball, and very nearly as round. The Harvest Mouse is an elegant little creature, so tiny that, when full-grown, it weighs scarcely more than the sixth of an ounce, and we can not but wonder how it contrives to form so complicated an object as a hollow sphere with thin walls. The walls are so thin that an object inside the nest can be easily seen from any part of the exterior; there is no opening whatever, and when the young are in the nest they are packed so tightly that their bodies press against the wall in every direction. As there is no defined opening, and as the walls are so loosely woven, it is probable that the mother is able to push her way between the meshes, and so to arrange or feed her young. The position of the nest, which is always at some little height, presupposes a climbing power in the architect. All mice and rats are good climbers, but the Harvest Mouse is especially well fitted for climbing, inasmuch as its long and flexible toes can firmly grasp the grass-stem, and its long slender tail aids it materially in sustaining itself. As the food of the Harvest Mouse consists greatly of insects, flies being especial favorites, it is evident that great agility is needed. In order to show the active character of the quadruped one of the harvest mice is represented in the engraving as climbing toward a fly, upon which it is about to pounce. In such circumstances its leap is remarkably swift, and its aim as accurate as that of a swallow. In the airy cradle of the Harvest Mouse may sometimes be seen as many as eight young mice, all packed together like herrings in a barrel.

The Common Mouse, also, is a notable little house-builder, making nests out of various materials, and placing them oftentimes in very odd places, as the following instances will show: At the end of autumn a number of flower-pots had been set aside in a shed, in waiting for the coming spring. Toward the middle of winter the shed was cleared out and the flower-pots removed. While carrying them out of the shed the owner was rather surprised to find a round hole in the mould, and examined it closely. In the hole was seen, not a plant, but the tail of a mouse, which leaped from the pot as soon as it was set down. Presently another mouse followed from the same aperture, showing that a nest lay beneath the soil. On removing the earth a neat and comfortable nest was found, made chiefly of straw and paper, the entrance to which was the hole through which the inmates had fled. The most curious point in connection with this nest was, that although the earth in the pot seemed to be intact except for the round hole, which might have been made by a stick, none was found within it. The ingenious little architects had been clever enough to scoop out the whole of the earth and to carry it away, so as to form a cavity for the reception of their nest. They did not completely empty the pot, as if knowing by instinct that their habitation would be betrayed, but allowed a slight covering of earth to remain upon their nest. A number of empty bottles had been stowed away upon a shelf, and among them was found one which was tenanted by a mouse. The little creature had considered that the bottle would afford a suitable home for her young, and had therefore conveyed into it a quantity of bedding which she made into a nest. The bottle was filled with the nest, and the eccentric architect had taken the precaution to leave a round hole corresponding to the neck of the bottle. In this remarkable domicile the young were placed; and it is a fact worthy of notice that no attempt had been made to shut out the light. Nothing would have been easier than to have formed the cavity at the under-side, so that the soft materials of the nest would exclude the light; but the mouse had simply formed a comfortable hollow for her young, and therein she had placed them. It is therefore evident that the mouse has no fear of light, but that it only chooses darkness as a means of safety for its young. The rapidity with which the mouse can make a nest is somewhat surprising. Some few years ago, in a farmer's house, a loaf of newly-baked bread was placed upon a shelf, according to custom. Next day a hole was observed in the loaf; and when it was cut open a mouse and her nest was discovered within, the latter having been made of paper. On examination, the material of the habitation was found to have been obtained from a copy-book, which had been torn into shreds and arranged into the form of a nest. Within this curious home were nine new-born mice. Thus in the space of thirty-six hours, at most, the loaf must have cooled, the interior been excavated, the book found and cut into suitable pieces, the nest made, and the young brought into the world. Surely it is no wonder that mice are so plentiful, or that their many enemies fail to exterminate them.

When in a state of liberty, and able to work in its own manner, the Dormouse is an admirable nest-maker. As it passes the day in sleep, it must needs have some retired domicile in which it can be hidden from the many enemies which might attack a sleeping animal. One of these nests is depicted in the illustration, being situated in a hedge about four feet from the ground, and is placed in the forking of a branch, the smaller twigs of which form a kind of palisade round it. The substances of which it is composed are of two kinds; namely, grass-blades and leaves of trees. Two or three kinds of grass are used, the greater part being the well-known sword-grass, whose sharp edges cut the fingers of a careless handler. The blades are twisted round the twigs and through the interstices, until they form a hollow nest, rather oval in shape. Toward the bottom the finer sorts of grass are used, as well as some stems of delicate climbing weeds, which are no larger than ordinary thread, and which serve to bind the mass together. Interwoven with the grass are leaves, which fill up the interstices. The entrance to the nest is so ingeniously concealed that to find it is not a very easy matter, even when its precise position is known; and in order to show the manner in which it is constructed, one of the Dormice is represented in the act of drawing aside the grass-blades that conceal it. The pendent pieces of grass that are being held aside by the little paw are so fixed, that when released from pressure they spring back over the aperture and conceal it in a very effectual manner. Such a nest is usually about six inches in length and three in width. Although the Dormouse uses this aerial house as a residence, it does not make use of it as a granary. Like many other hibernating animals, it collects a store of winter food, which generally consists of nuts, grain, and similar substances. These treasures are carefully hidden away in the vicinity of the nest, and in the illustration the animal is shown as eating a nut which it has taken from one of its storehouses beneath the thick branch.

The Stag Beetle and the Golden-crested Wren have been introduced into the illustration to show the comparative size of the animals.

It is hardly possible to overrate the wonderful varieties of form that are assumed by the nests of insects—varieties so bold and so startling that few would believe in the possibility of their existence without ocular demonstration. No rule seems to be observed in them; at all events no rule has as yet been discovered by which their formation is guided; neither has any conjecture been formed as to the reason for the remarkable forms which they assume. In the British Museum there is a splendid collection of curious nests, but none perhaps which awakens more surprise and admiration than the wonderful group represented in the accompanying illustration. Although the seven nests were not all found adhering to a single branch—being placed near each other only to allow of easy comparison—they were all made by an insect bearing the somewhat scientific name of Apoica. This insect, although by no means a handsome creature, well deserves its scientific title. By referring to the illustration it will be seen that the nests are by no means uniform in size or shape. The larger one, which occupies the centre, rather exceeds ten inches in diameter, while the small nest at the end of the same branch is scarcely half as wide, and the others are of all the intermediate sizes. In shape, too, they differ, some being perfectly hexagonal, others partly so, while others again are nearly circular, though on a careful inspection they show faint traces of the hexagonal form. The upper surfaces are more or less convex, according to their size; this form being evidently intended for the purpose of making them water-proof. In fact, the nests somewhat resemble shallow basins with very thick sides, and bear an almost startling resemblance to the cap of a very large and well-shaped mushroom, the central specimen being so fungus-like in form that, if it were laid on the ground in a waste and moist spot, it would soon be picked up as a veritable mushroom. The color is in general a yellowish brown, although occasionally some nest boldly departs from the general uniformity, presenting a reddish surface, or even a white. All the nests are fixed in the same manner to a branch or twig passing through the upper surface. When the nest is increased in size the original support is often found to be too slight, and in that case others are added. The cells are arranged in the most systematic manner in rows which follow the exterior outline, and therefore take the shape of a hexagon. How the insect forms these wonderful cell-groups is an enigma to which not the least clew can be found. In proportion to the size of the architect they are simply enormous, and yet the sides and angles are as true and just as if they were single cells.

Very curious nests are made by several species of an insect belonging to the genus Icaria. These nests, or rather these series of cells, are made after a singular fashion. First, the insect attaches to the branch a foot-stalk composed of the same material as that with which the cells are formed. This foot-stalk, although slender, is very hard, solid, and tough, and can uphold a considerable weight, as is necessary from the manner of constructing the nest. She then makes a cell after the ordinary wasp-fashion, attaching it to the foot-stalk with its mouth downward, and at first making it comparatively short. When the cell has nearly attained its due length a second is placed alongside the first, and a third is added in like manner, each being lengthened as required. As the cells at the base of the series are finished first it is evident that they gradually diminish toward the end, those at the extremity being often not one quarter so long as those at the base.

The common Hive Bee deserves our admiration on account of the wonderful manner in which it constructs its social home, and the method by which that home is regulated. But there is another insect, as well known by name, but with whose habits we are somewhat shy of attempting to become intimately familiar. This is the common Hornet, whose nest is almost invariably built in hollow trees, deserted out-houses, and places of a similar description.

Whenever the Hornet takes up its residence in an inhabited house, as is sometimes the case, the inmates are sure to be in arms against the insect, and with good reason. Its sting is exceedingly venomous, and it is popularly said that three hornets can kill a man. Moreover, the Hornet is an irascible insect, and given to assault those whom it fancies are approaching its nest with evil intentions. Consequently it is a matter of no slight difficulty to obtain a nest, or to watch the process of its construction. In the illustration is shown the exterior of a partially finished nest, and the manner in which the hornets enter at different parts. Hornets may be forced to build a much more beautiful nest than they ordinarily construct. One nest, when of moderate size, was removed by a naturalist from the head of a tree, and placed in a large glazed box, within which the hornets continued their labors, and a most beautiful nest was produced, symmetrical in shape and variegated with wonderfully rich colors. In order, however, to produce this result it is necessary to select the richest-colored woods, and place them where the insects shall be induced to use them in the construction of their nest.

In the collection of the British Museum may be seen a very remarkable nest, which is made by some species of wasp at present unknown, but which may appropriately be called the Mud Wasp. It was found in a Guianan forest suspended to a branch, which passed through a hole in the solid walls of the nest. Unfortunately, in its passage to England, it was broken and much damaged, but the fragments were collected and skillfully put together, and the nest restored to its original shape, with the exception of an aperture through which the interior may be seen. The material of which it is formed is mud, or clay, which is moulded by the insect until it has attained a wonderful tenacity and strength, and is rendered so plastic as to be worked nearly as neatly as the waxen bee-cell. It is of rather a large size, measuring about thirteen inches in length, by nine in width, and filled with combs. A large quantity of clay is worked around the chosen branch, and made very strong, in order to sustain the heavy weight which will be suspended from it. This clay foundation is very hard, though brittle. One of the most remarkable points in the construction of this nest is the entrance. In pensile nests the insect usually forms the opening below, so that it may be sheltered from the wind and rain. Moreover, it is usually of small dimensions, evidently in order to prevent the inroads of parasitic insects and other foes, and to give the sentinels a small gateway to defend. But the particular wasp which built this remarkable nest seems to have set every rule at defiance, and to have shown an entire contempt of foes and indifference to rain. As may be seen by reference to the illustration, the entrance is extremely long, though not wide, and extends through nearly the length of the nest, so that the edges of the combs can be seen by looking into the aperture. The edges of the entrance are rounded, so that the outer edge is wider than the inner; but it is still sufficiently wide to allow the little finger of a man's hand to be passed into the interior; while its length is so great that forty or fifty insects might enter or leave the nest together.

The nest of the Pasteboard Wasp is suspended to a branch, which passes through a hole or ring, so large that the structure is permitted to swing freely in the wind. The dimensions of the nest are variable, each one appearing to be capable of unlimited enlargement. The mode by which the wasps increase the size of their pensile home is equally simple and efficacious. When the number of the inhabitants becomes so large that a fresh series of cells is required, the insects enlarge their home with perfect ease, and at the same time without destroying its symmetry, a point which is often forgotten when human architects undertake the enlargement of some fine old edifice. Taking the bottom of the nest as the starting-point, they build upon it a series of cells, taking care to add another row or two to the circumference, so as to increase the diameter in proportion to the length. They then add fresh material to the outer wall, which is lengthened so as to include the new tier of cells, and then the bottom is closed with a new floor, which in its turn will become the ceiling of the next tier of cells. An average nest is about one foot in length and of proportionate width; but now and then a positive giant of a nest is discovered where the colony has been undisturbed, and circumstances have been favorable to its increase. One of the largest, if not the very largest, of these pasteboard nests that has yet been discovered, was found in Ceylon, attached to the inside of a huge palm-leaf, and was of the astonishing length of six feet. Now, to form an idea of a nest six feet in length is not very easy. It is so huge as scarcely to be credited except from actual sight. We all know how conspicuous among ordinary men is one who measures six feet in height, and we shall form a better idea of the nest in question, if we reckon it to be equal in length to a "six-foot" man, and of course to occupy much more space on account of its bell-like shape.

The members of the genus Polistes are in the habit of building their cells in the open air, and leaving them without covering to defend them. The species which make the cells represented in the illustration is one of the most remarkable, both from the elegant form of the combs and the singular method of their attachment. Generally, the shape of the comb is nearly round, as is seen in the upper figure of the illustration. The cells are remarkable for their radiating form, the bases being a trifle smaller than the mouths, a peculiarity which would hardly be noticed in a single cell, but which produces the spreading outline when a number of them are massed together. Some of the cells are closed, indicating that the undeveloped insect is within. Now comes the curious part of the structure. The combs are not fastened directly to the branches, but are attached to foot-stalks which spring from their centre, and are firmly cemented upon the branch or twig. How wonderfully the insect must manage the comb so that it shall be balanced on this slender foot-stalk! To preserve the equilibrium of even an empty comb would be difficult enough, but when the cells are filled with fat, heavy grubs the difficulty must be multiplied with every one. The foot-stalks are made of the same papier-mâché-like substance as the cells, only the layers are so tightly compressed together that they form a hard, solid mass, very much like the little pillars which support the different stories of an ordinary wasp's nest, but of much greater size. The position of the combs is extremely variable, some being nearly horizontal, and others perpendicular, as shown in the illustration. These came from Bareilly, in the East Indies.

TOWER OF BELEM.

A LOOK AT LISBON.

PUBLIC attention has recently been attracted to the city of Lisbon by the unfortunate firing into the Niagara from Belem Tower, and by the unusual frequency with which arrivals of our national vessels are announced at this port. Before the rebellion our vessels of war seldom entered the Tagus; now it is generally understood that the European squadron will winter there. Conveniently situated as a point of departure for the chief commercial countries of the Christian world, and possessed of unequalled natural advantages, it is remarkable that only Great Britain should heretofore have made it a naval rendezvous. Our vessels, in times past, confined to the Mediterranean, have had their head-quarters at Port Mahon in the Island of Minorca, and more recently at Spezzia in Italy, but the necessity for watching rebel cruisers compelled them to seek shelter and repair in the sea-ports of the western coast, while the distrust with which we must hereafter regard the movements of the great maritime powers will require us to keep a force in their waters on the alert to vindicate the national honor and authority.

The advantage of having our chief naval rendezvous at Lisbon is evident. Being within speedy telegraphic communication with all Europe, and receiving news less than a fortnight old from our own country, emergencies arising in the North and West, on the African coast, among the Atlantic islands, the West Indies, and even in South America may be far more promptly attended to than though it were inside the Straits of Gibraltar, through which the only powers that are apt to give us offense could render exit difficult. The same might be said in favor of Cadiz—if not from time immemorial at least from that of the Phœnicians, who called it Gades—the favorite entrepôt of Southwestern Europe; but the Bay of Cadiz is an unsheltered roadstead, visited at all seasons by high winds, for days interrupting communication with the city, which, from the shoalness of the water, is always inconveniently distant from the ship, while Lisbon is but seven miles above the mouth of the Tagus, where it averages from one to four miles in width, with an anchorage always easy of access, and, but a few hundred yards from the quays of one of the great marts of the Old World, at which, however tempestuous the weather, it is never impossible to land. Were every thing else equal, the annoyances attending the quarantine at Cadiz, which, as elsewhere within the Spanish dominions, is a disgrace to civilization, should decide men-of-war to prefer Lisbon, where no such inconveniences are experienced.

Not many months ago, one of our vessels of war at Tangier, having been telegraphed that her presence was needed in the north of Europe, put into Cadiz to fill up with provisions from our own stores, and although a Spanish steamer, which had preceded her departure from Tangier and anticipated her arrival, was admitted to pratique, she was subjected to three days' quarantine for not having obtained the Spanish Vice Consul's visé to her bill of health, though Tangier was less than thirty miles distant, and notoriously healthy, while coasting steamers traded daily between the two ports. The city officials were informed that the interests of our Government might be seriously compromised by any delay, yet the ship was detained three days for the non-observance of a municipal regulation, which it is an outrage to apply to any vessel of a national character. On another occasion a ship of war arrived with a clean bill of health from a port where Spain was not represented by any consular authority, yet the absence of the visé induced the visiting health-officer to order the yellow flag at her fore until the Council of Health could meet to determine whether it was proper to admit her. Were similar exactions made by other nations, a man-of-war would have to obtain the visés of all the consuls residing at every place from which she sailed, since she never clears for any port, but changes her destination as the interests of her flag require. Happily this requirement is peculiar to Spain. Every where else the certificate of the surgeon, that the vessel is free from contagious and infectious diseases, and that she has not communicated with any other vessel or port where epidemics were prevailing, is satisfactory to the health officials, and is a much more effectual guarantee of her sanitary condition than a bill of health, as it makes the surgeon directly responsible for the faithfulness of his report. The health-officers of Lisbon, who will be found courteous and obliging to the extent of making the visit at night to avoid causing unnecessary detention, refuse any other than such a statement by the senior medical officer.

Lisbon is less known to Americans than many cities of minor interest. Situated beyond the ordinary routes of tourists' travel, and possessing little American trade, it is seldom visited for business or pleasure by our countrymen, who therefore rarely see it, except when, as passengers aboard the steamers to Brazil, they are carried there for the few hours' detention required for coaling. While it possesses a large resident English population, only half a dozen Americans have made it their home. Perhaps, therefore, a few notes of what is to be seen of greatest interest within its limits will not be out of place in a Magazine which has devoted so many pages to the description of strange places in every quarter of the globe.

Lisboa is the Portuguese designation of the city, and the name should be so written in English, there being no reason why foreign nations should vary the orthography of geographical terms. The Quaker City becomes "Fildelfia" in Spanish; we make "Vienna" out of Wien; and many places altogether lose their identity in their passage into other tongues. "Lisboa," itself is asserted by Portuguese antiquarians to be a derivative from "Olisippo," a word of Phœnician origin, or of "Ulyssippo," The City of Ulysses, who, it is said, was carried into the Tagus in the course of a stormy and dangerous voyage. Without resorting to poetic fable, authentic history establishes its many centuries. Whether first Phœnician or Grecian, it was subsequently Carthaginian; then Roman, and called "Felicitas Julia" by the Emperors; then Gothic, and styled "Lispo;" for hundreds of years afterward the property alternately of Christian and Moorish sovereigns, the latter softening its name to "Lisbo," to which the ancestors of the present inheritors have added the final vowel.

The city proper stretches three and a half miles along the western bank of the Tagus, or Tajo—its sparsely-built suburbs as many more—and extends irregularly inland an average breadth of a mile and a quarter, covering its seven principal hills with lofty houses, and streets so steep that steps are constructed in many of them to make travel through them possible. The terrible earthquake of 1755 shook down seventeen thousand houses, and buried twenty-five thousand people; but their survivors and descendants have rebuilt the ruined quarter more substantially than ever, and so ably repaired the human void that the population of the city has increased to more than three hundred thousand.

The traveler, approaching Lisbon from seaward, begins his sight-seeing when Cape Roca (the Lisbon Rock of sailors) first looms up on the horizon. As the panorama, bounded at the southward and eastward by the lofty perpendicular face of Cape Espichel, is brought nearer and nearer to him, he will discover something novel and beautiful in every part of the landscape. The convent dome of Nossa Senhora da Penha glistens far up on the summit of the Hill of Cintra; the pretty villages of Guia and Cascars skirt the shore; vegetation of every hue, fantastic rocks, vine-clad hills, ancient castles, and elegant creations of modern art and wealth, meet the eye wherever it rests. The scenery from the mouth of the river to the city is surpassingly beautiful, and whoever is fortunate enough to enter the "golden Tagus" on one of these bright days or glorious moonlit nights, here so numerous, will enjoy one of the loveliest spectacles in nature. The appearance of the city from the anchorage is very imposing. The several convent and castle-crowned hills are the back-ground of a picture, studded every where with picturesque freaks of nature, the ruins of the past and the industry of the present.

All these visions of beauty used to be dispelled on landing, but the stories of municipal and social neglect and uncleanness are no longer true. The refuse of the kitchen, the stable, and the factory does not now obstruct the streets, which are carefully swept at night, but, being macadamized, are dusty in summer and pasty after rains. The cry of agoa va no longer affrights the belated pedestrian, who did not always escape the deluge of what was not altogether water, which preceded rather than followed the warning. Soap has ceased to be contraband, and splendid floating baths attract the thousands who can not afford to visit the watering-places at the entrance of the river. The revenues arising from soap and tobacco, until a few years past, were sold annually by the Government to a company, which appointed its own agents to collect the import duties. The domestic manufacture of soap was prohibited under heavy penalties. Women were subjected to the greatest indignities at the gates by having their persons rudely searched for concealed soap; and very recently several foreign naval officers were grievously insulted by tobacco agents thrusting their hands in their pockets to find a cigar that had not paid its tax. The great wealth of the Company long enabled them to control the Cortes, but an increasing desire to be clean at a cheap rate, and an unconquerable fondness for good cigars, finally triumphed; and the monopolies, which were as disgraceful to Portugal as the quarantine is to Spain, were added to the list of abandoned barbarisms. The words Saboa, Rapé, Tabac (Soap, Snuff, Tobacco), on the signs of old cigar stores still indicate the places that used to be licensed by the Company to sell these articles.

The latitude of Lisbon is that of Washington, but the climates of the two places are unlike. The average temperature of the year is about 60° Fahrenheit, a lower range of the thermometer and greater prevalence of rains and easterly storms alone denoting the winter season. It never freezes, and few of the inhabitants have ever seen snow fall upon it. Artificial heat is so little needed that scarcely any of the houses are built with chimney flues except in the kitchens, where a small fire ordinarily suffices for the Portuguese cuisine. A few foreigners and natives, who are over-sensitive to the chilliness of a prolonged rainy season, warm their rooms by gas-burners, and others have introduced stoves and furnaces, requiring an enormous pipe along the front wall to the roof.

There is little architectural display, and no exclusively aristocratic quarter. Palaces, churches, and brothels stand side by side. Houses are generally five or six stories in height, roofed with tiles, and have plain stone or stucco fronts, with iron balconies and overhanging shades at each window, where the dark-eyed alfazinhas ("salad-eaters"—the fair Lisbonenses being inordinately fond of salad) collect to watch the passers-by.

There are no elegant stores in Lisbon. The Rua do Chiado—a short, broad street leading from the Praça do Camões—and one or two still shorter thoroughfares connected with it, comprise all the fashionable establishments for the sale of ladies' apparel; but the display in the finest is not comparable to that of a third-rate store in New York. Save the red hand of the glover, the mammoth gilt tooth of the charlatan dentist, and a few similar barbaric devices, little attempt is made at sign-representation. A simple announcement of the name and trade of the proprietor is usually thought sufficient, unless he is privileged to exhibit the royal escutcheon, denoting that the inmates of the Palace have patronized him. In some instances not even the trade is expressed: a white cross on each door-post indicating the residence of the midwife, who here replaces the accoucheur, as a fluttering green cloth used to point out the barber-shop, and pieces of plain white paper on the window-panes still announce that the owner of the building has a room to let. Salesmen take as little trouble within to encourage purchases as the proprietor does by exterior allurements. The advent of a customer seldom calls the attendant from the farther end of the room, and when sought he waits leisurely for Madame to announce the article she seeks, which, being produced, she is expected to buy without cavil and carry away. The skillful sparring of smiling counter-jumpers and hypercritical customers who make shopping a profession is unknown here. The polite demands and indignant remonstrances, the pleading for abatement of charge, the repeated assurances of rare quality and economic price, which create a ceaseless din in one of our large stores, are not heard at a Lisbon counter.

Lack of energy characterizes this race. A people of frugal habits, and accustomed to sacrifice fully a third of the year in the observance of religious feasts and royal anniversaries, can not be expected to exhibit the activity and vigor of the hardier Saxon and Celt, whose more unfruitful lands compel them to labor or starve. Amanha ("To-morrow") and Tenha paciência ("Have patience") are the only replies your tailor, your bootmaker, or your laundress will make for keeping you waiting week after week for articles they will finish in a day when they make the effort to begin, and the stranger will cheerfully resign himself to his washer-woman's dilatoriness if he can be satisfied that her son has not enjoyed a week's wear of his linen in the interim.

The habits of life of the Portuguese depart altogether from an American standard. They neither live, eat, dress, nor are buried as we are. Every American, however humble his lot, aspires to occupy his own castle, and sons and daughters quit the paternal roof with unseemly and regretted haste to begin their own establishments. In Lisbon only the wealthier nobles and a few very rich merchants occupy an entire house, which is then styled a "palace." Few houses are less than five stories in height. The ground-floor is almost always appropriated to stores, and each story, or andar, above is subdivided into suits of rooms, occupied by different families, whence it happens that communities of very dissimilar character dwell under the same roof, while the general stairway, being the subject of no one person's care, is always dirty and unlighted. There is no porter's lodge, as in France, the common entrance from the street being opened at night, when only it is closed, by a sesame of loud raps corresponding in number to the floor on which lives the person sought, whose servant is spared the trouble of descent from these supernal regions by a series of cords leading from each suit of apartments to the latch. It is an ingenious means of saving labor; but it produces an alarming effect on the timid stranger, who is conducted for the first time up a dimly-lighted street to a huge iron-bound door, hears four or five mysterious raps, followed by the opening of the door by unseen hands, and is made to follow his conductor up a dark staircase till he sees a light flickering through a little square grating, and listens to the sharp challenge, Quem e? ("Who is it?") and Que quer? ("What do you want?") The reply satisfactory, huge bolts slide back, the massive door swings open, a second is unfolded, and the visitor introduced into gayly-furnished, brilliantly-lighted parlors, where the politest people in Europe are waiting to give him a kind, hospitable welcome. The police are efficient, and the garrote not an institution, else it would be a risky venture to mount these silent, dark stairways, with no other guide than the balusters and the recollection of the landing stages passed.

Assassinations were once rife in the streets, but at present there is no more orderly city in the world. There are no great drinking saloons to send forth gangs of brawlers. The Lisbon gentleman, after dinner, frequents his favorite café, drinks his harmless cup of coffee or thimbleful of cognac, smokes a cigarette, and wastes an hour or two at dominoes or billiards. Only when a British man-of-war gives general liberty to her crew is the pedestrian apt to be jostled from the pavement by reeling drunkards, and they, fortunately, seldom stray far from the English chop-house by the river-side, where the vile stuff is sold which steals away their brains.

The people of Lisbon are perhaps better dressed than any where else in Europe, though the smallness of their incomes compels them to maintain their fine exterior by the sacrifice of many items of domestic comfort. Neatness of attire characterizes all classes but the beggars, who affect rags and filth. These and a brass badge stamped with the letter M (Mendigo), and a number indicating their license to importune you at every corner for "a little something for the love of God," are regarded by the experienced as signs of danger, to be avoided by an abrupt change of direction. The unlucky stranger who stops to bestow alms on the pobre miserável is dogged by a score of others who have witnessed this evidence of a tender heart. Pity soon becomes banished from the breast in Lisbon. Woeful lamentations, for which the nasals of the Portuguese language so well adapt it, are whined forth in tones to melt the heart of even one who does not understand the meaning of the words; but mendicancy is a profession, and these are its masters, who have studied to give expression to misery as closely as has the tragedian to portray the passions of men. The wailings of pretty little children about the places of amusement at midnight appeal to those who are insensible to the demands of older artists; yet nine times in ten the cinco reisinhos ("half-cent") solicited goes to swell the horde of the miserly crone who has hired the little actress for a pittance. The veiled beggars, who come quietly upon you from the shadow of some dark doorway late at night, profess to be women of respectable birth and station, driven by want to solicit charity, and yet too modest or too proud to expose their features. Poverty and ignorance drive the lowest grades of society in every country to acts of self-degradation; but humanity is nowhere more outraged than here, where inhuman mothers raffle their innocent daughters among the dissipated wiles of aristocratic families. Among the fairest beauties who sit in the promenade at the opera may be seen one more fortunate than her sister victims in this infamous lottery, who, having gained the affection of the youth who won her, was educated by him and finally made his wife.

The Portuguese are even more circumspectly polite than the French. Strangers will not fail to remark how generally characteristic this is of all classes of this community. Gentlemen invariably salute when they enter a room, wheresoever it may be, and whether or not they recognize acquaintances. A bow and "May God be with you!" or "Have patience, friend!" are the only rebuffs addressed to the most importunate beggar, who receives it with a sigh and upturned eyes, when the ruder Englishman's angry curse has elicited a torrent of abuse that is taken up from corner to corner by the incensed fraternity. Certainly it is pleasant to see so much attention paid to the little courtesies of life, though, carried to the extent of formal ceremonial, it is apt to suggest a doubt of its sincerity.

It is a fearful undertaking for an American to enter a parlor, approach the sofa flanked by chairs, forming three sides of a parallelogram, where the ladies are seated together, and execute the proper number of bows and utter the proper number of felicitations, with due regard to the rank and precedence of the fair; and the performance is now the easier when the room is darkened for the eight days assigned by Portuguese etiquette to the reception of visits of condolence after a death in the family. Every woman, except a mamel, is an Excellence, respectability having nothing to do with her right to the title. Madame's letters must be addressed to the Illustrissima e Excelentissima Senhora ("Most Illustrious and Most Excellent Lady"). No more serious affront can be given than to employ a form of address applicable to a lower grade of society; and, therefore, to be considered well-bred, foreigners must learn when to say, "Your Excellency," "Your Lordship," "Sir," or "Your Worship:" to which last even a servant is entitled, unless admitted to the more familiar household tu ("thou"). Among men only the higher ranks of nobles are Excellenzas, and only very intimate male friends hug and kiss each other on meeting.

Nearly all the servants in Lisbon come from the Spanish province of Galicia, adjoining Portugal on the north. No Portuguese will demean himself to carry a bundle, but will step to the door, and, uttering a peculiar hish, summon a Gallego, who is ever ready, bag on shoulder, to perform any service required. As a class, they are justly renowned for their honesty and integrity, and may be confided with any mission, however delicate, as many a fair intriguante can testify. The female domestics are remarkable for their peculiar costume—a heavy cloth cloak with cape, and a white handkerchief tied under the chin instead of a bonnet, both being worn on all occasions and at all seasons, even throughout the hottest summer. Having first obtained a cloak, which, from the costliness of the material and their scanty wages (two to four dollars a month), requires the labor of years, they devote their savings to the acquisition of expensive jewelry. The capote of every middle-aged Gallega conceals the neck hung around with heavy gold chains, and fingers thickly decked with rings.

The Gallegos are literally the hewers of wood and drawers of water of Lisbon, the latter being supplied to the city from numerous public fountains, at which hundreds of water-carriers fill their little kegs, from which they supply their patrons as regularly as the baker and milkman. A municipal ordinance requires every water-carrier to fill his cask before going to bed, to be kept in readiness for fires. They are the only fire brigade. Fortunately their services are seldom needed, the few fires kept in the houses rendering conflagrations of rare occurrence, and the little hand-pumps, supplied from the casks, being feeble opponents to a serious fire. The city was burned down in 1372 by Henriques of Castile to avenge the repudiation of his daughter by her husband, the Portuguese monarch; and during the great calamity of 1755 fire destroyed most of what the earthquake had left standing.

The principal place of debarkation is at the site where this awful catastrophe created its greatest ravages, rather above midway of the city proper, at the magnificent Praça do Commercio, called by the English, who bestow names every where to suit themselves, Black Horse Square, from the bronze statue of King José

I., whose reign, about the time of our Revolution, was made historic by the ambition and energy of his minister, the celebrated Marquis of Pombal. Forty tons of bronze, supported on either side by a marble horse and elephant, sculptured of equal size for the sake of symmetry, do honor to the sovereign; while a little bronze medallion at his feet, alternately removed and replaced by friends and enemies, is the only memorial of the far greater minister. The Square is a paved parallelogram, five hundred and fifty feet wide by six hundred and fifteen long, and is surrounded by the buildings of the Arsenal da Marinha, or navy-yard; the Alfandega, or Custom-house; the Exchange, and India House—massive structures, which make this one of the finest quarters of the city, and the centre of its commercial activity.

The boatmen, who are a race of good-natured vagabonds, having no other homes than their boats, and no other beds than the bare stones, usually land strangers at the Cues do Sodre, on the Praça dos Romilares—a little square, tessellated, after the fashion of the place, in pretty patterns of white and black stones. Most of the commercial agencies, steamship offices, bankers, and the two principal hotels are in this vicinity. Of the latter the Bragança attracts Englishmen, and the Grand Hotel Central the travelers of most other nationalities. The tables are well kept at both; and the stranger, interested in seeing the source whence they are so abundantly supplied, may satisfactorily employ an hour or two before breakfast among the markets, which are but a few blocks farther down the river. A cup of coffee in any of the ever-open cafés, and then a few bunches of luscious grapes, a fresh and juicy orange, or tangerine, or a delicate banana eaten at the stalls, will dispose him to await amicably the somewhat tardy morning meal. Lisbon is justly celebrated for its fish, among which Americans will rejoice to recognize their favorite table-friend, the shad, one of the few articles of food obtainable abroad quite as good as at home.

A short walk along the street bounding the Arsenal, by the lottery-offices, where each temptingly displays the record of its prizes in long columns of red and black figures, bewilderingly abundant from the smallness of the unit of Portuguese currency, the re being the equivalent of a "mill," and through the Praça do Pelourinho, where a globe of iron rings, surmounting a curiously twisted marble column, covers the spot on which the heads of state criminals and inquisitors' victims were exposed to public view, conducts back to the Praça do Commercio, trending northward from which are three parallel wide streets, the Rua Aurea, R. Augusta, and R. Bella da Rainha—named by the English, who have here again imposed their nomenclature where it only serves to embarrass strangers, Gold, Silver, and Cloth streets, from the number of dealers in goods of those descriptions who have located themselves in each respectively. This segregation of trades, so remarkable in Chinese cities, is observable to a certain extent in Lisbon, and gave name originally to many of the streets, the Rua dos Sapateiros being chiefly peopled by shoemakers, the R. dos Douradores by gilders, and the R. dos Confeiteiros by confectioners. Strangers may well regret that such a simplicity of arrangement has not characterized the naming of streets elsewhere. Some of the finest and longest thoroughfares are baptized anew every few blocks with names the most dissimilar and unmanageable. The Rua Direita do Sacramento becomes the Calçada da Pampulha, and two blocks farther on R. Direita de San Francisco de Paula, then R. Direita das Janellas Verdes, and assumes five other metamorphoses within a quarter of a mile, before its career is arrested.

The length of a name is no indication of the extent of the street, for the Calçada nova do Convento do Coração de Jesus is only a few hundred feet long, and the Rua da Santa Anna da Boa Morte extends just two squares. Nor will it do to omit half this surplusage of name, since the Rua Direita de Buenos Ayres, if simply called R. Direita, a straight street, would be confounded with the R. Direita de Sao Francisco da Cidade, and the latter, unless the saint's attributes are fully expressed, with the R. Direita de Sao Francisco de Sales, R. Dir. de Sao Francisco de Borja, and R. Dir. de S. Francisco de Paula. Even the word rua must be specified to distinguish from the becos, largos, tra- vessas, praças, caminhos, calçadas, and estradas, which often bear the same designation. Saintly and holy names enter largely into every system of nomenclature, and sometimes blasphemously, as when such expressions as Coração de Jesus ("Heart of Jesus"), Madre de Dios ("Mother of God"), and Espírito Santo ("Holy Ghost"), are applied to places only remarkable for the misery and licentiousness of their inhabitants.

The unevenness of the land necessitates a great irregularity in the plan of the city. The older portions are made up of narrow lanes and long, lean houses characteristic of their century, but the site of the earthquake is laid out as rectangularly as Philadelphia and Buenos Ayres. Here the houses are lofty, the streets wide and level, and many of the stores, particularly those of the jewelers and silversmiths on Gold and Silver streets, very neat and pretty. Block after block of these little jewel-boxes, so like in arrangement, contents, and attendants that they are only distinguishable by the number of the building, tempt the passer with rings, chains, bracelets, brooches, and silver purses of the same patterns, which have been repeated by generations of workmen, but are valuable on account of the fineness of their material. The penalties inflicted for selling the precious metals below the standard alloy are so severe that the purchaser may buy without fear of being cheated, paying only a small percentage additional to the actual value of the metal contained.

Two large open squares, separated from each other by a row of buildings, terminate these streets. That to the eastward is the Praça da Figueira, the pretty flower and fruit market, surrounded on its four sides by little stalls teeming with olives, oranges, tangerines, bananas, lemons, citrons, figs, almonds, and dates, the air fragrant with the perfume of an abundance of flowers, and noisy from the chattering of hundreds of bright-eyed, saucy country girls, who dispense gratuitous smiles and badinage upon the purchasers of their flowers, or, if these be wanting, amuse themselves by bantering each other. The other, approached from the Rua Amea or R. Augusta, is the Praça do Rocio, or the Square of Dom Pedro I., beautifully paved with waved lines of black and white stones, and a favorite evening promenade. The pedestal for a monument to this illustrious ex-king, ex-emperor, and ex-regent, who voluntarily abdicated three successive thrones, stands in the centre, but the monument is wanting, his spouse the dowager Empress of Brazil, surviving daughter of Eugène de Beauharnais, refusing to contribute toward it from her ample means unless her dead lord is mounted on horseback like his predecessor Dom José, who rides his black steed in the Praça do Commercio at the other end of the street, while the Cortes insist on representing him standing erect, as more becoming a monarch renowned rather as legislator than soldier. His daughter, the late Queen Dona Maria II. (da Gloria), is commemorated by a splendid theatre, erected at the northern end of the square, upon the site of the old Inquisition building.

Overlooking Dom Pedro Square, on the one hand, are the picturesque ruins of the Carmo, the convent of the Carmelite monks, which was erected in 1389, and on the other the Castello or Castle of St. George, whence the best coup d'œil of the city, harbor, and surrounding country may be obtained.

Beyond the Rocio is the beautiful Passeio Publico, the public promenade, where, during the months that the Sao Carlos is not in operation, the public are entertained by excellent music from three superior bands, which play alternately, while the crowd pass up and down the brilliantly-lighted central walk, which is more than a quarter of a mile long. A small charge at the gate excludes the rabble; and the beneficiaries of the Asylo da Mendicidade collect a considerable revenue for their institution by renting chairs for a few pence to the tired promenaders. Strangers will find the Passeio Publico always a delightful resort, and, in the heat of summer, will pass many a pleasant hour under the shaded trees beside its fountains. The people of Lisbon in general possess considerable taste for music. The audience of the Sao Carlos is one of the most critical in Europe. No performer is tolerated on its stage if found unworthy after a sufficient allowance has been made for diffidence and inexperience. Its five tiers are partitioned into little boxes, in the seclusion of which the devotee may, for a moderate charge, listen to the finest productions of the masters without the etiquette of full dress. The wives and mistresses of the great nobles and their wealthy imitators, here as elsewhere, delight to display the treasures of their jewel-caskets and wardrobes—the wife and mistress of the same man often vis-a-vis and equally notorious—but the parquette and upper-circles are crowded with an intelligent auditory, intent upon the performance, whose countenances exhibit, by one general sympathetic expression of disapproval, every faulty departure from the score of the composer.

Surveying the audience at the opera, or indeed at any other place of public entertainment, Americans will at once be struck with the not infrequent appearance, even among the first circles, of very dusky negroes from Brazil and the African settlements, generally accompanied by beautiful white wives, more fair by contrast with their swarthy lords. These are usually magnates of the slave-trade, which is indebted to Portuguese rather than to Spanish subjects for its vitality. They are received on a footing of perfect equality, and their children may be met in the streets every day, walking hand in hand with their white school-fellows. Thick lips, flat noses, recedent foreheads, and tawny complexions attest the frequency of miscegenation, though perhaps not so common here as in Brazil. Time will determine whether the resulting mixture presents the hybrid characteristics of the people of Mexico and Peru, where races less dissimilar than the white and black have mingled their blood for centuries.

Besides the concerts at the Passeio, the general public is entertained with music by a military band, every Sunday afternoon, in the Estrella Garden, a park of considerable extent, laid out with serpentine graveled walks, and adorned with artificial hills, lakes, grottoes, swans, and deer. The services at the English chapel of St. George, erected on the grounds of the Protestant cemetery adjoining the garden, finish as the music begins outdoors; so that the stranger, if disposed to be a Roman in Rome, may quit the sanctuary for a promenade among the senhoras to the symphonies of the opera. The cemetery is very neatly arranged, and possesses a large grove of magnificent cypresses, which are visible at a considerable distance. The remains of Fielding and Dodworth are interred here.

There are several other interesting parks in Lisbon. The Praça de Sao Pedro d'Alcantara, a finely-shaded promenade, with a shell grotto and fountain, affords an excellent view of the better portion of the city and harbor. The Campo Grande, which is a mile long, with a carriage-road all around it, is pleasantly situated, a little distance out of town, for an afternoon drive or ride on horseback. At the Campo de Santa Anna there is held, once a week, the Feria da Ladra, or Rag Fair, at which all sorts of discarded garments and used-up furniture, odd pieces of glass-ware and crockery, bits of iron, cloth, and refuse of every kind, are offered for sale; and every Sunday, in the adjoining Praça dos Touros, there may be witnessed a Portuguese bull-fight—a much less brutal exhibition than the Spanish, since the bull's horns are sawn off and padded, to prevent the wounding of the men and horses. Sometimes a very savage and powerful animal succeeds in trampling to death an unlucky picador, whose iron-clad trowsers hinder him from escaping by flight should his horse fall.

The Botanical Gardens, near the suburbs of Belem, are laid out with much taste, and possess a very large collection of indigenous and exotic plants. Two grotesque military statues, of reputed Phœnician origin, dug up on the grounds more than a hundred years ago, are among the curiosities exhibited.

Lisbon is thickly studded with churches and conventual establishments. In 1830 there were one hundred and twenty-one religious edifices within the city limits. They crown all the hills, and constitute a prominent feature in the landscape seen from the anchorage. Few of them possess any architectural merit. The most beautiful is probably the church and convent of Sao Geronymo, at Belem, which was commenced by the great Manuel in 1499, at the site whence Vasco da Gama embarked for those discoveries in India which gave his royal master pretext for entitling himself “King of Portugal and of the Algarves, here and beyond the sea in Africa, Lord of Guinea, and of the conquest, navigation, and commerce of Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, and India”—of which grandiloquence all that remains to his successors is “King of Portugal and of the Algarves,” one of the latter being an insignificant settlement on the African coast, and the other only the southern province of the kingdom of Portugal—both kingdoms together scarcely exceeding the State of Kentucky in area. The cloisters of this convent are among the most beautiful on the Continent, and the columns which support the roof of the church are so light, and apparently unable to sustain the superincumbent weight, that the scaffolding around them was removed by felons, who were promised liberty as their reward for exposing themselves to so great a danger. The doorway of the church is a splendid Gothic arch, with life-size statues of the Apostles, rising one above the other to its apex.

The church of the Heart of Jesus (Coração de Jesus), on the summit of the Estrella Hill, and facing the Gardens, is built in imitation of St. Peter's, without the colonnade. Its fine dome is the only one of any pretension in the city.

The little church of Sao Roque, notwithstanding its unostentatious exterior, attracts more visitors than any other by its wonderful chapel of St. John, built by Joao V., because his patron saint had no church nor chapel of his own in all the city, and enriched beyond the value of many an entire church. The back and sides of the chapel are formed principally by three large mosaics, copies of the actual size of Michael Angelo's Baptism of Christ, Guido's Annunciation, and Raphael Urbino's Descent of the Holy Ghost; and so perfect, that it is necessary to ascend a ladder to be assured that they are not paintings. An elaborate mosaic constitutes the floor of the chapel, and beautifully-carved panels of Carrara marble the ceiling. Eight columns of lapis-lazuli surround the altar, which is composed of large masses of amethyst, Egyptian alabaster, granite, cornelian, verde-antique, Roman marble, porphyry, and jauf. The metal ornaments are heavily gilded; the hanging lamps and two monster candlesticks are of solid silver. The chapel was set up in Rome, and blessed by Pope Benedict XIV., who celebrated a mass within it before it was transferred to its present site, where its millions have ever since lain idle, which might far better have been devoted to the establishment of public schools and libraries, that would have banished so much poverty and vice from this land, and at the same time have been a nobler monument to the saint.

The church of Sao Domingo, near the Rocio, is the present see of the Cardinal Patriarch, who is the head of the Church in Portugal, and is of such great size that it invited desecration by the French Marshal Junot, who quartered and drilled a regiment upon its floor.

At Sao Vicente, which is the mortuary church of the House of Bragança, are collected all but two of the defunct members of the reigning royal family, piled away in gilt-trimmed trunk-like boxes, on an elevated platform around the vault, the late king occupying a catafalque in the centre, until a successor crowds him into a less honored place. The church itself, like the memorable cape, derives its name from the martyr St. Vincent, whose body is interred at the Cathedral, where a pair of rays are kept, in commemoration of the miraculous birds which guided the saint during his pilgrimage.

With profound reverence for the traditions of their religion, boasting of their city as the birth-place of five canonized saints—among them St. Anthony—and one Pope (John XXII.), observing scrupulously all the festivals of the church—every head uncovered, every knee bent to the ground as the host approaches; even the theatres stopping their performances when the bell is heard announcing the passing viaticum—the people of Lisbon are still very liberal in religious matters. Their educated classes exercise unrestrained license in criticising the ministers of their faith, who are too often amenable to charges of hypocrisy and licentiousness. They applauded their King for allying himself by marriage with the excommunicated Victor Emanuel, and joyfully acquiesced in the expulsion of the Jesuits and the suppression of the convents. Thousands of the best citizens are active and zealous members of the masonic fraternity, notwithstanding the papal interdiction. A Protestant chapel and burial-place cast their shadows over one of their most venerated temples, and crowds of curious natives unhesitatingly enter and decorously witness the manner of heretic worship. The despoiled priests and their bigoted adherents attribute the decadence of their nation to the sacrilege committed in transferring the sacred candlesticks and chalices to the mint, and in occupying the vacant conventual establishments as schools, asylums, hospitals, barracks, libraries, and similar institutions. The great number of these found available for such purposes is the explanation of the absence of public buildings. Very few of the latter have been specially designed for their purpose. The Naval Arsenal, Exchange, Custom-house, and India House, and the recently-finished Polytechnic School, are splendid structures. The Mint, Bank of Portugal, and S. Carlos Opera House, which, receiving an annual subsidy of twenty thousand milreis from the Government, should be regarded as a national rather than a private institution, are unattractive edifices. The Cortes still meet in the old convent of Sao Bento, where the fine library of the Torre do Tombo, with its treasures of rare editions and old manuscripts, will be found interesting even by those not learned in archæology. The hundred and fifty thousand volumes of the Public Library are huddled together in the cells and corridors of the old Franciscan convent, and as many more manuscripts are piled away in its loft. The collection of coins belonging to this library is very large and very valuable; and almost equally prized is a case believed to contain a copy of every edition in every language (though there is none with an American imprint), of the Lusiad of Camoes, who is especially revered in Lisbon as a native of the city. A statue is about being erected to him on the little praça, bearing his name at the beginning of the Rua do Chiado.

The Santa Cara da Misericordia, adjoining and connected with St. Roque's, is the home of two thousand foundlings, and one of the noblest charities of the city—an institution which Americans refuse to tolerate, though even their religious newspapers advertise the detestable nostrums and infamous callings which are its inevitable substitutes. Better far the little window, with expositos painted on its lintel, where the open mouth of a revolving cylinder is ever ready to receive the fatherless infant, who passes from the mother, who can not, dare not, or will not nurture it, to the tender care of those good sisters of the unfortunate, who, actuated by whatever amount of mistaken zeal, fill the measure of their lives with doing so much good that the church may well be proud of them, than the too well-known sign of the false physician which, in every one of our great cities, allures the poor sinner to death or deeper guilt. Better, too, the municipal supervision of the social evil and the biweekly sanitary inspections, required by the health officers of Lisbon, which have banished the black lion and her whelps from this part of Portugal, once their favorite lair, than that the undying poison-tree should send its roots through the whole substratum of society, and cast its baneful shadow over the lives of the young, down to the third and fourth generation of those who have eaten of its fruit.

Lisbon is abundantly supplied with royal residences. Ascending the river, the most prominent object in the view, after the range of wind-mill covered hills, is the Palace of the Ajuda, itself an immense building, though only the eastern wing of an enormous edifice projected to accommodate the royal family, the Cortes, officers of state, and diplomatic corps. The unfinished face, where it was to have been connected with the main building, looks to the westward, and, for many years, has been only roughly boarded up, exhibiting a strange display of royal pomp and national penury. The hope of completing the palace, as designed, has been abandoned, yet the authorities refuse to appropriate the sum required to cover in the exposed end. The palace, which was the favorite home of the royal family until death visited it so often, was that of the Necessidades, the singular name of which gave a foreign minister occasion to exclaim: "What good can be expected of a country where the monarch lives in the Palace of Want (Palacio das Necessidades), the Minister in Thieves' Lane (Travessa das Ladrois), and where the height of pleasure (alto dos prazeres), belongs to the confined dead." The royal family has dwindled down to the father, brother, and grandmother of the King, and two sisters married to petty German princes.

The late king, Pedro V., his wife, and two brothers, died within a few months of each other, believed by many to be the victims of Miguelite poison, but more probably of that constitutional impairment which is consequent upon incestuous connections. Inter-marriage of uncles with nieces, and of nephews with aunts, is not uncommon in Portuguese society. It occurred in the case of Maria I. and Pedro IV., and many estimable people declare that if Dom Miguel had not broken faith with his betrothed niece, the young Maria II., the revolution would not have occurred, and Portugal not been divided between two factions, which hate each other cordially, and represent each other with asses' ears.

There are several other spacious palaces within the city, and a number of summer resorts beyond its limits. Those at Cintra and Mafra are especially worthy of being seen. The palace of Cintra is disfigured by two immense chimney-like towers, which give it the appearance of a factory. The great saloon is surrounded with the escutcheons of all the noble families of the kingdom. Two blackened shields represent the dishonored families of the attempted assassins of José I., whose knightly bearings have been here blotted out, as their very dwellings were razed to the ground. Strangers are also shown the room where Afonso VI. wore out the floor by pacing up and down during fifteen years' imprisonment, for no greater offense than physical incapacity.

The palace is the least of the attractions of Cintra. Childe Harold, long ago, confessed his inability to describe the munificence of nature's riches in this region :

"Lo! Cintra's glorious Eden intervenes
In variegated maze of mount and glen.
Ah, me! what hand can pencil guide, or pen,
To follow half on which the eye dilates,
Through views more dazzling unto mortal ken
Than those whereof such things the bard relates,
Who to the awe-struck world unlock'd Elysium's gates.

"The horrid crags by toppling convent crown'd,
The cork-trees hoar that clothe the shaggy steep,
The mountain-moss by scorching skies imbrown'd,
The sunken glen, whose sunless shrubs must weep,
The tender azure of the unruffled deep,
The orange tints that gild the greenest bough,
The torrents that from cliff to valley leap,
The vine on high, the willow branch below,
Mix'd in one mighty scene, with varied beauty glow."

Surmounting the loftiest peak of the coast range at an elevation of nineteen hundred feet stands Penha Castle, an old convent converted into a quinta by Dom Fernando II., the father of the late and reigning kings and regent during their minority. He is personally the most popular individual in Lisbon. Whenever his tall form is recognized people hasten to throw themselves in his way to receive the salutation he is always prompt to return. When political disputes raged so fiercely that civil government was almost completely suspended, Dom Fernando was the only person who could safely walk the streets at night without a guard. His late refusal of the crown of Greece has considerably augmented his popularity, though it would have been a most unwise act for a man, who is regarded as clear-headed as his cousin, the late Prince Albert, to surrender his present enormous incomes and kingly comforts for the annoyances and anxieties of an insecure throne. Exceedingly well educated, able to address seven or eight foreign Ministers in their own languages, accomplished as a musician and artist, he has identified himself with the progressive movements of the age, patronizes institutions of learning, and has filled his palace at Cintra with works of art, which are open to the inspection of visitors whenever His Majesty is not occupying it. The architecture of the building and its internal arrangements are peculiar, and the grounds are laid out with taste and elegance.

This vicinity is replete with interest to tourists. On an adjacent peak is an old Moorish Castle and strong-hold in admirable preservation, and near by, the celebrated Convento da Cortica, or Cork Convent, instituted by Joao de Castro, who, though once Viceroy of India, died a beggar. It derives its name from the material which has replaced wood in its construction, and which is furnished abundantly by a grove of cork-oaks in the neighborhood. The hole in front of the convent still remains, in which poor Honorius dwelt sixteen years,

"In hope to merit Heaven by making earth a Hell."

After exhausting Cintra, which is not done without visiting Monserrat, the gorgeous residence of Beckford, author of "Vathek," and after drinking a glass of vinho de Collares, at the village where it is made, a long and tiresome jolt on the back of a diminutive donkey brings to Mafra, renowned for its great building erected by Joao V. in 1730, and comprising within its immense square of eleven hundred and fifty feet a church, a monastery, and two palaces, containing in the aggregate eight hundred and sixty-six rooms, and having space enough upon its roof to drill ten thousand men. The organs and chimes in the church are scarcely excelled by any in the world, but the latter are seldom rung unless some of the royal family are present. This Joao V. was the same who erected the chapel of St. John in the church of St. Roque, and whose zeal in building religious edifices induced Benedict IV. to bestow the title of Fidelissimo on him and his successors, whence they have ever since been styled "Most Faithful Majesties," as those of France and Spain are "Most Christian" and "Most Catholic." The environs of Mafra have none of the beauties of Cintra. The country here is a waste, and the site was selected by the King in fulfillment of a vow, that, if blessed with an heir, he would build a church on the most barren spot within his dominions. The saintly confessor who heard the vow is said to have taken good care that the monarch's prayer should be realized.

Royalty is an expensive luxury. It cost a million of dollars to marry the boy and girl who sit upon the throne before which this nation bows down. Groaning with want, it spends millions annually in feeding and clothing the relatives, parasites, and mistresses of the royal family. Yet the people are loyal. Though they retail the scandal of the court they doff their hats and bend obsequiously to the very spendthrifts and libertines whose flagrant violations of propriety they condemn without having the independence to punish. Two families enjoy the privilege of keeping on their hats in the presence of royalty, and Vasco da Gama's descendant, the Marquis of Niza, as hereditary Admiral of the Indies, precedes the King in going on board a man-of-war. Though not ordinarily included among public sights, Americans should not neglect to visit the collection of state coaches at the Calvario, as a part of their study of the peculiarities of royalty. Here are stowed away the huge, lumbering gilded coaches in which the kings and queens have for centuries, on all state occasions, been drawn through the streets for the dazzling of the vulgar. The oldest coach, as well as the simplest and least absurd, belonged to Affonso Henriques, who established the kingdom of Portugal in 1132, and who was the first of the line of thirty-one sovereigns that have occupied its throne. Of kindred interest, as illustrating the senseless extravagance entailed by monarchical institutions, are the royal stables, with a population of one hundred and twenty horses and half as many mules.

Farther on, in the suburb of the same name, is the pretty Tower of Belem, from which an over-zealous sergeant fired those shots at the Niagara, which for a moment caused the national Eagle to ruff his feathers. A single shell would have demolished the fort, but at the same time would have destroyed a beautiful relic of the art of three hundred and fifty years ago. Its guns are as harmless for offensive as its walls are powerless for defensive purposes. It was once used as a prison for female offenders against the state, but is now merely a station from which the sunset gun, and signals for vessels to heave to for the health-officer's visit, are fired. Its battery does saluting service, with half a dozen others, on all these royal and religious festivals which require the burning of powder, that most grateful incense to Portuguese and Spanish dignitaries. Guns have to be fired whenever the King or any of the royal family embark or disembark, on the anniversaries of their births, baptism, marriage, and death; and when a new heir appears the salutes are repeated day after day according to the caprice of the moment. The Cortes, in an ebullition of revolutionary fervor, declared that sovereignty resided in the people, and enacted that the title of Majesty should be applied to their own collective body, at the same time requiring the King to swear himself as the first citizen of the kingdom; hence their assembling and dissolution have likewise to be saluted; but the custom appears most absurd, when all the men-of-war and forts fire salvos on the day of Corpus Christi as the Host is taken from the church for its procession through the streets, and again on its return. The Tower of Belem was built on an islet, but the rising of the river-bank has left it a considerable distance from the water's edge.

Nothing, however, in or about Lisbon will so much excite the astonishment and admiration of strangers as the great arch of the aqueduct of Agoastiores, which supplies the city with water brought ten miles from the village of Bellas. This marvelous creation of man ranks higher as a wonder of the world than the Colossus of Rhodes or the Pharos of Alexandria. The aqueduct is partly underground; and modern science would have conducted it so all the way, but the architects of Joao V. carried it across the valley of the Alcantara, in the suburb of that name, over a series of thirty arches, the largest of which, at the point of lowest depression of the dry bed of the streamlet, is two hundred and sixty-four feet high, and has a width from pier to pier of one hundred and seven. Its symmetry and simplicity, at the first view, disappoint the spectator, who does not fully realize the immensity of the work until he compares it with surrounding heights, and, standing directly beneath it, follows its piers upward until they lose themselves in the narrow line of stone overhead. The corridor is only five feet wide, and is traversed by three channels of thirteen inches each, of which two are ever running, and the third used only when the others are being cleaned or repaired. The water is poured into an immense covered reservoir, whence it is conducted to the several public chafariz or fountains. A familiar experiment in acoustics may be performed by whispering close to one of the abutments of the great arch in a tone too low to be heard by a by-stander, but perfectly intelligible to a third person whose ear presses the opposite abutment, more than a hundred feet distant, and even a more interesting cataphonic effect is observed by standing directly beneath the centre of the arch and beginning to speak aloud, each word will be repeated distinctly four several times, in different tones as the voice is reflected from side to side, until it is lost nearly three hundred feet above. Guides may be obtained at the Deposito das Agoastiores, who, for a cruzado, will take the visitor as far as he wishes to walk inside the corridor, and also upon the top of the aqueduct over the great arch, which has been closed as a highway on account of the temptation it offered to the commission of suicides and murders, at one time so alarmingly frequent that a fresh victim was looked for every morning on the rocky bottom of the valley.

Lisbon is being rapidly brought within communication with other portions of the continent. A line of French steamers coasts around the peninsula from Brest to Marseilles, and makes weekly stoppages going and returning. Railroads are being projected all over the kingdom, and connects its interior with the capital. An hour's ride, after ferrying across the river, which widens to four miles at the upper end of the city, carries you to Setúbal (Anglicè, St. Ubes, famous for salt), a city so old, say its admirers, that it derives its name from Tubal Cain. It stands on the shore of a lagoon, covering the site of the Roman town of Cedobriga, where lights were seen one night by a sentinel on a neighboring height to wave to and fro and then disappear. Coins and pieces of tessellated pavement reward the patient seeker after relics, who is content to dig an hour or two among the sands at low-tide. The lines of Torres Vedras, by which Wellington defended Lisbon against the French in 1810, are only a pleasant drive from the city.

If the traveler examines attentively all the objects and places of interest which have here been cursorily enumerated, and the many others of scarcely less attraction, with which this city is so full, he will find occupation for many weeks, and will depart well satisfied with the manner in which he has employed his time, and quite disposed to agree with the boast of its citizens, that

"Quem nao tem visto Lisboa, Nao tem visto villa boa."

HIGH DAYS IN A VIRGINIAN VILLAGE.

OUR village was ensconced among the Virginia mountains, and the epoch of which we now write was considerably over a third of a century ago. The Blue Ridge on the one side, and the Alleghanies on the other, seemed to shut us out from all the world. In the summer, as the silvery morning mists curtained these mountain barriers, or as the cloud-shadows moved along them, or as the storm came sweeping over them, they were very beautiful and grand; and hardly less so when winter draped them in mantles of snow. Sometimes in the autumn the dried leaves and woods would ignite, and for weeks the bright chain of the "fire in the mountains," circling around peak, knoll, and precipice, was a splendid spectacle as seen through the black night.

A village far removed from the great marts of commerce and thoroughfares has but little to disturb its quiet. Often through the whole length of our principal street not a moving thing was to be seen. A few loungers were usually to be found about the corners, whittling the empty boxes which served them as seats; and a cluster of village politicians at times oscillated on the hinder legs of chairs at the tavern door, discussing the affairs of the nation. If a traveling horseman happened to arrive he was keenly scanned, and his name, residence, and destination carefully searched out. In the summer season tourists came along, regaling their city eyes amidst our fine scenery, and were treated with no little deference and hospitality. Great droves of horned cattle from the counties beyond us, on their way to distant markets, also not unfrequently relieved the monotony, some inquisitive soul always calling out, "Whose drove is that? How many have you in your drove?" If the stupid and perverse drove "broke" in the street and got into higgledy-piggledy, running in the wrong direction and in all directions, it was most inspiring to behold.

No railroad with its shriek and clatter, no steamboat disgorging impatient throngs, no rumbling omnibuses or noisy, insolent cabmen, no bustle and din of trade invaded our quiet. The only link connecting us with the rest of mankind was a tri-weekly mail stage—a long, ponderous, yellow wagon. The body sat low on the axles, as a preventive against upsets, and the driver's seat inside. Slowly and with great toil it made its way over the long, precipitous hills, over the great boulders and ridges of limestone which obstructed the ill-made and dangerous roads. As it was the custom to condemn intractable horses to stage service, there were sometimes terrible accidents—the desperate beasts, taking fright on some hill-top and dashing like so many furies, would drag the pitching vehicle down the long descent and at last hurl it bottom upward on the rocks, a mass of rubbish, maiming the passengers, and perhaps killing the driver. Some of these perils of stage-travel were the theme of oft-repeated narrative to intensely interested and dismayed young auditors in the nursery, or around the winter evening's fire. The difficulties of communication made every where else seem very far from us, and some people nowadays would laugh at our ideas of distances. For instance, I remember that when one of our villagers was on one occasion about setting off for Alabama, he went around from house to house, with great solemnity and tenderness telling every body farewell.

But the stirring times for our village were certain public days of annual occurrence when the country people flocked in, filling the tavern and crowding the street. "Court days" were seasons of general convocation. With few occasions for personal intercourse, the people from different sections availed themselves of these opportunities for settling up business matters. Then customers were dunned, bills paid, the public crier sold worthless horses with high eulogiums on their matchless qualities, and the sheriff brought down his ruthless hammer on the household effects of some poor unfortunate who had failed to make both ends meet, while his busy deputy called the names of tardy jurors or witnesses three times over from the court-house steps; farmers poured doleful complaints into each other's ears over backward seasons, droughts, short crops, and low prices, while family affairs and gossip in general were not neglected. Rich were the stores of news carried at the close of such days to country homes. Oft were the references for weeks afterward to what the good-man had "heard at court."

"Election-day," however, was one of our high days. All the voters of the county then assembled, and great was the bustle and the throng. Candidates for Congress and the Legislature, in their best Sunday clothes, were conspicuous—shaking hands with young and old, inquiring about the good-wife and children, hoping all were well. On the hustings, too, they stood in imposing array, pouring out their well-conned speeches—some with stammering tongue, others facetious and humorous, making the sober farmers shake their sides over happy hits and oft-told jokes, others polished, classical, eloquent; for some of our orators were men whose splendid declamation thrilled the councils of the nation. Eager were the eyes turned upon each voter, as, according to the custom there, the sheriff grasped his hand, called aloud his name, and demanded, "Whom do you vote for?" And when at last the setting sun gave the signal for closing the polls, and the result was announced, great was the joy, and great the disappointment too. Long and deep were the potations of the victors; long and deep were the potatoes of the vanquished.

But "General Muster" was the day of days. For us young folk, at least, it was first in the calendar. Then from early dawn the crowds began to gather—pouring in from every road and by-way, from farm-house and secluded mountain valley. The court-house sidewalk and the public corners were the property for the time being of thrifty country dames, whose tables were laden with small-beer, apples, chestnuts, and piles of ginger-cakes—particularly aggravating to penniless urchins—round ones a cent apiece, square ones, artistically embossed, four cents. Horse cakes were not yet introduced.

But the soldiers. What an array! Troopers with stub-tailed coats profusely buttoned, uncomfortable leather helmets with horse-tail pendants, and glittering swords, dashed through scampering crowds on sleek, fat, prancing steeds. Drums rattled, fifes shrieked, captains and subordinates roared "Fall into ranks!" "Dress by the right!" "Mark time!" with a dignity and fervor reflecting upon them and their county the highest credit. Then appeared in all his majesty the Colonel, with plumed chapeau, the observed of all observers, a noble looking man, said to resemble the great Washington; there, too, was the stirring, lively, ardent adjutant; and the spruce young surgeon, casting furtive glances at the pretty faces and bright eyes in those upper windows.

"Forward, march!" at last echoes along the line, and our warriors defile through the village and move off to the parade-ground on a neighboring hill. Let us review them. John Falstaff, what a regiment! Sixteen of the sixty troopers in the full panoply of horse-tail helmets and bullet buttons, the remainder arrayed each as seemed best in his own eyes. Horses jogging along as if going to church, horses standing on their hind legs, horses trotting sidewise, horses with their heads where their tails should have been, horses incontinently charging on apple-women and cake tables. The infantry perform fewer evolutions, but they are fit match for the troopers. Here is a uniform (sic!) coat with short waist and long, narrow skirts that may be a relic of historic Yorktown; here is another of scarlet, probably captured from some unlucky Britisher at the same eventful locality; and there is a jaunty one fresh from a Northern city tailor. Here are all varieties of "citizens" costume; black coats, blue coats, green coats, linsey-woolsey coats, gingham coats, no coats, round jackets, and hunting shorts. Here are shot guns, rifles, old muskets, rusty swords, bludgeons, pea-sticks, and no sticks. Some are keeping step, some running to catch up; talking, laughing, playing tricks, and eating ginger-cakes.

Once on the neighboring hill—our Champs de Mars—our regiment "spreads itself." Its manœuvres are miscellaneous and original, not to say impromptu. For a while it stands at rest, "grand, gloomy, and peculiar." Some tired of standing lie down on the grass; some achieve various practical jokes. They march, they counter-march; they form hollow squares that are not at all square; the lively adjutant gallops and vociferates in intense excitement; the troopers scour the hill-side and parts adjacent with a desperation and expenditure of horse-flesh and horse-perspiration worthy of the highest admiration. What prodigies of valor would such soldiers not perform had they only the chance!

Our regiment having displayed its powers and prowess to the satisfaction of the admiring public and its own, wound up the eventful day by an extemporaneous charge on the cake-stands and on the taverns too. Some of the heroes not having exhausted their valor, undertook individual adventures, or what is popularly known as "on their own hook," the consequence of which were many black eyes and bloody noses. From the effects of the various "charges" not a few found it difficult to mount their horses when the time came for turning their faces homeward, or to sit erect in their saddles. Wild whoops and hurrahs disturbed our usually quiet village long after nightfall. Not a few of the sturdy countrymen reached their mountain homes through no small perils, and not a little the worse for "General Muster Day."

Another of our village high days was the 22d of February, the birth-day of Washington, for we were a patriotic people. How it was that the Fourth of July was not equally esteemed I can not explain, but such was the fact. On one of the beautiful hills overlooking the village was an institution of learning which had done much toward diffusing the intelligence of which we were no little proud, and which had enabled us to furnish men of renown for both Church and State. Washington's birthday was always the occasion of a grand celebration. Orations were delivered, our cannon was fired—especially the "butt," the remains of an exploded iron cannon—the best music we could command discoursed its enlivening strains, country people came in to gaze and admire, and the young maidens mustered in strength, their rich mountain complexions set off to the best advantage by the latest city fashions. The village belles were accustomed to befriend their respective college favorites by making for them ribbon rosettes, with long streamers, the society badges, blue for the one, white for the other. Fastened to the lapel they decidedly added to the effectiveness of a young gentleman's presence.

With these preliminaries, if the 22d happened to be a fair, bright day, not always to be reckoned upon in February, we were sure of a good time. At the appointed hour the societies formed in column, two abreast, and marched from the classic halls on College Hill to the court-house in the midst of the town. The band by which they were preceded usually comprised the very modest allowance of two flutes, and nothing else, played by amateurs. But that procession, that music, those blue-and-white streamers flying in the mountain breezes, the patriotic orations, the throng of bright faces, and the rounds of rapturous applause, if ever human glory had reached its culminating point, it seemed to us youngsters that this must be it. It has fallen to my lot since to see Kossuth's reception into New York, and Queen Victoria's reception into Edinburgh, with the review of 80,000 troops by the Emperor and Empress of France, with numerous other pageants; but these were tame and small affairs compared with that 22d of February turn-out, as I used to see it in our mountain village. This grand gala occasion usually wound up with a ball, which was, of course, in harmony with the splendors of the day—in fact, the very blossom and flower of its glories. Our village at this time, so far as my memory serves me, could boast but one four-wheeled carriage; and this was brought into requisition to transport the young ladies from their homes to the ball. One or more of the "managers" took the houses seriatim, bringing from each its precious contribution to the aggregate female loveliness of the occasion. As we boys stood at the village tavern-door, and saw one after another of these carriage-loads drive up, and youth and beauty in all its charms gracefully and gallantly handed from the steps and tripping merrily into the scene of festivity, it seemed almost too much bliss for mortals. The reader must bear in mind that in those primitive times ladies did not postpone their appearance in the ball-room till from ten o'clock P.M. to midnight; they went before dark, and could, of course, be seen and admired by all curious spectators. When the famous black fiddler at length struck up an old "Virginia Reel," the gayety set in in good earnest, and many a blooming belle and manly beau, as they tripped together "the light fantastic toe," wished in their hearts that the 22d of February would come every month in the year.

But it must not be supposed that our village was given up to "the poms and vanities of the world." On the contrary, we were rather uncommonly religious. Hence I must not fail to mention among our high days the meetings of Presbytery and Synod—for our population was chiefly of Scotch-Irish descent, and consequently Presbyterian—Synod did not come except after intervals of some years; but when it did, it was worth while to be there. The writer of this was not much of a judge of the preaching in those days; but of the eating he felt himself authorized to speak in terms of the most unqualified approbation. "The big pot was put in the little one." Every house was filled with guests, on the principle of the largest hospitality. Ministers, laymen, and ladies were alike welcome; and they came from every part of the State—from hundreds of miles away. Great were the crowds. The old church was too small to contain them; and when Sunday came, "the great day of the feast," the throng surpassed all description. And very good times these were; many the pleasant acquaintances formed, many the genial hours passed, many the fine sermons, many the pious impressions—to last, it was to be hoped, forever. It was worth going a very long way to participate in these good things.

But the times of which I write are long since passed. Our mountain village has so changed that we of the by-gone days returning there would hardly know it. Modern fashions and modern airs have usurped the place of the former simplicity. But it is questionable whether any advance has been made on the real enjoyment of life which attended those unsophisticated "high days" of "auld lang syne."

ARMADALE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS, AUTHOR OF "NO NAME," "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," ETC.

BOOK THE LAST.

CHAPTER II.

IN THE HOUSE.

NOTICING Mr. Bashwood's confusion (after a moment's glance at the change in his personal appearance), Midwinter spoke first.

"I see I have surprised you," he said. "You were looking, I suppose, for somebody else? Have you heard from Allan? Is he on his way home again already?"

The inquiry about Allan, though it would naturally have suggested itself to any one in Midwinter's position at that moment, added to Mr. Bashwood's confusion. Not knowing how else to extricate himself from the critical position in which he was placed he took refuge in simple denial.

"I know nothing about Mr. Armadale—oh dear, no, Sir, I know nothing about Mr. Armadale," he answered, with needless eagerness and hurry. "Welcome back to England, Sir," he went on, changing the subject in his nervously talkative manner. "I didn't know you had been abroad. It's so long since we have had the pleasure—since I have had the pleasure—Have you enjoyed yourself, Sir, in foreign parts? Such different manners from ours—yes, yes, yes—such different manners from ours! Do you make a long stay in England, now you have come back?"

"I hardly know," said Midwinter. "I have been obliged to alter my plans, and to come to England unexpectedly." He hesitated a little; his manner changed, and he added in lower tones, "A serious anxiety has brought me back. I can't say what my plans will be until that anxiety is set at rest."

The light of a lamp fell on his face while he spoke, and Mr. Bashwood observed, for the first time, that he looked sadly worn and changed.

"I'm sorry, Sir—I'm sure I'm very sorry. If I could be of any use—" suggested Mr. Bashwood, speaking under the influence in some degree of his nervous politeness, and in some degree of his remembrance of what Midwinter had done for him at Thorpe-Ambrose in the by-gone time.

Midwinter thanked him, and turned away sadly. "I am afraid you can be of no use, Mr. Bashwood; but I am obliged to you for your offer, all the same." He stopped, and considered a little: "Suppose she should not be ill? Suppose some misfortune should have happened?" he resumed, speaking to himself, and turning again toward the steward. "If she has left her mother, some trace of her might be found by inquiring at Thorpe-Ambrose."

Mr. Bashwood's curiosity was instantly aroused. The whole sex was interesting to him now for the sake of Miss Gwilt.

"A lady, Sir?" he inquired. "Are you looking for a lady?"

"I am looking," said Midwinter simply, "for my wife."

"Married, Sir!" exclaimed Mr. Bashwood. "Married since I last had the pleasure of seeing you! Might I take the liberty of asking—?"

Midwinter's eyes dropped uneasily to the ground.

"You knew the lady in former times," he said. "I have married Miss Gwilt."

The steward started back as he might have started back from a loaded pistol leveled at his head. His eyes glared as if he had suddenly lost his senses, and the nervous trembling to which he was subject shook him from head to foot.

"What's the matter?" asked Midwinter. There was no answer. "What is there so very startling," he went on, a little impatiently, "in Miss Gwilt's being my wife?"

"Your wife?" repeated Mr. Bashwood, helplessly. "Mrs. Armadale—!" He checked himself by a desperate effort, and said no more.

The stupor of astonishment which possessed the steward was instantly reflected in Midwinter's face. The name in which he had secretly married his wife had passed the lips of the last man in the world whom he would have dreamed of admitting into his confidence! He took Mr. Bashwood by the arm, and led him away to a quieter part of the terminus than the part of it in which they had hitherto spoken to each other.

"You referred to my wife just now," he said; "and you spoke of Mrs. Armadale in the same breath. What do you mean by that?"

Again there was no answer. Utterly incapable of understanding more than that he had involved himself in some serious complication which was a complete mystery to him, Mr. Bashwood struggled to extricate himself from the grasp that was laid on him, and struggled in vain.

Midwinter sternly repeated the question. "I ask you again," he said, "what do you mean by it?"

"Nothing, Sir! I give you my word of honor I meant nothing!" He felt the hand on his arm tightening its grasp; he saw, even in the obscurity of the remote corner in which they stood, that Midwinter's fiery temper was rising and was not to be trifled with. The extremity of his danger inspired him with the one ready capacity that a timid man possesses when he is compelled by main force to face an emergency—the capacity to lie. "I only meant to say, Sir," he burst out, with a desperate effort to look and speak confidently, "that Mr. Armadale would be surprised—"

"You said Mrs. Armadale!"

"No, Sir—on my word of honor, on my sacred word of honor, you are mistaken—you are indeed! I said Mr. Armadale—how could I say any thing else? Please to let me go, Sir—I'm pressed for time. I do assure you I'm dreadfully pressed for time!"

For a moment longer Midwinter maintained his hold, and in that moment he decided what to do.

He had accurately stated his motive for returning to England as proceeding from anxiety about his wife—anxiety naturally caused (after the regular receipt of a letter from her every other, or every third day) by the sudden cessation of the correspondence between them on her side for a whole week. The first vaguely-terrible suspicion of some other reason for her silence than the reason of accident or of illness, to which he had hitherto attributed it, had struck through him like a sudden chill the instant he heard the steward associate the name of "Mrs. Armadale" with the idea of his wife. Little irregularities in her correspondence with him, which he had thus far only thought strange, now came back on his mind and proclaimed themselves to be suspicious as well. He had hitherto believed the reasons she had given for referring him, when he answered her letters, to no more definite address than an address at a post-office. Now he suspected her reasons of being excuses for the first time. He had hitherto resolved, on reaching London, to inquire at the only place he knew of at which a clew to her could be found—the address she had given him as the address at which "her mother" lived. Now (with a motive which he was afraid to define even to himself, but which was strong enough to overbear every other consideration in his mind), he determined, before all things, to solve the mystery of Mr. Bashwood's familiarity with a secret, which was a marriage-secret between himself and his wife. Any direct appeal to a man of the steward's disposition, in the steward's present state of mind, would be evidently useless. The weapon of deception was, in this case, a weapon literally forced into Midwinter's hands. He let go of Mr. Bashwood's arm and accepted Mr. Bashwood's explanation.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "I have no doubt you are right. Pray attribute my rudeness to over-anxiety and over-fatigue. I wish you good-evening."

The station was by this time almost a solitude; the passengers by the train being assembled at the examination of their luggage in the custom-house waiting-room. It was no easy matter ostensibly to take leave of Mr. Bashwood and really to keep him in view. But Midwinter's early life with his gipsy master had been of a nature to practice him in such stratagems as he was now compelled to adopt. He walked away toward the waiting-room by the line of empty carriages, opened the door of one of them as if to look after something that he had left behind, and detected Mr. Bashwood making for the cab-rank on the opposite side of the platform. In an instant Midwinter had crossed, and had passed through the long row of vehicles, so as to skirt it on the side farthest from the platform. He entered the second cab by the left-hand door the moment after Mr. Bashwood had entered the first cab by the right-hand door. "Double your fare, whatever it is," he said to the driver, "if you keep the cab before you in view, and follow it wherever it goes." In a minute more both vehicles were on their way out of the station.

The clerk sat in his sentry-box at the gate, taking down the destinations of the cabs as they passed. Midwinter heard the man who was driving him call out "Hampstead!" as he went by the clerk's window.

"Why did you say 'Hampstead?'?" he asked, when they had left the station.

"Because the man before me said 'Hampstead,' Sir," answered the driver.

Over and over again, on the wearisome journey to the northwestern suburb, Midwinter asked if the cab was still in sight. Over and over again the man answered, "Right in front of us."

It was between nine and ten o'clock when the driver pulled up his horses at last. Midwinter got out and saw the cab before them waiting at a house-door. As soon as he had satisfied himself that the driver was the man whom Mr. Bashwood had hired he paid the promised reward and dismissed his own cab.

He took a turn backward and forward before the door. The vaguely terrible suspicion which had risen in his mind at the terminus had forced itself by this time into a definite form which was abhorrent to him. Without the shadow of an assignable reason for it he found himself blindly distrusting his wife's fidelity, and blindly suspecting Mr. Bashwood of serving her in the capacity of gobetween. In sheer horror of his own morbid fancy he determined to take down the number of the house and the name of the street in which it stood; and then, in justice to his wife, to return at once to the address which she had given him as the address at which her mother lived. He had taken out his pocket-book, and was on his way to the corner of the street, when he observed the man who had driven Mr. Bashwood looking at him with an expression of inquisitive surprise. The idea of questioning the cab-driver while he had the opportunity instantly occurred to him. He took a half-crown from his pocket and put it into the man's ready hand.

"Has the gentleman whom you drove from the station gone into that house?" he asked.

"Yes, Sir."

"Did you hear him inquire for any body when the door was opened?"

"He asked for a lady, Sir—Mrs.—" The man hesitated. "It wasn't a common name, Sir; I should know it again if I heard it."

"Was it 'Midwinter?'"

"No, Sir."

"'Armadale?'"

"That's it, Sir. Mrs. Armadale."

"Are you sure it was 'Mrs.' and not 'Mr.'?"

"It is as sure as a man can be who loses; when any particular notion, Sir."

The doubt implied in that last answer decided Midwinter to investigate the matter on the spot. He ascended the house-steps. As he raised his hand to the bell at the side of the door the violence of his agitation mastered him physically for the moment. A strange sensation as of something leaping up from his heart to his brain, turned his head wildly giddy. He held by the house-railings and kept his face to the air, and resolutely waited till he was steady again. Then he rang the bell.

"Is—?" he tried to ask for "Mrs. Armadale" when the maid-servant had opened the door, but not even his resolution could force the name to pass his lips—"Is your mistress at home?" he asked.

"Yes, Sir."

The girl showed him into a back-parlor, and presented him to a little old lady with an obliging manner and a bright pair of eyes.

"There is some mistake," said Midwinter. "I wanted to see—". Once more he tried to utter the name, and once more he failed to force it to his lips.

"Mrs. Armadale?" suggested the little old lady, with a smile.

"Yes."

"Show the gentleman up stairs, James."

The girl led his way to the drawing-room floor.

"Any name, Sir?"

"No name."

Mr. Bashwood had hardly completed his report of what had happened at the terminus: Mr. Bashwood's imperious mistress was still sitting speechless under the shock of the discovery that had burst on her—when the door of the room opened, and, without a word of warning to precede him, Midwinter appeared on the threshold. He took one step into the room, and mechanically pushed the door to behind him. He stood in dead silence, and confronted his wife with a scrutiny that was terrible in its unnatural self-possession, and that enveloped her steadily in one comprehensive look from head to foot.

In dead silence on her side she rose from her chair. In dead silence she stood erect on the hearth-rug and faced her husband in widow's weeds.

He took one step nearer to her and stopped again. He lifted his hand and pointed with his lean brown finger at her dress.

"What does that mean?" he asked, without losing his terrible self-possession, and without moving his outstretched hand.

At the sound of his voice the attack rose and fell of her bosom—which had been the one outward betrayal thus far of the inner agony that tortured her—suddenly stopped. She stood immovably silent, breathlessly still as if his question had struck her dead and his pointing hand had petrified her.

He repeated one step nearer and reiterated his words, in a voice even lower and quieter than the voice in which he had spoken first.

One moment more of silence, one moment more of inaction might have been the salvation of her. But the fatal force of her character triumphed at the crisis of her destiny and his. White and still, and haggard and old, she met the dreadful emergency with a dreadful courage, and spoke the irrevocable words which renounced him to his face.

"Mr. Midwinter," she said, in tones unnaturally hard and unnaturally clear, "our acquaintance hardly entitles you to speak to me in that manner." Those were her words. She never lifted her eyes from the ground while she spoke them. When she had done, the last faint vestige of color in her cheeks faded out.

There was a pause. Still steadily looking at her he set himself to fix the language she had used to him in his mind. "She calls me 'Mr. Midwinter,'" he said, slowly, in a whisper. "She speaks of 'our acquaintance.'" He waited a little and looked round the room. His wandering eyes encountered Mr. Bashwood for the first time. He saw the steward standing near the fire-place, trembling and watching him.

"I once did you a service," he said; "and you once told me you were not an ungrateful man. Are you grateful enough to answer me if I ask you something?"

He waited a little again. Mr. Bashwood still stood trembling at the fire-place, silently watching him.

"I see you looking at me," he went on. "Is there some change in me that I am not conscious of myself? Am I seeing things that you don't see? Am I hearing words that you don't hear? Am I looking or speaking like a man out of his senses?"

Again he waited, and again the silence was unbroken. His eyes began to glitter, and the savage blood that he had inherited from his mother rose dark and slow in his ashy cheeks.

"Is that woman," he asked, "the woman whom you once knew, whose name was Miss Gwilt?"

Once more his wife collected her fatal courage. Once more his wife spoke her fatal words.

"You compel me to repeat," she said, "that you are presuming on our acquaintance, and that you are forgetting what is due to me."

He turned upon her with a savage suddenness which forced a cry of alarm from Mr. Bashwood's lips.

"Are you or are you not My Wife?" he asked through his set teeth.

She raised her eyes to his for the first time. Her lost spirit looked at him, steadily defiant, out of the hell of its own despair.

"I am not your wife," she said.

He staggered back, with his hand groping for something to hold by, like the hands of a man in the dark. He leaned heavily against the wall of the room, and looked at the woman who had slept on his bosom, and who had denied him to his face.

Mr. Bashwood stole, panic-stricken, to her side. "Go in there!" he whispered, trying to draw her toward the folding-doors which led into the next room. "For God's sake be quick! He'll kill you!"

She put the old man back with her hand. She looked at him with a sudden irradiation of her blank face. She answered him with lips that struggled slowly into a frightful smile.

"Let him kill me," she said.

As the words passed her lips he sprang forward from the wall with a cry that rang through the house. The frenzy of a maddened man flashed at her from his glassy eyes, and clutched at her in his threatening hands. He came on till he was within arm's-length of her, and suddenly stood still. The black flush died out of his face in the instant when he stopped. His eyelids fell, his outstretched hands wavered and sank helpless. He dropped as the dead drop. He lay as the dead lie, in the arms of the wife who had denied him.

She knelt on the floor and rested his head on her knee. She caught the arm of the steward hurrying to help her with a hand that closed round it like a vice. "Go for a doctor," she said, "and keep the people of the house away till he comes." There was that in her eye, there was that in her voice which would have warned any man living to obey her in silence. In silence Mr. Bashwood submitted, and hurried out of the room.

The instant she was alone she raised him from her knee. With both arms clasped round him the miserable woman lifted his lifeless face to hers, and rocked him on her bosom in an agony of tenderness beyond all relief in tears, in a passion of remorse beyond all expression in words. In silence she held him to her breast; in silence she devoured his forehead, his cheeks, his lips with kisses. Not a sound escaped her till she heard the trampling footsteps outside hurrying up the stairs. Then a low moan burst from her lips as she looked her last at him, and lowered his head again to her knee, before the strangers came in.

The landlady and the steward were the first persons whom she saw when the door was opened. The medical man (a surgeon living in the street) followed. The horror and the beauty of her face as she looked up at him absorbed the surgeon's attention for the moment, to the exclusion of every thing else. She had to beckon to him, she had to point to the senseless man, before she could claim his attention for his patient and divert it from herself.

"Is he dead?" she asked.

The surgeon carried Midwinter to the sofa, and ordered the windows to be opened. "It is a fainting fit," he said; "nothing more."

At that answer her strength failed her for the first time. She drew a deep breath of relief, and leaned on the chimney-piece for support.

Mr. Bashwood was the only person present who noticed that she was overcome. He led her to the opposite end of the room, where there was an easy-chair—leaving the landlady to hand the restoratives to the surgeon as they were wanted.

"Are you going to wait here till he recovers?" whispered the steward, looking toward the sofa, and trembling as he looked.

The question roused her to a sense of her position—to a knowledge of the merciless necessities which that position now forced her to confront. With a heavy sigh she looked toward the sofa, considered with herself for a moment, and answered Mr. Bashwood's inquiry by a question on her side.

"Is the cab that brought you here from the railway still at the door?"

"Yes."

"Drive at once to the gates of the Sanatorium, and wait there till I join you."

Mr. Bashwood hesitated. She lifted her eyes to his, and, with a look, sent him out of the room.

"The gentleman is coming to, ma'am," said the landlady, as the steward closed the door. "He has just breathed again."

She bowed in mute reply, rose, and considered with herself once more—looked toward the sofa for the second time—then passed through the folding-doors into her own room.

After a short lapse of time the surgeon drew back from the sofa, and motioned to the landlady to stand aside. The bodily recovery of the patient was assured. There was nothing to be done now but to wait, and let his mind slowly recall its sense of what had happened.

"Where is she?" were the first words he said to the surgeon and the landlady anxiously watching him.

The landlady knocked at the folding-doors, and received no answer. She went in, and found the room empty. A sheet of note-paper was on the dressing-table, with the doctor's fee placed on it. The paper contained these lines, evidently written in great agitation or in great haste: "It is impossible for me to remain here to-night after what has happened. I will return to-morrow to take away my luggage, and to pay what I owe you."

"Where is she?" Midwinter asked again, when the landlady returned alone to the drawing-room.

"Gone, Sir."

"I don't believe it!"

The old lady's color rose. "If you know her handwriting, Sir," she answered, handing him the sheet of note-paper, "perhaps you may believe this?"

He looked at the paper. "I beg your pardon, ma'am," he said, as he handed it back. "I beg your pardon, with all my heart."

There was something in his face as he spoke those words which more than soothed the old lady's irritation—it touched her with a sudden pity for the man who had offended her. "I am afraid there is some dreadful trouble, Sir, at the bottom of all this," she said, simply. "Do you wish me to give any message to the lady when she comes back?"

Midwinter rose, and steadied himself for a moment against the sofa. "I will bring my own message to-morrow," he said. "I must see her before she leaves your house."

The surgeon accompanied his patient into the street. "Can I see you home?" he said, kindly. "You had better not walk, if it is far. You mustn't over-exert yourself; you mustn't catch a chill this cold night."

Midwinter took his hand and thanked him. "I have been used to hard walking and to cold nights, Sir," he said; "and I am not easily worn out, even when I look so broken as I do now. If you will tell me the nearest way out of these streets, I think the quiet of the country and the quiet of the night will help me. I have something serious to do to-morrow," he added, in a lower tone. "and I can't rest or sleep till I have thought over it to-night."

The surgeon understood that he had no common man to deal with. He gave the necessary directions without any further remark, and parted with his patient on his own door.

Left by himself, Midwinter paused and looked up at the heaven in silence. The night had cleared, and the stars were out—the stars which he had first learned to know from his gipsy master on the hill-side. For the first time his mind went back regretfully to his boyish days. "Oh, for the old life!" he thought, longingly. "I never knew till now how happy the old life was!"

He roused himself and went on toward the open country. His face darkened as he left the streets behind him and advanced into the solitude and obscurity that lay beyond.

"She has denied her husband to-night," he said. "She shall know her master to-morrow."

CHAPTER III.

THE PURPLE FLASK.

The cab was waiting at the gates as Miss Gwilt approached the Sanatorium. Mr. Bashwood got out and advanced to meet her. She took his arm and led him aside a few steps, out of the cabman's hearing.

"Think what you like of me," she said, keeping her thick black veil down over her face, "but don't speak to me to-night. Drive back to your hotel as if nothing had happened. Meet the tidal train to-morrow as usual, and come to me afterward at the Sanatorium. Go without a word, and I shall believe there is one man in the world who really loves me. Stay and ask questions, and I shall bid you good-by at once and forever!"

She pointed to the cab. In a minute more it had left the Sanatorium and was taking Mr. Bashwood back to his hotel.

She opened the iron gate and walked slowly up to the house door. A shudder ran through her as she rang the bell. She laughed bitterly. "Shivering again?" she said to herself. "What would have thought I had so much feeling left in me?"

For once in his life the doctor's face told the truth, when the study door opened between ten and eleven at night, and Miss Gwilt entered the room.

"Mercy on me!" he exclaimed, with a look of the blindest bewilderment, "what does this mean?"

"It means," she answered, "that I have decided to-night instead of deciding to-morrow. You, who know women so well, ought to know that they act on impulse. I am here on an impulse. Take me or leave me, just as you like."

"Take you or leave you?" repeated the doctor, recovering his presence of mind. "My dear lady, what a dreadful way of putting it! Your room shall be got ready instantly! Where is your luggage? Will you let me send for it? No? You can do without your luggage to-night? What admirable fortitude! You will fetch it yourself to-morrow? What extraordinary independence! Do take off your bonnet! Do draw in to the fire! What can I offer you?"

"Offer me the strongest sleeping-draught you ever made in your life," she replied. "And leave me alone till the time comes to take it. I shall be your patient in earnest!" she added, fiercely, as the doctor attempted to remonstrate. "I shall be the maddest of the mad if you irritate me to-night!"

The Principal of the Sanatorium became gravely and briefly professional to an instant.

"Sit down in that dark corner," he said. "Not a soul shall disturb you. In half an hour you will find your room ready, and your sleeping-draught on the table. It's been a harder struggle for her than I anticipated," he thought, as he left the room and crossed to his Dispensary on the opposite side of the hall. "Good Heavens, what business has she with a conscience, after such a life as hers has been!"

The Dispensary was elaborately fitted up with all the latest improvements in medical furniture. But one of the four walls of the room was unoccupied by shelves, and here the vacant space was filled by a handsome antique cabinet of carved wood, curiously out of harmony, as an object, with the unornamented utilitarian aspect of the place generally. On either side of the cabinet two speaking-tubes were inserted in the wall, communicating with the upper regions of the house, and labeled respectively, "Resident Dispenser," and "Head Nurse." Into the second of these tubes the doctor spoke on entering the room. An elderly woman appeared, took her orders for preparing Mrs. Arncliffe's bed-chamber, courted, and retired.

Left alone again in the Dispensary, the doctor unlocked the centre compartment of the cabinet, and disclosed a collection of bottles inside, containing the various poisons used in medicine. After taking out the laudanum wanted for the sleeping-draught, and placing it on the dispensary-table, he went back to the cabinet—looked into it for a little while—shook his head doubtfully—and crossed to the open shelves on the opposite side of the room. Here, after more consideration, he took down one out of the row of large chemical bottles before him, filled with a yellow liquid: placing the bottle on the table, he returned to the cabinet, and opened a side compartment, containing some specimens of Bohemian glass-work. After measuring it with his eye, he took from the specimens a handsome purple flask, high and narrow in form, and closed by a glass stopper. This he filled with the yellow liquid, leaving a small quantity only at the bottom of the bottle, and locking up the flask again in the place from which he had taken it. The bottle was next restored to its place, after having been filled up with water from the cistern in the Dispensary, mixed with certain chemical liquids in small quantities, which restored it (so far as appearances went) to the condition in which it had been when it was first removed from the shelf. Having completed these mysterious proceedings, the doctor laughed softly, and went back to his speaking-tubes to summon the Resident Dispenser next.

The Resident Dispenser made his appearance shrouded in the necessary white apron from his waist to his feet. The doctor solemnly wrote a prescription for a composing draught and handed it to his assistant.

"Wanted immediately, Benjamin," he said, in a soft and melancholy voice. "A lady-patient—Mrs. Armadale, room No. 1, Second floor. Ah, dear, dear!" groaned the doctor, absently; "an anxious case, Benjamin—an anxious case." He opened the bran-new ledger of the establishment and entered the Case at full length, with a brief abstract of the prescription. "Have you done with the laudanum? Put it back, and lock the cabinet, and give me the key. Is the draught ready? Label it 'to be taken at bedtime,' and give it to the nurse, Benjamin—give it to the nurse."

While the doctor's lips were issuing these directions, the doctor's hands were occupied in opening a drawer under the desk on which the ledger was placed. He took out some gayly-printed cards of admission "to view the Sanatorium between the hours of two and four P.M.," and filled them up with the date of the next day, "December tenth." When a dozen of the cards had been wrapped up in a dozen lithographed letters of invitation, and inclosed in a dozen envelopes, he next consulted a list of the families resident in the neighborhood and directed the envelopes from the list. Ringing a bell this time, instead of speaking through a tube, he summoned the man-servant and gave him the letters, to be delivered by hand the first thing the next morning. "I think it will do," said the doctor, taking a turn in the Dispensary when the servant had gone out; "I think it will do." While he was still absorbed in his own reflections the nurse reappeared to announce that the lady's room was ready; and the doctor thereupon formally returned to the study to communicate the information to Miss Gwilt.

She had not moved since he left her. She rose from her dark corner when he made his announcement, and, without speaking or raising her veil, glided out of the room like a ghost.

After a brief interval the nurse came down stairs again with a word for her master's private ear.

"The lady has ordered me to call her to-morrow at seven o'clock, Sir," she said. "She means to fetch her luggage herself, and she wants to have a cab at the door as soon as she is dressed. What am I to do?"

"Do what the lady tells you," said the doctor. "She may be safely trusted to return to the Sanatorium."

The breakfast hour at the Sanatorium was half past eight o'clock. By that time Miss Gwilt had settled every thing at her lodging, and had returned with her luggage in her own possession. The doctor was quite amazed at the promptitude of his patient.

"Why waste so much energy?" he asked, when they met at the breakfast-table. "Why be in such a hurry, my dear lady, when you had all the morning before you?"

"More restlessness!" she said, briefly. "The longer I live the more impatient I get."

The doctor, who had noticed before she spoke that her face looked strangely pale and old that morning, observed when she answered him that her expression—naturally mobile in no ordinary degree—remained quite unaltered by the effort of speaking. There was none of the usual animation on her lips, none of the usual temper in her eyes. He had never seen her so impenetrably and coldly composed as he saw her now. "She has made up her mind at last," he thought. "I may say to her this morning what I couldn't say to her last night."

He prefaced the coming remarks by a warning look at her widow's dress.

"Now you have got your luggage," he began, gravely, "permit me to suggest putting that cap away and wearing another gown."

"Why?"

"Do you remember what you told me a day or two since?" asked the doctor. "You said there was a chance of Mr. Armadale's dying in my Sanatorium?"

"I will say it again if you like."

"A more unlikely chance," pursued the doctor, deaf as ever to all awkward interruptions, "it is hardly possible to imagine! But as long as it is a chance at all it is worth considering. Say then that he dies—dies suddenly and unexpectedly, and makes a Coroner's Inquest necessary in the house. What is our course in that case? Our course is to preserve the characters to which we have committed ourselves—you as his widow, and I as the witness of your marriage—and, in those characters, to court the fullest inquiry. In the entirely improbable event of his dying just when we want him to die, my idea—I might even say, my resolution—is, to admit that we knew of his resurrection from the sea, and to acknowledge that we instructed Mr. Bashwood to entrap him into this house by means of a false statement about Miss Milroy. When the inevitable questions follow I propose to assert that he exhibited symptoms of mental alienation shortly after your marriage—that his delusion consisted in denying that you were his wife, and in declaring that he was engaged to be married to Miss Milroy—that you were in such terror of him on this account, when you heard he was alive and coming back, as to be in a state of nervous agitation that required my care—that at your request, and to calm that nervous agitation, I saw him professionally, and got him quietly into the house by a humoring of his delusion perfectly justifiable in such a case—and lastly, that I can certify his brain to have been affected by one of those mysterious disorders, eminently incurable, eminently fatal, in relation to which medical science is still in the dark. Such a course as this (in the remotely possible event which we are now supposing) would be, in your interests and mine, unquestionably the right course to take—and such a dress as this is, just as certainly, under existing circumstances, the wrong dress to wear."

"Shall I take it off at once?" she asked, rising from the breakfast-table, without a word of remark on what had just been said to her.

"Any time before two o'clock to-day will do," said the doctor.

She looked at him with a languid curiosity—nothing more. "Why before two?" she inquired.

"Because this is one of my 'Visitors' Days.' And the Visitors' time is from two to four."

"What have I to do with your visitors?"

"Simply this. I think it important that perfectly respectable and perfectly disinterested witnesses should see you in my house in the character of a lady who has come to consult me."

"Your motive seems rather far-fetched. Is it the only motive you have in the matter?"

"My dear, dear lady!" remonstrated the doctor, "have I any concealments from you? Surely you ought to know me better than that?"

"Yes," she said, with a weary contempt. "It's dull enough of me not to understand you by this time.—Send word up stairs when I am wanted." She left him, and went back to her room.

Two o'clock came; and in a quarter of an hour afterward the Visitors had arrived. Short as the notice had been, cheerless as the Sanatorium looked to spectators from without, the doctor's invitations had been largely accepted nevertheless by the female members of the families whom he had addressed. In the miserable monotony of the lives led by a large section of the middle classes of England, any thing is welcome to the women which offers them any sort of harmless refuge from the established tyranny of the principle that all human happiness begins and ends at home. While the imperious needs of a commercial country limited the representatives of the male sex, among the doctor's visitors, to one feeble old man and one sleepy little boy, the women, poor souls, to the number of no less than sixteen—old and young, married and single—had seized the golden opportunity of a plunge into public life. Harmoniously united by the two common objects which they all had in view—in the first place, to look at each other, and in the second place to look at the Sanatorium—they streamed in neatly-dressed procession through the doctor's dreary iron gates, with a thin varnish over them of assumed superiority to all unlady-like excitement, most significant and most pitiable to see!

The proprietor of the Sanatorium received his visitors in the hall with Miss Gwilt on his arm. The hungry eyes of every woman in the company overlooked the doctor as if no such person had existed, and fixing on the strange lady, devoured her from head to foot in an instant.

"My First Inmate," said the doctor, presenting Miss Gwilt. "This lady only arrived late last night; and she takes the present opportunity (the only one my morning's engagements have allowed me to give her) of going over the Sanatorium.—Allow me, ma'am," he went on, releasing Miss Gwilt, and giving his arm to the eldest lady among the visitors. "Shattered nerves—domestic anxiety," he whispered, confidentially. "Sweet woman! sad case!" He sighed softly, and led the old lady across the hall.

The flock of visitors followed, Miss Gwilt accompanying them in silence, and walking alone—among them, but not of them—the last of all.

"The grounds, ladies and gentlemen," said the doctor, wheeling round and addressing his audience from the foot of the stairs, "are, as you have seen, in a partially unfinished condition. Under any circumstances I should lay little stress on the grounds, having Hampstead Heath so near at hand, and carriage-exercise and horse-exercise being parts of my System. In a lesser degree it is also necessary for me to ask your indulgence for the basement floor, on which we now stand. The waiting-room and study on that side, and the Dispensary on the other (to which I shall presently ask your attention) are completed. But the large drawing-room is still in the decorator's hands. In that room (when the walls are dry—not a moment before) my inmates will assemble for cheerful society. Nothing will be spared that can improve, elevate, and adorn life at these happy little gatherings. Every evening, for example, there will be music for those who like it."

At this point there was a faint stir among the visitors. A mother of a family interrupted the doctor. She begged to know whether music "every evening" included Sunday evening; and, if so, what music was performed?

"Sacred music, of course, ma'am," said the doctor. "Handel on Sunday evening—and Haydn occasionally, when not too cheerful. But, as I was about to say, music is not the only entertainment offered to my nervous inmates. Amusing reading is provided for those who prefer books."

There was another stir among visitors. Another mother of a family wished to know whether amusing reading meant novels.

"Only such novels as I have selected and perused myself in the first instance," said the doctor. "Nothing painful, ma'am! There may be plenty that is painful in real life—but for that very reason we don't want it in books. The English novelist who enters my house (no foreign novelist will be admitted) must understand his art as the healthy-minded English reader understands it in our time. He must know that our purer modern taste, our higher modern morality, limits him to doing exactly two things for us when he writes us a book. All we want of him is—occasionally to make us laugh; and invariably to make us comfortable."

There was a third stir among the visitors—caused plainly this time by approval of the sentiments which they had just heard. The doctor, wisely cautious of disturbing the favorable impression that he had produced, dropped the subject of the drawing-room, and led the way up stairs. As before, the company followed—and, as before, Miss Gwilt walked silently behind them, last of all. One after another the ladies looked at her with the idea of speaking, and saw something in her face, utterly unintelligible to them, which checked the well-meant words on their lips. The prevalent impression was, that the Principal of the Sanatorium had been delicately concealing the truth, and that his first inmate was mad.

The doctor led the way—with intervals of breathing-time accorded to the old lady on his arm—straight to the top of the house. Having collected his visitors in the corridor, and having waved his hand indicatively at the numbered doors opening out of it on either side, he invited the company to look into any or all of the rooms at their own pleasure.

"Nos. 1 to 4, ladies and gentlemen," said the doctor, "include the dormitories of the attendants. Nos. 4 to 8 are rooms intended for the accommodation of the poorer class of patients, whom I receive on terms which simply cover my expenditure—nothing more. In the cases of these poorer persons among my suffering fellow-creatures, personal piety and the recommendation of two clergymen are indispensable to admission. Those are the only conditions I make; but those I insist on. Pray observe that the rooms are all ventilated, and the bedsteads all iron; and kindly notice as we descend again to the second floor, that there is a door shutting off all communication between the second story and the top story, when necessary. The rooms on the second floor, which we have now reached, are (with the exception of my own room) entirely devoted to the reception of lady inmates—experience having convinced me that the greater sensitiveness of the female constitution necessitates the higher position of the sleeping apartment, with a view to the greater purity and freer circulation of the air. Here the ladies are established immediately under my care, while my assistant-physician (whom I expect to arrive in a week's time) looks after the gentlemen on the floor beneath. Observe, again—as we descend to this lower, or first floor—a second door, closing all communication at night between the two stories to every one but the assistant-physician and myself. And now that we have reached the gentlemen's part of the house, and that you have observed for yourselves the regulations of the establishment, permit me to introduce you to a specimen of my system of treatment next. I can exemplify it practically by introducing you to a room fitted up, under my own directions, for the accommodation of the most complicated cases of nervous suffering and nervous delusion that can come under my care."

He threw open the door of a room at one extremity of the corridor, numbered 4. "Look in, ladies and gentlemen," he said; "and if you see any thing remarkable pray mention it."

The room was not very large, but it was well lit by one broad window. Comfortably furnished as a bedroom, it was only remarkable among other rooms of the same sort in one way. It had no fire-place. The visitors having noticed this, were informed that the room was warmed in winter by means of hot-water; and were then invited back again into the corridor, to make the discoveries, under professional direction, which they were unable to make for themselves.

"A word, ladies and gentlemen," said the doctor; "literally a word, on nervous derangement first. What is the process of treatment when, let us say, mental anxiety has broken you down, and you apply to your doctor? He sees you, hears you, and gives you two prescriptions. One is written on paper, and made up at the chemist's. The other is administered by word of mouth, at the propitious moment when the fee is ready; and consists in a general recommendation to you to keep your mind easy. That excellent advice given, your doctor leaves you to spare yourself all earthly annoyances by your own unaided efforts until he calls again. Here my System steps in and helps you! When I see the necessity of keeping your mind easy, I take the bull by the horns and do it for you. I place you in a sphere of action in which the ten thousand trifles which must, and do, irritate nervous people at home, are expressly considered and provided against. I throw up impregnable moral intrenchments between Worry and You. Find a door banging in this house if you can! Catch a servant in this house rattling the tea-things when he takes away the tray! Discover barking dogs, crowing cocks, hammering workmen, screeching children here—and I engage to close My Sanatorium to-morrow! Are these nuisances laughing matters to nervous people? Ask them! Can they escape these nuisances at home? Ask them! Will ten minutes' irritation from a barking dog or a screeching child undo every atom of good done to a nervous sufferer by a month's medical treatment? There isn't a competent doctor in England who will venture to deny it! On those plain grounds my System is based. I assert the medical treatment of nervous suffering to be entirely subsidiary to the moral treatment of it. That moral treatment of it you find here. That moral treatment sedulously pursued throughout the day, follows the sufferer into his room at night, and soothes, helps, and cures him, without his own knowledge—you shall see how."

The doctor paused to take breath, and looked for the first time since the visitors had entered the house at Miss Gwilt. For the first time, on her side, she stepped forward among the audience and looked at him in return. After a momentary obstruction in the shape of a cough, the doctor went on:

"Say, ladies and gentlemen," he proceeded, "that my patient has just come in. His mind is one mass of nervous fancies and caprices, which his friends (with the best possible intentions) have been ignorantly irritating at home. They have been afraid of him, for instance, at night. They have forced him to have somebody to sleep in the room with him, or they have forbidden him, in case of accidents, to lock his door. He comes to me the first night, and says, 'Mind, I won't have any body in my room!'—'Certainly not!'—'I insist on locking my door!'—'By all means!' In he goes, and locks his door; and there he is, soothed and quieted, predisposed to confidence, predisposed to sleep, by having his own way. 'This is all very well,' you may say; 'but suppose something happens—suppose he has a fit in the night, what then?' You shall see! Hullo, my young friend!" cried the doctor, suddenly addressing the sleepy little boy. "Let's have a game. You shall be the poor sick man, and I'll be the good doctor. Go into that room and lock the door. There's a brave boy! Have you locked it? Very good. Do you think I can't get at you if I like? I wait till you're asleep—I press this little white button, hidden here in the stenciled pattern of the outer wall—the mortice of the lock inside falls back silently against the door-post—and I walk into the room whenever I like. The same plan is pursued with the window. My capricious patient won't open it at night, when he ought. I humor him again. 'Shut it, dear Sir, by all means!' As soon as he is asleep I pull the black handle hidden here, in the corner of the wall. The window of the room inside noiselessly opens, as you see. Say the patient's caprice is the other way—he persists in opening the window when he ought to shut it. Let him! by all means let him! I pull a second handle when he is snug in his bed, and the window noiselessly closes in a moment. Nothing to irritate him, ladies and gentlemen—absolutely nothing to irritate him! But I haven't done with him yet. Epidemic disease, in spite of all my precautions, may enter this Sanatorium, and may render the purifying of the sick-room necessary. Or the patient's case may be complicated by other than nervous malady—say, for instance, asthmatic difficulty of breathing. In the one case, fumigation is necessary; in the other, additional oxygen in the air will give relief. The epidemic nervous patient says, 'I won't be smoked under my own nose!' The asthmatic nervous patient gasps with terror at the idea of a chemical explosion in his room. I noiselessly fumigate one of them; I noiselessly oxygenize the other, by means of a simple Apparatus fixed outside in the corner here. It is protected by this wooden casing; it is locked with my own key, and it communicates by means of a tube with the interior of the room. Look at it!"

With a preliminary glance at Miss Gwilt, the doctor unlocked the lid of the wooden casing, and disclosed inside nothing more remarkable than a large stone jar, having a glass funnel, and a pipe communicating with the wall, inserted in the cork which closed the mouth of it. With another look at Miss Gwilt the doctor locked the lid again, and asked in the blandest manner whether his System was intelligible now?

"I might introduce you to all sorts of other contrivances of the same kind," he resumed, leading the way down stairs, "but it would be only the same thing over and over again. A nervous patient who always has his own way is a nervous patient who is never worried—and a nervous patient who is never worried is a nervous patient cured. There it is in a nut-shell! Come and see the Dispensary, ladies; the Dispensary and the kitchen next!"

Once more Miss Gwilt dropped behind the visitors, and waited alone—looking steadfastly at the Room which the doctor had opened, and at the Apparatus which the doctor had unlocked. Again, without a word passing between them, she had understood him. She knew as well as if he had confessed it, that he was craftily putting the necessary temptation in her way, before witnesses who could speak to the superficially-innocent act, which they had seen, if any thing serious happened. The Apparatus, originally constructed to serve the purpose of the doctor's medical crotchets, was evidently to be put to some other use, of which the doctor himself had probably never dreamed till now. And the chances were that before the day was over that other use would be privately revealed to her at the right moment, in the presence of the right witness. "Armada will die this time," she said to herself as she went slowly down the stairs. "The doctor will kill him by my hands."

The visitors were in the Dispensary when she joined them. All the ladies were admiring the beauty of the antique cabinet; and, as a necessary consequence, all the ladies were desirous of seeing what was inside. The doctor—after a preliminary look at Miss Gwilt—good-humoredly shook his head. "There is nothing to interest you inside," he said. "Nothing but rows of little shabby bottles containing the poisons used in medicine which I keep under lock and key. Come to the kitchen, ladies, and honor me with your advice on domestic matters below stairs." He glanced again at Miss Gwilt as the company crossed the hall, with a look which said plainly, "Wait here."

In another quarter of an hour the doctor had expounded his views on cookery and diet, and the visitors (duly furnished with prospectuses) were taking leave of him at the door. "Quite an intellectual treat!" they said to each other, as they streamed out again in neatly-dressed procession through the iron gates. "And what a very superior man!"

The doctor turned back to the Dispensary, humming absently to himself, and failing entirely to observe the corner of the hall in which Miss Gwilt stood retired. After an instant's hesitation she followed him. The assistant was in the room when she entered it—summoned by his employer the moment before.

"Doctor," she said, coldly and mechanically, as if she was repeating a lesson, "I am as curious as the other ladies about that pretty cabinet of yours. Now they are all gone won't you show the inside of it to me?"

The doctor laughed in his pleasantest manner.

"The old story," he said. "Blue-Beard's locked chamber, and female curiosity! (Don't go, Benjamin, don't go.) My dear lady, what interest can you possibly have in looking at a medical bottle, simply because it happens to be a bottle of poison?"

She repeated her lesson for the second time.

"I have the interest of looking at it," she said, "and of thinking if it got into some people's hands, of the terrible things it might do."

The doctor glanced at his assistant with a compassionate smile.

"Curious, Benjamin," he said; "the romantic view taken of these drugs of ours by the unscientific mind. My dear lady," he added, turning again to Miss Gwilt, "if that is the interest you attach to looking at poisons, you needn't ask me to unlock my cabinet—you need only look about you round the shelves of this room. There are all sorts of medical liquids and substances in those bottles—most innocent, most useful in themselves—which, in combination with other substances and other liquids, become poisons as terrible and as deadly as any that I have in my cabinet under lock and key."

She looked at him for a moment, and crossed to the opposite side of the room.

"Show me one," she said.

Still smiling as good-humoredly as ever, the doctor humored his nervous patient. He pointed to the bottle from which he had privately removed the yellow liquid on the previous day, and which he had filled up again with a carefully-colored imitation, in the shape of a mixture of his own.

"Do you see that bottle?" he said; "that plump, round, comfortable looking bottle? Never mind the name of what is inside it; let us stick to the bottle, and distinguish it, if you like, by giving it a name of our own. Suppose we call it 'our Stout Friend!' Very good. Our Stout Friend, by himself, is a most harmless and useful medicine. He is freely dispensed every day to tens of thousands of patients all over the civilized world. He has made no romantic appearances in courts of law; he has excited no breathless interest in romances; he has played no terrifying part on the stage. There he is, an innocent, inoffensive creature, who troubles nobody with the responsibility of locking him up! But bring him into contact with something else—introduce him to the acquaintance of a certain common mineral Substance, of a universally accessible kind, broken into fragments; provide yourself with (say) six doses of our Stout Friend, and pour those doses consecutively on the fragments I have mentioned, at intervals of not less than five minutes. Quantities of little bubbles will rise at every pouring; collect the gas in those bubbles, and convey it into a closed chamber—and let Samson himself be in that closed chamber, our Stout Friend will kill him in half an hour! Will kill him slowly, without his seeing any thing, without his smelling any thing, without his feeling any thing but sleepiness. Will kill him and tell the whole College of Surgeons nothing, if they examine him after death, but that he died of apoplexy or congestion of the lungs! What do you think of that, my dear lady, in the way of mystery and romance? Is our harmless Stout Friend as interesting now as if he rejoiced in the terrible popular fame of the Arsenic and the Strychnine which I keep locked up there? Don't suppose I am exaggerating! Don't suppose I'm inventing a story to put you off with, as the children say. Ask Benjamin, there," said the doctor, appealing to his assistant, with his eyes fixed on Miss Gwilt. "Ask Benjamin," he repeated, with the steadiest emphasis on the next words, "if six doses from that bottle, at intervals of five minutes each, would not, under the conditions I have stated, produce the results I have described?"

The Resident Dispenser, modestly admiring Miss Gwilt at a distance, started and colored up. He was plainly gratified by the little attention which had included him in the conversation.

"The doctor is quite right, ma'am," he said, addressing Miss Gwilt, with his best bow, "the production of the gas, extended over half an hour, would be quite gradual enough. And," added the Dispenser, silently appealing to his employer to let him exhibit a little chemical knowledge on his own account, "the volume of the gas would be sufficient at the end of the time—if I am not mistaken, Sir?—to be fatal to any person entering the room in less than five minutes."

"Unquestionably, Benjamin," rejoined the doctor. "But I think we have had enough of chemistry for the present," he added, turning to Miss Gwilt. "With every desire, my dear lady, to gratify every passing wish you may form, I venture to propose trying a more cheerful subject. Suppose we leave the Dispensary, before it suggests any more inquiries to that active mind of yours? No? You want to see an experiment? You want to see how the little bubbles are made? Well, well! there is no harm in that. We will let Mrs. Armadale see the bubbles," continued the Doctor, in the tone of a parent humoring a spoiled child. "Try if you can find a few of those fragments that we want, Benjamin. I dare say the workmen (slovenly fellows!) have left something of the sort about the house or the grounds."

As soon as his back was turned the doctor began opening and shutting drawers in various parts of the Dispensary, with the air of a man who wants something in a hurry, and doesn't know where to find it. "Bless my soul!" he exclaimed, suddenly stopping at the drawer from which he had taken his cards of invitation on the previous day, "what's this? A key? A duplicate key, as I'm alive, of my Fumigating Apparatus up stairs! Oh dear, dear, how careless I get!" said the doctor, turning round briskly to Miss Gwilt. "I hadn't the least idea that I possessed this second key. I should never have missed it. I do assure you I should never have missed it, if any body had taken it out of the drawer!" He bustled away to the other end of the room—without closing the drawer, and without taking away the duplicate key.

In silence Miss Gwilt listened till he had done. In silence she glided to the drawer. In silence she took the key and hid it in her apron pocket.

The Dispenser came back, with the fragments required of him, collected in a basin. "Thank you, Benjamin," said the doctor. "Kindly cover them with water, while I get the bottle down."

As accidents sometimes happen in the most perfectly regulated families, so clumsiness sometimes possesses itself of the most perfectly disciplined hands. In the process of its transfer from the shelf to the doctor the bottle slipped, and fell smashed to pieces on the floor.

"Oh, my fingers and thumbs!" cried the doctor, with an air of comic vexation, "what in the world do you mean by playing me such a wicked trick as that? Well, well, well—it can't be helped. Have we got any more of it, Benjamin?"

"Not a drop, Sir."

"Not a drop!" echoed the doctor. "My dear Madam, what excuses can I offer you? My clumsiness has made our little experiment impossible for to-day. Remind me to order some more to-morrow, Benjamin—and don't think of troubling yourself to put that mess to rights. I'll send the man here to mop it all up. Our Stout Friend is harmless enough now, my dear lady—in combination with a boarded floor and a coming mop! I'm so sorry; I really am so sorry to have disappointed you." With those soothing words he offered his arm, and led Miss Gwilt out of the dispensary.

"Have you done with me for the present?" she asked, when they were in the hall.

"Oh dear, dear, what a way of putting it!" exclaimed the doctor. "Dinner at six," he added, with his politest emphasis, as she turned from him in disdainful silence and slowly mounted the stairs to her own room.

A clock of the noiseless sort—incapable of offending irritable nerves—was fixed in the wall, above the first-floor landing, at the Sanatorium. At the moment when the hands pointed to a quarter before six, the silence of the lonely upper regions was softly broken by the rustling of Miss Gwilt's dress. She advanced along the corridor of the first floor—paused at the covered Apparatus fixed outside the room numbered 4—listened for a moment—and then unlocked the cover with the duplicate key.

The open lid cast a shadow over the inside of the casing. All she saw at first was what she had seen already—the jar, and the pipe and glass funnel inserted in the cork. She removed the funnel; and, looking about her, observed on the window-sill close by a wax-tipped wand used for lighting the gas. She took the wand, and, introducing it through the aperture occupied by the funnel, moved it to and fro in the jar. The faint splash of some liquid, and the grating noise of certain hard substances which she was stirring about, were the two sounds that caught her ear. She drew out the wand, and cautiously touched the wet left on it with the tip of her tongue. Caution was quite needless in this case. The liquid was—water.

In putting the funnel back in its place she noticed something faintly shining in the obscurely-lit vacant space at the side of the jar. She drew it out, and produced a Purple Flask. The liquid with which it was filled showed dark through the transparent coloring of the glass; and, fastened at regular intervals down one side of the Flask, were six thin strips of paper which divided the contents into six equal parts.

There was no doubt now that the Apparatus had been secretly prepared for her—the Apparatus of which she alone (besides the doctor) possessed the key.

She put back the Flask, and locked the cover of the casing. For a moment she stood looking at it with the key in her hand. On a sudden her lost color came back. On a sudden its natural animation returned, for the first time that day, to her face. She turned and hurried breathlessly up stairs to her room on the second floor. With eager hands she snatched her cloak out of the wardrobe and took her bonnet from the box. "I'm not in prison!" she burst out, impetuously. "I've got the use of my limbs! I can go—no matter where, as long as I am out of this house!"

With her cloak on her shoulders, with her bonnet in her hand, she crossed the room to the door. A moment more—and she would have been out in the passage. In that moment the remembrance flashed back on her of the husband whom she had denied to his face. She stopped instantly, and threw the cloak and bonnet from her on the bed. “No!” she said; “the gulf is dug between us—the worst is done!”

There was a knock at the door. The doctor’s voice outside politely reminded her that it was six o’clock.

She opened the door and stopped him on his way down stairs.

“What time is the train due to-night?” she asked, in a whisper.

“At ten,” answered the doctor, in a voice which all the world might hear and welcome.

“What room is Mr. Armadale to have when he comes?”

“What room would you like him to have?”

“No. 4.”

The doctor kept up appearances to the very last.

“No. 4 let it be,” he said, graciously. “Provided, of course, that No. 4 is unoccupied at the time.”

* * * * *

The evening wore on, and the night came.

At a few minutes before ten Mr. Bashwood was again at his post; once more on the watch for the coming of the tidal train.

The inspector on duty, who knew him by sight, and who had personally ascertained that his regular attendance at the terminus implied no designs on the purses and portmanteaus of the passengers, noticed two new circumstances in connection with Mr. Bashwood that night. In the first place, instead of exhibiting his customary cheerfulness, he looked anxious and depressed. In the second place, while he was watching for the train, he was to all appearance being watched in his turn by a slim, dark, undersized man, who had left his luggage (marked with the name of Midwinter) at the custom-house department the evening before, and who had returned to have it examined about half an hour since.

What had brought Midwinter to the terminus? and why was he, too, waiting for the tidal train?

After straying as far as Hendon during his lonely walk of the previous night he had taken refuge at the village inn, and had fallen asleep (from sheer exhaustion) toward those later hours of the morning, which were the hours that his wife’s foresight had turned to account. When he returned to the lodging the landlady could only inform him that her tenant had settled every thing with her, and had left (for what destination neither she nor her servant could tell) more than two hours since.

Having given some little time to inquiries, the result of which convinced him that the clew was lost so far, Midwinter had quitted the house, and had pursued his way mechanically to the busier and more central parts of the metropolis. With the light now thrown on his wife’s character, to call at the address she had given him as the address at which her mother lived would be plainly useless. He went on through the streets, resolute to discover her, and trying vainly to see the means to his end, till the sense of fatigue forced itself on him once more. Stopping to rest and recruit his strength at the first hotel he came to, a chance dispute between the waiter and a stranger about a lost portmanteau reminded him of his own luggage, left at the terminus, and instantly took his mind back to the circumstances under which he and Mr. Bashwood had met. In a moment more the idea that he had been vainly seeking on his way through the streets flashed on him. In a moment more he had determined to try the chance of finding the steward again on the watch for the person whose arrival he had evidently expected by the previous evening’s train.

Ignorant of the report of Allan’s death at sea; uninformed, at the terrible interview with his wife, of the purpose which her assumption of a widow’s dress really had in view, Midwinter’s first vague suspicions of her fidelity had now inevitably developed into the conviction that she was false. He could place but one interpretation on her open disavowal of him, and on her taking the name under which he had secretly married her. Her conduct forced the conclusion on him that she was engaged in some infamous intrigue; and that she had basely secured herself beforehand in the position of all others in which she knew it would be most odious and most repellent to him to claim his authority over her. With that conviction he was now watching Mr. Bashwood, firmly persuaded that his wife’s hiding-place was known to the vile servant of his wife’s vices—and darkly suspecting, as the time wore on, that the unknown man who had wronged him, and the unknown traveler for whose arrival the steward was waiting, were one and the same.

The train was late that night, and the carriages were more than usually crowded when they arrived at last. Midwinter became involved in the confusion on the platform, and in the effort to extricate himself he lost sight of Mr. Bashwood for the first time.

A lapse of some few minutes had passed before he again discovered the steward talking eagerly to a man in a loose shaggy coat, whose back was turned toward him. Forgetful of all the cautions and restraints which he had imposed on himself before the train appeared, Midwinter instantly advanced on them. Mr. Bashwood saw his threatening face as he came on and fell back in silence. The man in the loose coat turned to look where the steward was looking and disclosed to Midwinter, in the full light of the station-lamp, Allan’s face!

For the moment they both stood speechless, hand in hand, looking at each other. Allan was the first to recover himself.

“Thank God for this!” he said, fervently. “I don’t ask how you came here—it’s enough for me that you have come. Miserable news has met me already, Midwinter. Nobody but you can comfort me and help me to bear it." His voice faltered over those last words, and he said no more.

The tone in which he had spoken roused Midwinter to meet the circumstances as they were by appealing to the old grateful interest in his friend which had once been the foremost interest of his life. He mastered his personal misery for the first time since it had fallen on him, and gently taking Allan aside, asked what had happened.

The answer—after informing him of his friend's reported death at sea—announced (on Mr. Bashwood's authority) that the news had reached Miss Milroy, and that the deplorable result of the shock thus inflicted had obliged the major to place his daughter in the neighborhood of London under medical care.

Before saying a word on his side Midwinter looked distrustfully behind him. Mr. Bashwood had followed them. Mr. Bashwood was watching to see what they did next.

"Was he waiting your arrival here to tell you this about Miss Milroy?" asked Midwinter, looking back again from the steward to Allan.

"Yes," said Allan. "He has been kindly waiting here, night after night, to meet me and break the news to me."

Midwinter paused once more. The attempt to reconcile the conclusion he had drawn from his wife's conduct with the discovery that Allan was the man for whose arrival Mr. Bashwood had been waiting was hopeless. The one present chance of discovering a truer solution of the mystery was to press the steward on the one available point in which he had laid himself open to attack. He had positively denied on the previous evening that he knew any thing of Allan's movements, or that he had any interest in Allan's return to England. Having detected Mr. Bashwood in one lie told to himself, Midwinter instantly suspected him of telling another to Allan. He seized the opportunity of sifting the statement about Miss Milroy on the spot.

"How have you become acquainted with this sad news?" he inquired, turning suddenly on Mr. Bashwood.

"Through the major, of course," said Allan, before the steward could answer.

"Who is the doctor who has the care of Miss Milroy?" persisted Midwinter, still addressing Mr. Bashwood.

For the second time the steward made no reply. For the second time Allan answered for him:

"He is a man with a foreign name," said Allan. "He keeps a Sanatorium near Hampstead. What did you say the place was called, Mr. Bashwood?"

"Fairweather Vale, Sir," said the steward, answering his employer as a matter of necessity, but answering very unwillingly.

The address of the Sanatorium instantly reminded Midwinter that he had traced his wife to Fairweather Vale Villas the previous night.

He began to see light through the darkness, dimly, for the first time. The instinct which comes with emergency, before the slower process of reason can assert itself, brought him at a leap to the conclusion that Mr. Bashwood—who had been certainly acting under his wife's influence the previous day—might be acting again under his wife's influence now. He persisted in sifting the steward's statement, with the conviction growing firmer and firmer in his mind that the statement was a lie, and that his wife was concerned in it.

"Is the major in Norfolk?" he asked, "or is he near his daughter in London?"

"In Norfolk," said Mr. Bashwood. Having answered Allan's look of inquiry, instead of Midwinter's spoken question, in those words, he hesitated, looked Midwinter in the face for the first time, and added, suddenly, "I object, if you please, to be cross-examined, Sir. I know what I have told Mr. Armadale, and I know no more."

The words, and the voice in which they were spoken, were alike at variance with Mr. Bashwood's usual language and Mr. Bashwood's usual tone. There was a sullen depression in his face—there was a furtive distrust and dislike in his eyes when they looked at Midwinter, which Midwinter himself now noticed for the first time. Before he could answer the steward's extraordinary outbreak, Allan interfered.

"Don't think me impatient," he said. "But it's getting late; it's a long way to Hampstead. I'm afraid the Sanatorium will be shut up."

Midwinter started. "You are not going to the Sanatorium to-night!" he exclaimed.

Allan took his friend's hand and wrung it hard. "If you were as fond of her as I am," he whispered, "you would take no rest, you could get no sleep, till you had seen the doctor, and heard the best and the worst he had to tell you. Poor dear little soul! who knows, if she could only see me alive and well—" The tears came into his eyes, and he turned away his head in silence.

Midwinter looked at the steward. "Stand back," he said. "I want to speak to Mr. Armadale." There was something in his eye which it was not safe to trifle with. Mr. Bashwood drew back out of hearing, but not out of sight. Midwinter laid his hand fondly on his friend's shoulder.

"Allan," he said, "I have reasons—" He stopped. Could the reasons be given before he had fairly realized them himself; at that time, too, and under those circumstances? Impossible! "I have reasons," he resumed, "for advising you not to believe too readily what Mr. Bashwood may say. Don't tell him this, but take the warning."

Allan looked at his friend in astonishment. "It was you who always liked Mr. Bashwood!" he exclaimed. "It was you who trusted him, when he first came to the great house!"

"Perhaps I was wrong, Allan, and perhaps you were right. Will you only wait till we can telegraph to Major Milroy and get his answer? Will you only wait over the night?"

"I shall go mad if I wait over the night," said Allan. "You have made me more anxious than I was before. If I am not to speak about it to Bashwood, I must and will go to the Sanatorium, and find out whether she is or is not there from the doctor himself."

Midwinter saw that it was useless. In Allan's interests there was only one other course left to take. "Will you let me go with you?" he asked.

Allan's face brightened for the first time. "You dear, good fellow!" he exclaimed. "It was the very thing I was going to beg of you myself."

Midwinter beckoned to the steward. "Mr. Armadale is going to the Sanatorium," he said, "and I mean to accompany him. Get a cab and come with us."

He waited to see whether Mr. Bashwood would comply. Having been strictly ordered, when Allan did arrive, not to lose sight of him, and having, in his own interests, Midwinter's unexpected appearance to explain to Miss Gwilt, the steward had no choice but to comply. In sullen submission he did as he had been told. The keys of Allan's baggage were given to the foreign traveling servant whom he had brought with him, and the man was instructed to wait his master's orders at the terminus hotel. In a minute more the cab was on its way out of the station—with Midwinter and Allan inside, and with Mr. Bashwood by the driver on the box.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock that night Miss Gwilt, standing alone at the window which lit the corridor of the Sanatorium on the second floor, heard the roll of wheels coming toward her. The sound, gathering rapidly in volume through the silence of the lonely neighborhood, stopped at the iron gates. In another minute she saw the cab draw up beneath her, at the house door.

The earlier night had been cloudy, but the sky was clearing now, and the moon was out. She opened the window to see and hear more clearly. By the light of the moon she saw Allan get out of the cab and turn round to speak to some other person inside. The answering voice told her, before he appeared in his turn, that Armadale's companion was her husband.

The same petrifying influence that had fallen on her at the interview with him of the previous day fell on her now. She stood by the window, white and still, and haggard and old—as she had stood when she first faced him in her widow's weeds.

Mr. Bashwood, stealing up alone to the second floor to make his report, knew, the instant he set eyes on her, that the report was needless. "It's not my fault," was all he said, as she slowly turned her head and looked at him. "They met together, and there was no parting them."

She drew a long breath and motioned him to be silent. "Wait a little," she said; "I know all about it."

Turning from him at those words she slowly paced the corridor to its furthest end; turned, and slowly came back to him with frowning brow and drooping head—with all the grace and beauty gone from her but the inbred grace and beauty in the movement of her limbs.

"Do you wish to speak to me?" she asked, her mind far away from him, and her eyes looking at him vacantly as she put the question.

He roused his courage as he had never roused it in her presence yet.

"Don't drive me to despair!" he cried, with a startling abruptness. "Don't look at me in that way, now I have found it out!"

"What have you found out?" she asked, with a momentary surprise in her face, which faded from it again before he could gather breath enough to go on.

"Mr. Armadale is not the man who took you away from me," he answered. "Mr. Midwinter is the man. I found it out in your face yesterday. I see it in your face now. Why did you sign your name 'Armadale' when you wrote to me? Why do you call yourself 'Mrs. Armadale' still?"

He spoke those bold words at long intervals, with an effort to resist her influence over him pitiable and terrible to see.

She looked at him for the first time with softened eyes. "I wish I had pitied you when we first met," she said, gently, "as I pity you now."

He struggled desperately to go on and say the words to her which he had strung himself to the pitch of saying on the drive from the terminus. They were words which hinted darkly at his knowledge of her past life; words which warned her—do what else she might, commit what crimes she pleased—to think twice before she deceived and deserted him again. In those terms he had vowed to himself to address her. He had the phrases picked and chosen; he had the sentences ranged and ordered in his mind; nothing was wanting but to make the one crowning effort of speaking them; and even now, after all he had said and all he had dared, the effort was more than he could compass. In helpless gratitude, even for so little as her pity, he stood looking at her, and wept the silent, womanish tears that fall from old men's eyes.

She took his hand and spoke to him—with marked forbearance, but without the slightest sign of emotion on her side.

"You have waited already at my request," she said. "Wait till to-morrow, and you will know all. If you trust nothing else that I have told you, you may trust what I tell you now. It will end to-night."

As she said the words the doctor's step was heard on the stairs. Mr. Bashwood drew back from her, with his heart beating fast in unutterable expectation. "It will end to-night!" he repeated to himself, under his breath, as he moved away toward the far end of the corridor.

"Don't let me disturb you, Sir," said the doctor, cheerfully, as they met. "I have nothing to say to Mrs. Armadale but what you or my body may hear."

Mr. Bashwood went on, without answering, to the far end of the corridor, still repeating to himself, "It will end to-night!" The doctor, passing him in the opposite direction, joined Miss Gwilt.

"You have heard, no doubt," he began, in his blandest manner and his roundest tones, "that Mr. Armadale has arrived. Permit me to add, my dear lady, that there is not the least reason for any nervous agitation on your part. He has been carefully humored, and he is as quiet and manageable as his best friends could wish. I have informed him that it is impossible to allow him an interview with the young lady to-night, but that he may count on seeing her (with the proper precautions) at the earliest propitious hour after she is awake to-morrow morning. As there is no hotel near, and as the propitious hour may occur at a moment's notice, it was clearly incumbent on me, under the peculiar circumstances, to offer him the hospitality of the Sanatorium. He has accepted it with the utmost gratitude; and has thanked me in a most gentlemanly and touching manner for the pains I have taken to set his mind at ease. Perfectly gratifying, perfectly satisfactory so far. But there has been a little hitch—now happily got over—which I think it right to mention to you before we all retire for the night."

His eye passed the way in those words (and in Mr. Bashwood's hearing) for the statement which he had previously announced his intention of making in the event of Alice's dying in the Sanatorium, the doctor was about to proceed, when his attention was attracted by a sound below like the trying of a door.

He instantly descended the stairs and unlocked the door of communication between the first and second floors, which he had locked behind him on his way up. But the person who had tried the door—if such a person there really had been—was too quick for him. He looked along the corridor, and over the staircase into the hall, and, discovering nothing, returned to Miss Gwilt, after securing the door of communication behind him once more.

"Pardon me," he resumed; "I thought I heard something down stairs. With regard to the little hitch that I adverted to just now, permit me to inform you that Mr. Armadale has brought a friend here with him, who bears the strange name of Midwinter. Do you know the gentleman at all?" asked the doctor, with a suspicious anxiety in his eyes which strangely belied the elaborate indifference of his tone.

"I know him to be an old friend of Mr. Armadale's," she said. "Does he—?" Her voice failed her, and her eyes fell before the doctor's steady scrutiny. She mastered the momentary weakness, and finished her question. "Does he, too, stay here to-night?"

"Mr. Midwinter is a person of coarse manners and suspicious temper," repeated the doctor, steadily watching her. "He was rude enough to insist on staying here as soon as Mr. Armadale had accepted my invitation."

He paused to note the effect of those words on her. Left utterly in the dark by the caution with which she had avoided mentioning her husband's assumed name to him at their first interview, the doctor's distrust of her was consequently of the vaguest kind. He had heard her police tell her—he had seen her color change. He suspected her of a mental reservation on the subject of Midwinter—and of nothing more.

"Did you permit him to leave his way?" she asked. "In your place I should have shoved him the door."

The impenetrable composure of her tone warned the doctor that her self-command was not to be further shaken that night. He reversed the chamber of Mr. Armadale's medical referee on the subject of Mr. Armadale's mental health.

"If I had only had my own feelings to consult," he said, "I don't suppose from you that I should (as you say) have shoved Mr. Midwinter the door." But on appealing to Mr. Armadale, he found he was himself compassed not to be parted from his friend. Under these circumstances but one alternative was left, the advisability of humoring him again. The expediency of shewing him—as very nothing!—aided the doctor, drifting for the moment toward the truth. "Of my natural apprehension, with such a temper as his friend's, of a mental and dangerous in the house—was not to be thought of for a moment. Mr. Midwinter absolutely insists here for the night; and compels! I ought to say, insists on occupying the next room to Mr. Armadale. Allow me, my dear Madam, in this emergency," concluded the doctor, with his loudest emphasis,—"What means shall we put them in, on the first floor?"

"Put Mr. Armadale in No. 1."

"And his friend next to him, in No. 2?" said the doctor. "Well, well! Well! perhaps they are the most comfortable means. I'll give my orders immediately. Don't hurry away, Mr. Bashwood," he called out, cheerfully, as he reached the top of the staircase. "I have left the assistance-phreasia; try on the window—yonder, and Mrs. Armadale can let you out at the staircase-door whenever she pleases. Don't sit up late, Mrs. Armadale! Yours is a nervous system that requires plenty of sleep. 'Tired nature's sweetest restorer, balmy sleep.' Good night! Good these rooms—good night!"

Mr. Bashwood came back from the far end of the corridor—still pondering, in anathematical expectation, on what was to come with the night.

"Am I to go now?" he asked.

"No. You are to stay. I said you should know all if you waited till the morning. Wait here."

He hesitated and looked about him. "The doctor," he muttered. "I thought the doctor said—"

"The doctor will interfere with nothing that I do in this house to-night. I tell you to stay. There are empty rooms on the floor above this. Take one of them."

Mr. Bashwood felt the trembling fit coming on him again as he looked at her. "May I ask—?" he began.

"Ask nothing. I want you."

"Will you please to tell me—?"

"I will tell you nothing till the night is over and the morning has come."

His curiosity conquered his fear. He persisted.

"Is it something dreadful?" he whispered.

"Too dreadful to tell me?"

She stamped her foot with a sudden outbreak of impatience. "Go!" she said, snatching the key of the staircase-door from the window-sill. "You do quite right to distrust me—you do quite right to follow me no farther in the dark. Go before the house is shut up. I can do without you." She led the way to the stairs, with the key in one hand and the candle in the other.

Mr. Bashwood followed her in silence. No one, knowing what he knew of her earlier life, could have failed to perceive that she was a woman driven to the last extremity, and standing consciously on the brink of a Crime. In the first terror of the discovery he broke free from the hold she had on him—he thought and acted like a man who had a will of his own again.

She put the key in the door and turned to him before she opened it with the light of the candle on her face. "Forget me and forgive me," she said. "We meet no more."

She opened the door, and, standing inside it, after he had passed her gave him her hand. He had resisted her look, he had resisted her words, but the magnetic fascination of her touch conquered him at the final moment. "I can't leave you!" he said, holding helplessly by the hand she had given him. "What must I do?"

"Come and see," she answered, without allowing him an instant to reflect.

Closing her hand firmly on his she led him along the first-floor corridor to the room numbered 4. "Notice that room," she whispered. After a look over the stairs to see that they were alone, she retraced her steps with him to the opposite extremity of the corridor. Here, facing the window which lit the place at the other end, was one little room, with a narrow grating in the higher part of the door, intended for the sleeping apartment of the doctor's deputy. From the position of this room the grating commanded a view of the bedchambers down each side of the corridor, and so enabled the deputy-physician to inform himself of any irregular proceedings on the part of the patients under his care, with little or no chance of being detected himself. Miss Gwilt opened the door and led the way into the empty room.

"Wait here," she said, "while I go back up stairs, and lock yourself in, if you like. You will be in the dark, but the gas will be burning in the corridor. Keep at the grating and make sure that Mr. Armadale goes into the room I have just pointed out to you, and that he doesn't leave it afterward. If you lose sight of the room for a single moment before I come back you will repent it to the end of your life. If you do as I tell you you shall see me to-morrow and claim your own reward. Quick with your answer! Is it Yes or No?"

He could make no reply in words. He raised her hand to his lips and kissed it rapturously. She left him in the room. From his place at the grating he saw her glide down the corridor to the staircase-door. She passed through it and locked it. Then there was silence.

The next sound was the sound of the women-servants' voices. Two of them came up to put the sheets on the beds in No. 3 and No. 4. The women were in high good-humor, laughing and talking to each other through the open doors of the rooms. The master's customers were coming in at last, they said, with a vengeance; the house would soon begin to look cheerful, if things went on like this.

After a little the beds were got ready, and the women returned to the kitchen-floor, on which the sleeping-rooms of the domestic servants were all situated. Then there was silence again.

The next sound was the sound of the doctor's voice. He appeared at the end of the corridor, showing Allan and Midwinter the way to their rooms. They all went together into No. 4. After a little the doctor came out first. He waited till Midwinter joined him, and pointed with a formal bow to the door of No. 3. Midwinter entered the room without speaking and shut himself in. The doctor, left alone, withdrew to the staircase-door and unlocked it—then waited in the corridor, whistling to himself softly, under his breath.

Voices pitched cautiously low became audible in a minute more in the hall. The Resident Dispenser and the Head Nurse appeared on their way to the Dormitories of the Attendants at the top of the house. The man bowed silently and passed the doctor; the woman courtesied silently and followed the man. The doctor acknowledged their salutations by a courteous wave of his hand; and once more left alone, paused a moment, still whistling softly to himself—then walked to the door of No. 4, and opened the case of the fumigating apparatus fixed near it in the corner of the wall. As he lifted the lid and looked in his whistling ceased. He took a long purple bottle out, examined it by the gas-light, put it back, and closed the case. This done, he advanced on tip-toe to the open staircase-door, passed through it, and secured it on the inner side as usual.

Mr. Bashwood had seen him at the apparatus; Mr. Bashwood had noticed the manner of his withdrawal through the staircase-door. Again the sense of an unutterable expectation throbbed at his heart. A terror that was slow and cold and deadly crept into his hands, and guided them in the dark to the key that had been left for him in the inner side of the door. He turned it in vague distrust of what might happen next, and waited.

The slow minutes passed and nothing happened. The silence was horrible; the solitude of the lonely corridor was a solitude of invisible treacheries. He began to count to keep his mind employed—to keep his own growing dread away from him. The numbers, as he whispered them, followed each other slowly up to a hundred, and still nothing happened. He had begun the second hundred; he had got on to twenty—when, without a sound to betray that he had been moving in his room, Midwinter suddenly appeared in the corridor.

He stood for a moment and listened; he went to the stairs and looked over into the hall beneath. Then, for the second time that night, he tried the staircase-door, and for the second time found it fast. After a moment's reflection he tried the doors of the bedrooms on his right hand next, looked into one after the other, and saw that they were empty, then came to the door of the end room in which the steward was concealed. Here again the lock resisted him. He listened, and looked up at the grating. No sound was to be heard; no light was to be seen inside. "Shall I break the door in," he said to himself, "and make sure? No; it would be giving the doctor an excuse for turning me out of the house." He moved away and looked into the two empty rooms in the row occupied by Allan and himself, then walked to the window at the staircase end of the corridor. Here the case of the fumigating apparatus attracted his attention. After trying vainly to open it his suspicion seemed to be aroused. He searched back along the corridor, and observed that no object of a similar kind appeared outside any of the other bedchambers. Again at the window, he looked again at the apparatus, and turned away from it with a gesture which plainly indicated that he had tried, and failed, to guess what it might be.

Baffled at all points, he still showed no sign of returning to his bedchamber. He stood at the window, with his eyes fixed on the door of Allan's room, thinking. If Mr. Bashwood, furtively watching him through the grating, could have seen him at that moment in the mind as well as in the body, Mr. Bashwood's heart might have throbbed even faster than it was throbbing now, in expectation of the next event which Midwinter's decision of the next minute was to bring forth.

On what was his mind occupied as he stood alone at the dead of night in the strange house?

His mind was occupied in drawing its disconnected impressions together, little by little, to one point. Convinced, from the first, that some hidden danger threatened Allan in the Sanatorium, his distrust—vaguely associated thus far with the place itself; with his wife (whom he firmly believed to be now under the same roof with him); with the doctor, who was as plainly in her confidence as Mr. Bashwood himself—now narrowed its range, and centred itself obstinately in Allan's room. Resigning all further effort to connect his suspicion of a conspiracy against his friend, with the outrage which had the day before been offered to himself—an effort which would have led him, if he could have maintained it, to a discovery of the fraud really contemplated by his wife—his mind, clouded and confused by disturbing influences, instinctively took refuge in its impressions of facts as they had shown themselves, since he had entered the house. Every thing that he had noticed below stairs suggested that there was some secret purpose to be answered by getting them to sleep in the Sanatorium. Every thing that he had noticed above stairs associated the lurking-place in which the danger lay hid with Allan's room. To reach this conclusion, and to decide on baffling the conspiracy, whatever it might be, by taking Allan's place, was with Midwinter the work of an instant. Confronted by actual peril the great nature of the man intuitively freed itself from the weaknesses that had beset it in happier and safer times. Not even the shadow of the old superstition rested on his mind now—no fatalist suspicion of himself disturbed the steady resolution that was in him. The one last doubt that troubled him, as he stood at the window thinking, was the doubt whether he could persuade Allan to change rooms with him, without involving himself in an explanation which might lead Allan to suspect the truth.

In the minute that elapsed, while he waited with his eyes on the room, the doubt was resolved—he found the trivial yet sufficient excuse of which he was in search. Mr. Bashwood saw him rouse himself, and go to the door. Mr. Bashwood heard him knock softly, and whisper, "Allan, are you in bed?"

"No," answered the voice inside, "come in."

He appeared to be on the point of entering the room when he checked himself as if he had suddenly remembered something. "Wait a minute," he said, through the door, and, turning away, went straight to the end room. "If there is any body watching us in there," he said, aloud, "let him watch us through this!" He took out his handkerchief and stuffed it into the wires of the grating so as completely to close the aperture. Having thus forced the spy inside (if there was one) either to betray himself by moving the handkerchief, or to remain blinded to all view of what might happen next, Midwinter presented himself in Allan's room.

"You know what poor nerves I have," he said, "and what a wretched sleeper I am at the best of times. I can't sleep to-night. The window in my room rattles every time the wind blows. I wish it was as fast as your window here."

"My dear fellow!" cried Allan, "I don't mind a rattling window. Let's change rooms. Nonsense! Why should you make excuses to me? Don't I know how easily trifles upset those excitable nerves of yours? Now the doctor has quieted my mind about my poor little Nellie, I begin to feel the journey—and I'll answer for sleeping any where till to-morrow comes." He took up his traveling-bag. "We must be quick about it," he added, pointing to his candle. "They haven't left me much candle to go to bed by."

"Be very quiet, Allan," said Midwinter, opening the door for him. "We mustn't disturb the house at this time of night."

"Yes, yes," returned Allan, in a whisper. "Good-night—I hope you'll sleep as well as I shall."

Midwinter saw him into No. 3, and noticed that his own candle (which he had left there) was as short as Allan's. "Good-night," he said, and came out again into the corridor.

He went straight to the grating, and looked and listened once more. The handkerchief remained exactly as he had left it, and still there was no sound to be heard within. He returned slowly along the corridor, and thought of the precautions he had taken for the last time. Was there no other way than the way he was trying now? There was none. Any openly-avowed posture of defense—while the nature of the danger, and the quarter from which it might come, were alike unknown—would be useless in itself, and worse than useless in the consequences which it might produce by putting the people of the house on their guard. Without a fact that could justify to other minds his distrust of what might happen with the night; incapable of shaking Allan's ready faith in the fair outside which the doctor had presented to him, the one safeguard in his friend's interests that Midwinter could set up was the safeguard of changing the rooms—the one policy he could follow, come what might of it, was the policy of waiting for events. "I can trust to one thing," he said to himself, as he looked for the last time up and down the corridor—"I can trust myself to keep awake."

After a glance at the clock on the wall opposite he went into No. 4. The sound of the closing door was heard, the sound of the turning lock followed it. Then the dead silence fell over the house once more.

Little by little the steward's horror of the stillness and the darkness overcame his dread of moving the handkerchief. He cautiously drew aside one corner of it—waited—looked—and took courage at last to draw the whole handkerchief through the wires of the grating. After first hiding it in his pocket, he thought of the consequences if it was found on him, and threw it down in a corner of the room. He trembled when he had cast it from him, as he looked at his watch and placed himself again at the grating to wait for Miss Gwilt.

It was a quarter to one. The moon had come round from the side to the front of the Sanatorium. From time to time her light gleamed on the window of the corridor, when the gaps in the flying clouds let it through. The wind had risen, and sung its mournful song faintly, as it swept at intervals over the desert ground in front of the house.

The minute-hand of the clock traveled on half-way round the circle of the dial. As it touched the quarter past one Miss Gwilt stepped noiselessly into the corridor. "Let yourself out," she whispered through the grating, "and follow me." She returned to the stairs by which she had just descended; pushed the door to softly after Mr. Bashwood had followed her; and led the way up to the landing of the second floor. There she put the question to him which she had not ventured to put below stairs:

"Was Mr. Armadale shown into No. 4?" she asked.

He bowed his head without speaking.

"Answer me in words. Has Mr. Armadale left the room since?"

He answered, "No."

"Have you never lost sight of No. 4 since I left you?"

He answered, "Never."

Something strange in his manner, something unfamiliar in his voice, as he made that last reply, attracted her attention. She took her candle from a table near, on which she had left it, and threw its light on him. His eyes were staring, his teeth chattered. There was every thing to betray him to her as a terrified man—there was nothing to tell her that the terror was caused by his consciousness of deceiving her, for the first time in his life, to her face. If she had threatened him less openly; if she had spoken less unreservedly of the interview which was to reward him in the morning, he might have owned the truth. As it was, his strongest fears and his dearest hopes were alike interested in telling her the fatal lie that he had now told—the fatal lie which he reiterated when she put her question for the second time.

She looked at him, deceived by the last man on earth whom she would have suspected of deception—the man whom she had deceived herself.

"You seem to be over-excited," she said, quietly. "The night has been too much for you. Go up stairs and rest. You will find the door of one of the rooms left open. That is the room you are to occupy. Good-night."

She put the candle (which she had left burning for him) on the table, and gave him her hand. He held her back by it desperately as she turned to leave him. His horror of what might happen when she was left by herself forced the words to his lips which he would have feared to speak to her at any other time.

"Don't," he pleaded in a whisper; "oh, don't, don't, don't go down stairs to-night!"

She released her hand, and signed to him to take the candle. "You shall see me to-morrow," she said. "Not a word more now!"

Her stronger will conquered him at that last moment, as it had conquered him throughout. He took the candle and waited—following her eagerly with his eyes as she descended the stairs. The cold of the December night seemed to have found its way to her through the warmth of the house. She had put on a long, heavy black shawl, and had fastened it close over her breast. The plated coronet in which she wore her hair seemed to have weighed too heavily on her head. She had untwisted it, and thrown it back over her shoulders. The old man looked at her flowing hair, as it lay red over the black shawl—at her supple, long-fingered hand, as it slid down the balusters—at the smooth, seductive grace of every movement that took her farther and farther away from him. "The night will go quickly," he said to himself as she passed from his view; "I shall dream of her till the morning comes!"

She locked the staircase-door after she had passed through it—listened, and satisfied herself that nothing was stirring—then went on slowly along the corridor to the window. Leaning on the window-sill she looked out at the night. The clouds were over the moon at that moment; nothing was to be seen through the darkness but the scattered gaslights in the suburb. Turning from the window she looked at the clock. It was twenty minutes past one.

For the last time the resolution that had come to her in the earlier night, with the knowledge that her husband was in the house, forced itself uppermost in her mind. For the last time the voice within her said, "Think if there is no other way!"

She pondered over it till the minute-hand of the clock pointed to the half hour. "No!" she said, still thinking of her husband. "The one chance left is to go through with it to the end. He will leave the thing undone which he has come here to do; he will leave the words unspoken which he has come here to say—when he knows that the act may make me a public scandal, and that the words may send me to the scaffold!" Her color rose, and she smiled with a terrible irony as she looked for the first time at the door of the Room. "I shall be your widow," she said, "in half an hour!"

She opened the case of the apparatus, and took the Purple Flask in her hand. After marking the time by a glance at the clock she dropped into the glass funnel the first of the six separate Pourings that were measured for her by the paper slips.

When she had put the Flask back she listened at the mouth of the funnel. Not a sound reached her ear: the deadly process did its work in the silence of death itself. When she rose and looked up the moon was shining in at the window, and the moaning wind was quiet.

Oh, the time! the time! If it could only have been begun and ended with the first Pouring!

She went down stairs into the hall—she walked to and fro, and listened at the open door that led to the kitchen stairs. She came up again; she went down again. The first of the intervals of five minutes was endless. The time stood still. The suspense was maddening.

The interval passed. As she took the Flask for the second time and dropped in the second Pouring the clouds floated over the moon, and the night-view through the window slowly darkened.

The restlessness that had driven her up and down the stairs, and backward and forward in the hall, left her as suddenly as it had come. She waited through the second interval, leaning on the window-sill, and staring, without conscious thought of any kind, into the black night. The howling of a belated dog was borne toward her on the wind at intervals from some distant part of the suburb. She found herself following the faint sound as it died away into silence with a dull attention, and listening for its coming again with an expectation that was duller still. Her arms lay like lead on the window-sill; her forehead rested against the glass without feeling the cold. It was not till the moon struggled out again that she was startled into sudden self-remembrance. She turned quickly, and looked at the clock; seven minutes had passed since the second Pouring.

As she snatched up the Flask, and fed the funnel for the third time, the full consciousness of her position came back to her. The fever-beat throbbed again in her blood, and flushed fiercely in her cheeks. Swift, smooth, and noiseless, she paced from end to end of the corridor, with her arms folded in her shawl, and her eye moment after moment on the clock.

Three out of the next five minutes passed, and again the suspense began to madden her. The space in the corridor grew too confined for the illimitable restlessness that possessed her limbs. She went down into the hall again, and circled round and round it like a wild creature in a cage. At the third turn she felt something moving softly against her dress. The house-cat had come up through the open kitchen-door—a large, tawny, companionable cat that purred in high good temper, and followed her for company. She took the animal up in her arms—it rubbed its sleek head luxuriously against her chin as she bent her face over it. "Armadales hates cats," she whispered in the creature's ear; "come up and see Armadales killed!" The next moment her own frightful fancy horrified her. She dropped the cat with a shudder; she drove it below again with threatening hands. For a moment after she stood still—then, in headlong haste, suddenly mounted the stairs. Her husband had forced his way back again into her thoughts; her husband threatened her with a danger which had never entered her mind till now. What if he were not asleep? What if he came out upon her and found her with the Purple Flask in her hand?

She stole to the door of No. 3, and listened. The slow, regular breathing of a sleeping man was just audible. After waiting a moment to let the feeling of relief quiet her she took a step toward No. 4, and checked herself. It was needless to listen at that door. The doctor had told her that Sleep came first, as certainly as Death afterward, in the poisoned air. She looked aside at the clock. The time had come for the fourth Pouring.

Her hand began to tremble violently as she fed the funnel for the fourth time. The fear of her husband was back again in her heart. What if some noise disturbed him before the sixth Pouring? What if he woke on a sudden (as she had often seen him wake) without any noise at all?

She looked up and down the corridor. The end room, in which Mr. Bashwood had been concealed, offered itself to her as a place of refuge. "I might go in there!" she thought. "Has he left the key?" She opened the door to look, and saw the handkerchief thrown down on the floor. Was it Mr. Bashwood's handkerchief, left there by accident? She examined it at the corners. In the second corner she found her husband's name!

Her first impulse hurried her to the staircase-door to rouse the steward and insist on an explanation. The next moment she remembered the Purple Flask, and the danger of leaving the corridor. She turned and looked at the door of No. 3. Her husband, on the evidence of the handkerchief, had unquestionably been out of his room—and Mr. Bashwood had not told her. Was he in his room now? In the violence of her agitation, as the question passed through her mind, she forgot the discovery which she had herself made not a minute before. Again she listened at the door; again she heard the slow regular breathing of the sleeping man. The first time, the evidence of her ears had been enough to quiet her. This time, in the tenfold aggravation of her suspicion and her alarm, she was determined to have the evidence of her eyes as well. "All the doors open softly in this house," she said to herself; "there's no fear of my waking him." Noiselessly, by an inch at a time, she opened the unlocked door, and looked in the moment the aperture was wide enough. In the little light she had let into the room the sleeper's head was just visible on the pillow. Was it quite as dark against the white pillow as her husband's head looked when he was in bed? Was the breathing as light as her husband's breathing when he was asleep?

She opened the door more widely, and looked in by the clearer light.

There lay the man whose life she had attempted for the third time, peacefully sleeping in the room that had been given to her husband, and in the air that could harm nobody!

The inevitable conclusion overwhelmed her on the instant. With a frantic upward action of her hands she staggered back into the passage. The door of Allan's room fell to—but not noisily enough to wake him. She turned as she heard it close. For one moment she stood staring at it like a woman stupefied. The next, her instinct rushed into action before her reason recovered itself. In two steps she was at the door of No. 4.

The door was locked.

She felt over the wall with both hands, wildly and clumsily, for the button which she had seen the doctor press, when he was showing the room to the visitors. Twice she missed it. The third time her eyes helped her hands—she found the button and pressed on it. The mortice of the lock inside fell back, and the door yielded to her.

Without an instant's hesitation she entered the room. Though the door was open—though so short a time had elapsed since the fourth Pouring that but little more than half the contemplated volume of gas had been produced as yet—the poisoned air seized her, like the grasp of a hand at her throat, like the twisting of a wire round her head. She found him on the floor at the foot of the bed—his head and one arm were toward the door as if he had risen under the first feeling of drowsiness, and had sunk in the effort to leave the room. With the desperate concentration of strength of which women are capable in emergencies she lifted him and dragged him out into the corridor. Her brain reeled as she laid him down and crawled back on her knees to the room, to shut out the poisoned air from pursuing them into the passage. After closing the door she waited, without daring to look at him the while, for strength enough to rise and get to the window over the stairs. When the window was opened, when the keen air of the early winter morning blew steadily in, she ventured back to him and raised his head, and looked for the first time closely at his face.

Was it death that spread the livid pallor over his forehead and his cheeks, and the dull leaden hue on his eyelids and his lips?

She loosened his cravat and opened his waistcoat, and bared his throat and breast to the air. With her hand on his heart, with her bosom supporting his head so that he fronted the window, she waited the event. A time passed: a time short enough to be reckoned by minutes on the clock; and yet long enough to take her memory back over all her married life with him—long enough to mature the resolution that now rose in her mind as the one result that could come of the retrospect. As her eyes rested on him a strange composure settled slowly on her face. She bore the look of a woman who was equally resigned to welcome the chance of his recovery or to accept the certainty of his death.

Not a cry or a tear had escaped her yet. Not a cry or a tear escaped her when the interval had passed, and she felt the first faint fluttering of his heart, and heard the first faint catching of the breath at his lips. She silently bent over him and kissed his forehead. When she looked up again the hard despair had melted from her face. There was something softly radiant in her eyes, which lit her whole countenance as with an inner light, and made her womanly and lovely once more.

She laid him down, and, taking off her shawl, made a pillow of it to support his head. "It might have been hard, love," she said, as she felt the faint pulsation strengthening at his heart. "You have made it easy now."

She rose, and, turning from him, noticed the Purple Flask in the place where she had left it since the fourth Pouring. "Ah!" she thought, quietly, "I had forgotten my best friend—I had forgotten that there is more to pour in yet."

With a steady hand, with a calm, attentive face, she fed the funnel for the fifth time. "Five minutes more," she said, when she had put the Flask back, after a look at the clock.

She fell into thought—thought that only deepened the grave and gentle composure of her face. "Shall I write him a farewell word?" she asked herself. "Shall I tell him the truth before I leave him forever?"

Her little gold pencil-case hung with the other toys at her watch-chain. After looking about her for a moment, she knelt over her husband, and put her hand into the breast-pocket of his coat.

His pocket-book was there. Some papers fell from it as she unfastened the clasp. One of them was the letter which had come to him from Mr. Brock's death-bed. She turned over the two sheets of note-paper on which the rector had written the words that had now come true—and found the last page of the last sheet a blank. On that page she wrote her farewell words, kneeling at her husband's side.

"I am worse than the worst you can think of me. You have saved Armadale by changing rooms with him to-night—and you have saved him from Me. You can guess now whose widow I should have claimed to be if you had not preserved his life; and you will know what a wretch you married when you married the woman who writes these lines. Still, I had some innocent moments—and then I loved you dearly. Forget me, my darling, in the love of a better woman than I am. I might, perhaps, have been that better woman myself if I had not lived a miserable life before you met with me. It matters little now. The one atonement I can make for all the wrong I have done you is the atonement of my death. It is not hard for me to die now I know you will live. Even my wickedness has one merit—it has not prospered. I have never been a happy woman."

She folded the letter again and put it into his hand, to attract his attention in that way when he came to himself again. As she gently closed his fingers on the paper and looked up, the last minute of the last interval faced her, recorded on the clock.

She bent over him and gave him her farewell kiss.

"Live, my angel, live!" she murmured tenderly, with her lips just touching his. "All your life is before you—a happy life, and an honored life, if you are freed from me!"

With a last, lingering tenderness she parted the hair back from his forehead. "It is no merit to have loved you," she said. "You are one of the men whom women all like." She sighed and left him. It was her last weakness. She bent her head affirmatively to the clock, as if it had been a living creature speaking to her—and fed the funnel for the last time, to the last drop left in the Flask.

The waning moon shone in faintly at the window. With her hand on the door of the room she turned and looked at the light that was slowly fading out of the murky sky.

"Oh, God, forgive me!" she said. "Oh, Christ, bear witness that I have suffered!"

One moment more she lingered on the threshold; lingered for her last look in this world—and turned that look on him.

"Good-by!" she said, softly.

The door of the room opened—and closed on her—there was an interval of silence.

Then a sound came dull and sudden, like the sound of a fall.

Then there was silence again.

The hands of the clock, following their steady course, reckoned the minutes of the morning as one by one they lapsed away. It was the tenth minute since the door of the room had opened and closed before Midwinter stirred on his pillow, and, struggling to raise himself, felt the letter in his hand.

At the same moment a key was turned in the staircase-door. And the doctor, looking expectantly toward the fatal room, saw the Purple Flask on the window-sill, and the prostrate man trying to raise himself from the floor.

THE END OF THE LAST BOOK.

EPILOGUE.

CHAPTER I.

NEWS FROM NORFOLK.

From Mr. Pedgijt, Senior (Thorpe-Ambrose), to Mr. Pedgijt, Junior (Paris).

High Street, December 20.

"MY DEAR AUGUSTUS.—Your letter reached me yesterday. You seem to be making the most of your youth (as you call it) with a vengeance. Well! enjoy your holiday. I made the most of my youth when I was your age; and, wonderful to relate, I haven't forgotten it yet!

"You ask me for a good budget of news, and especially for more information about that mysterious business at the Sanatorium.

"Curiosity, my dear boy, is a quality which (in our profession especially) sometimes leads to great results. I doubt, however, if you will find it leading to much on this occasion. All I know of the mystery at the Sanatorium I know from Mr. Armadale; and he is entirely in the dark on more than one point of importance. I have already told you how they were entrapped into the house, and how they passed the night there. To this I can now add that something did certainly happen to Mr. Midwinter, which deprived him of consciousness; and that the doctor, who appears to have been mixed up in the matter, carried things with a high hand, and insisted on taking his own course in his own Sanatorium. There is not the least doubt that the miserable woman (however she might have come by her death) was found dead—that a coroner's inquest inquired into the circumstances—that the evidence showed her to have entered the house as a patient—and that the medical investigation ended in discovering that she died of apoplexy. My idea is, that Mr. Midwinter had a motive of his own for not coming forward with the evidence that he might have given. I have also reason to suspect that Mr. Armadale, out of regard for him, followed his lead, and that the verdict at the inquest (attaching no blame to any body), proceeded, like many other verdicts of the same kind, from an entirely superficial investigation of the circumstances.

"The key to the whole mystery is to be found, I firmly believe, in that wretched woman's attempt to personate the character of Mr. Armadale's widow, when the news of his death appeared in the papers. But what first set her on this, and by what inconceivable process of deception, she can have induced Mr. Midwinter to marry her (as the certificate proves), under Mr. Armadale's name, is more than Mr. Armadale himself knows. The point was not touched at the inquest, for the simple reason that the inquest only concerned itself with the circumstances attending her death. Mr. Armadale, at his friend's request, saw Miss Blanchard, and induced her to silence old Darch on the subject of the claim that had been made relating to the widow's income. As the claim had never been admitted, even our stiff-necked brother practitioner consented for once to do as he was asked. The doctor's statement that his patient was the widow of a gentleman named Armadale was accordingly left unchallenged, and so the matter has been hushed up. She is buried in the great cemetery, near the place where she died. Nobody but Mr. Midwinter and Mr. Armadale (who insisted on going with him) followed her to the grave; and nothing has been inscribed on the tombstone but the initial letter of her Christian name and the date of her death. So, after all the harm she has done, she rests at last—and so the two men whom she has injured have forgiven her.

"Is there more to say on this subject before we leave it? On referring to your letter I find you have raised one other point, which may be worth a moment's notice.

"You ask if there is reason to suppose that the doctor comes out of the matter with hands which are really as clean as they look? My dear Augustus, I believe the doctor to have been at the bottom of more of this mischief than we shall ever find out; and to have profited by the self-imposed silence of Mr. Midwinter and Mr. Armadale, as rogues perpetually profit by the misfortunes and necessities of honest men. It is an ascertained fact that he connived at the false statement about Miss Milroy, which entrapped the two gentlemen into his house—and that one circumstance (after my Old Bailey experience) is enough for me. As to evidence against him, there is not a jot—and as to Retribution overtaking him, I can only say I heartily hope Retribution may prove in the long-run to be the more cunning customer of the two. There is not much prospect of it at present. The doctor's friends and admirers are, I understand, about to present him with a Testimonial, 'expressive of their sympathy under the sad occurrence which has thrown a cloud over the opening of his Sanatorium, and of their undiminished confidence in his integrity and ability as a medical man.' We live, Augustus, in an age eminently favorable to the growth of all roguery which is careful enough to keep up appearances. In this enlightened nineteenth century, I look upon the doctor as one of our rising men.

"To turn now to pleasanter subjects than Sanatoriums, I may tell you that Miss Nellie is as good as well again, and is, in my humble opinion, prettier than ever. She is staying in London, under the care of a female relative—and Mr. Armadale satisfies her of the fact of his existence (in case she should forget it) regularly every day. They are to be married in the spring—unless Mrs. Milroy's death causes the ceremony to be postponed. The medical men are of opinion that the poor lady is sinking at last. It may be a question of weeks or a question of months—they can say no more. She is greatly altered—quiet and gentle, and anxiously affectionate with her husband and her child. But in her case this happy change is, it seems, a sign of approaching dissolution, from the medical point of view. There is a difficulty in making the poor old major understand this. He only sees that she has gone back to the likeness of her better self when he first married her; and he sits for hours by her bedside now, and tells her about his wonderful clock.

"Mr. Midwinter, of whom you will next expect me to say something, is improving rapidly. After causing some anxiety at first to the medical men (who declared that he was suffering from a serious nervous shock, produced by circumstances about which their patient's obstinate silence kept them quite in the dark), he has rallied, as only men of his sensitive temperament (to quote the doctors again) can rally. He and Mr. Armadale are together in a quiet lodging. I saw him last week, when I was in London. His face showed signs of wear and tear, very sad to see in so young a man. But he spoke of himself and his future with a courage and hopefulness which men of twice his years (if he has suffered as I suspect him to have suffered) might have envied. If I know any thing of humanity this is no common man—and we shall hear of him yet in no common way.

"You will wonder how I came to be in London. I went up with a return ticket (from Saturday to Monday) about that matter in dispute at our agent's. We had a tough fight; but, curiously enough, a point occurred to me just as I got up to go, and I went back to my chair, and settled the question in no time. Of course

I staid at Our Hotel in Covent Garden. William, the waiter, asked after you with the affection of a father; and Matilda, the chamber-maid, said you almost persuaded her that last time to have the hollow tooth taken out of her lower jaw. I had the agent's second son (the young chap you nick-named Mustapha, when he made that dreadful mess about the Turkish Securities) to dine with me on Sunday. A little incident happened in the evening which may be worth recording, as it connected itself with a certain old lady who was not 'at home' when you and Mr. Armadale blundered on that house in Pimlico in the by-gone time.

"Mustapha was like all the rest of you young men of the present day—he got restless after dinner. 'Let's go to a public amusement, Mr. Pedgitt,' says he. 'Public amusement? Why, it's Sunday evening!'" says I. 'All right, Sir,' says Mustapha. 'They stop acting on the stage, I grant you, on Sunday evening—but they don't stop acting in the pulpit. Come and see the last new Sunday performer of our time.' As he wouldn't have any more wine there was nothing else for it but to go.

"We went to a street at the West End, and found it blocked up with carriages. If it hadn't been Sunday night I should have thought we were going to the opera. 'What did I tell you?' says Mustapha, taking me up to an open door with a gas snaf outside and a bill of the performance. I had just time to notice that I was going to one of a series of 'Sunday Evening Discourses on the Pompe and Vanities of the World, by A. Sinner Who Has Sinned Them,' when Mustapha jogged my elbow, and whispered, 'Half a crown is the fashionable tip.' I found myself between two demure and silent gentlemen, with plates in their hands, uncommonly well filled already with the fashionable tip. Mustapha patronized one plate, and I the other. We passed through two doors into a long room crammed with people. And there, on a platform at the farther end holding forth to the audience, was—not a man, as I had expected, but a Woman, and that woman MOTHER OLDERSHAW! You never listened to any thing more eloquent in your life. As long as I heard her she was never once at a loss for a word any where. I shall think less of oratory as a human accomplishment for the rest of my days after that Sunday evening. As for the matter of the sermon, I may describe it as a narrative of Mrs. Oldershaw's experience among dilapidated women, professedly illustrated in the pious and penitential style. You will ask what sort of audience it was. Principally women, Augustus—and, as I hope to be saved, all the old haridons of the world of fashion, whom Mother Oldershaw had ennobled in her time, sitting boldly in the front places, with their cheeks ruddied with paint, in a state of devout enjoyment wonderful to see! I left Mustapha to hear the end of it. And I thought to myself, as I went out, of what Shakespeare says somewhere—'Lord, what fools we mortals be!'

"Have I any thing more to tell you before I leave off? Only one thing that I can remember.

"That wretched old Bushwood has confirmed the fears I told you I had about him when he was brought back here from London. There is no kind of doubt that he has really lost all the little reason he ever had. He is perfectly harmless, and perfectly happy. And he would do very well if we could only prevent him from going out in his last new suit of clothes, smirking and smiling, and inviting every body to his approaching marriage with the handsomest woman in England. It ends, of course, in the boys pelting him, and in his coming here crying to me, covered with mud. The moment his clothes are cleaned again he falls back into his favorite delusion, and struts about before the church gates, in the character of a bridegroom, waiting for Miss Gwilt. We must get the poor watch taken care of somewhere for the rest of the little time he has to live. Who would ever have thought of a man at his age falling in love? and who would ever have believed that the mischief that woman's beauty has done could have reached as far in the downward direction as our superannuated old clerk?

"Good-by, for the present, my dear boy. If you see a particularly handsome snuff-box in Paris, remember—though your father scorns Testimonials—he doesn't object to receive a present from his son.

"Yours affectionately,

"A. PEDGITT, SENR.

"Postscript.—I think it likely that the account you mention, in the French papers, of a fatal quarrel among some foreign sailors in one of the Lipari Islands, and of the death of their captain, among others, may really have been a quarrel among the secondaries who robbed Mr. Armadale, and scuttled his yacht. These fellows, luckily for society, can't always keep up appearances; and, in their case, Rogues and Ruffians do occasionally come into collision with each other."

CHAPTER II.

MIDWINTER.

The spring had advanced to the end of April. It was the eve of Allan's wedding-day. Midwinter and he had sat talking together at the great house till far into the night—till so far that it had struck twelve long since, and the wedding-day was already some hours old.

For the most part the conversation had turned on the bridegroom's plans and projects. It was not till the two friends rose to go to rest that Allan insisted on making Midwinter speak of himself. "We have had enough, and more than enough, of my future," he began, in his blantly straightforward way. "Let's say something now, Midwinter, about yours. You have promised me, I know, that if you take to Literature, it shan't part us, and that if you go on a sea voyage you will remember when you come back that my house is your home. But this is the last chance we have of being together in our old way; and I own I should like to know—" His voice faltered, and his blue eyes moistened a little. He left the sentence unfinished.

Midwinter took his hand and helped him, as he had often helped him to the words that he wanted in the by-gone time.

"You would like to know, Allan," he said, "that I shall not bring an aching heart with me to your wedding-day? If you will let me go back for a moment to the past, I think I can satisfy you."

They took their chairs again. Allan saw that Midwinter was moved. "Why distress yourself?" he asked, kindly—"why go back to the past?"

"For two reasons, Allan. I ought to have thanked you long since for the silence you have observed, for my sake, on a matter that must have seemed very strange to you. You know what the name is which appears on the register of my marriage—and yet you have forborne to speak of it, from the fear of distressing me. Before you enter on your new life, let us come to a first and last understanding about this. I ask you—as one more kindness to me—to accept my assurance (strange as the thing must seem to you) that I am blameless in this matter; and I entreat you to believe that the reasons I have for leaving it unexplained are reasons which, if Mr. Brock was living, Mr. Brock himself would approve."

In those words he kept the secret of the two names—and left the memory of Allan's mother, what he had found it, a sacred memory in the heart of her son.

"One word more," he went on—"a word which will take us, this time, from past to future. It has been said, and truly said, that out of Evil may come Good. Out of the horror and the misery of that night you know of has come the silencing of a doubt which once made my life miserable with groundless anxiety about you and about myself. No clouds, raised by my superstition, will ever come between us again. I can't honestly tell you that I am more willing now than I was when we were in the Isle of Man, to take what is called the rational view of your Dream. Though I know what extraordinary coincidences are perpetually happening in the experience of all of us, still I can not accept coincidences as explaining the fulfillment of the Visions which our own eyes have seen. All I can sincerely say for myself is, what I think it will satisfy you to know, that I have learned to view the purpose of the Dream with a new mind. I once believed that it was sent to rouse your distrust of the friendless man whom you had taken as a brother to your heart. I now know that it came to you as a timely warning to take him closer still. Does this help to satisfy you that I, too, am standing hopefully on the brink of a new life, and that while we live, brother, your love and mine will never be divided again?"

They shook hands in silence. Allan was the first to recover himself. He answered in the few words of kindly assurance which were the best words that he could address to his friend.

"I have heard all I ever want to hear about the past," he said; "and I know what I most wanted to know about the future. Every body says, Midwinter, you have a career before you—and I believe that every body is right. Who knows what great things may happen before you and I are many years older?"

"Who need know?" said Midwinter, calmly. "Happen what may, God is all-merciful, God is all-wise. In those words, your dear old friend once wrote to me. In that faith, I can look back without murmuring at the years that are past, and can look on without doubting to the years that are to come."

He rose, and walked to the window. While they had been speaking together the darkness had passed. The first light of the new day met him as he looked out, and rested tenderly on his face.

THE END.

GETTYSBURG:—JULY, 1863.

O PRIDE of the days in prime of the months

Now trebled in great renown,
When before the ark of our holy cause

Fell Dagon down—

Dagon foredoomed, who, armed and targed,
Never his impious heart enlarged
Beyond that hour; God walled his power,
And there the last invader charged.

He charged, and in that charge condensed

His all of hate and all of fire;
He sought to blast us in his scorn,
And wither us in his ire.

Before him went the shriek of shells—
Aerial screamings, taunts, and yells;
Then the three waves in flashed advance

Surged, but were met, and back they set:
Pride was repelled by sterner pride,
And Right is a strong-hold yet.

Before our lines it seemed a beach

Which wild September gales have strown
With havoc on wreck, and dashed therewith
Pale crews unknown—

Men, arms, and steeds. The evening sun
Died on the face of each lifeless one,
And died along the winding marge of fight
And searching-parties lone.

Sloped on the hill the mounds were green,

Our centre held that place of graves,
And some still hold it in their swoon,
And over these a glory waves.

The warrior-monument, crashed in fight,
Shall soar transfigured in loftier light,

A meaning ampler bear;
Soldier and priest with hymn and prayer
Have laid the stone, and every bone
Shall rest in honor there.

FRANCIS ASBURY.

FRANCIS ASBURY.

THERE is a man, not even named in our leading histories, who yet has wrought more deeply into American life in its social, moral, and religious facts than any other who lived and acted his part in our more formative period. His name was FRANCIS ASBURY. His life is overlooked, and so spiritual, pervasive, and effective a force is left unnoticed. And this is but an instance in which history is ever repeating its own method. How much broader the place occupied by Julius Cæsar and Napoleon Bonaparte than by Plato and Martin Luther in European history! Yet a tyro in historic study knows that the latter were incomparably the greater forces in forming the real life of Europe. So the names of Ethan Allen and Anthony Wayne have been more familiar to the popular ear of America than that of Asbury; yet how trivial their influence compared with his!

In the parish of Handsworth, in Staffordshire, England, lived Joseph and Elizabeth Asbury, husband and wife, and among the best of the peasant class. In the year 1745 they welcomed to their cottage a little son, and called him

Francis. He and a little sister were all the children that came to gladden this peasant-home. She, though lovely and most dear to the small family circle, remained in it but a few summers, when the Good Father took her to his own home. The parents and brother cherished her memory in love, and felt that heaven was rendered more dear and attractive by her presence. The event, so sad in itself, came accompanied with rich religious blessings. And who can tell the result? Deep impressions in youth often give tone to a long life. So it was here. And when, as in this case, that life is singularly good, and sends out influences that survive it and go down the ages, only the divine mind can estimate the benign results of that early impression.

Childhood is ever much the same. The least differences are mainly in fable. Francis slept and waked, smiled and wept, was caressed and corrected much as other children. Still early traits foretold a good and useful life. He writes: "I remember, when I was a small boy and went to school, I had serious thoughts, and a particular sense of the being of a God; and greatly feared both an oath and a lie. Wicked as my companions were, and fond as I was of play, I never imbibed their vices." He dates the beginning of his spiritual life in his fourteenth year; though he sincerely prayed and felt God near as early as seven. His parents, intelligent for their class, were anxious for his education, but unfortunately were sadly balked in their plan. When sent to school at the age of seven he fell into the hands of a morose, cruel pedagogue. The wanton beatings which he suffered, and only the severer as their victim was the better deserving, gave his feelings an uncontrollable revulsion from school, and turned his thoughts to a trade. Their only good result, and certainly one due to the good temper of the boy, was a deeper religious feeling and more earnestness in prayer. A sudden transition from under the rod of such a master into a family of wealth and fashion was a very great change. But here while his trials were not felt to be so great his perils were really greater; and it is much to his credit that, with a conscience peculiarly sensitive, the worst he could write against himself is that he became a little vain.

In his fourteenth year he began a trade which for several years he prosecuted with great diligence. Fortunately his home was with a kind family who treated him as a son—a fact that bespeaks his own worth as well as their kindness. His religious feelings, for a while past somewhat abated, now returned with increased force. He was regular in prayer and a devout attendant upon Christian worship. In West Brunswick he often heard Stillingfleet, Baynel, Ryland, and others, men who preached the truth, and who were eminent in the Church. Little thought they that they were ministering to an apprenticed lad who in real greatness and in the breadth of his influence would so far surpass them. His leisure hours were carefully spent in reading and study. His selection of books was most fortunate. While they informed the mind they also nourished his piety and inspired noble purposes of a good and useful life.

As, long ago, devout minds in Jerusalem waited for the Messiah, and gladly received him when he came, so now the mind of young Asbury waited for the manifestation of Christianity in its most spiritual form, and with a readiness to receive it. About this time he asked information of his good mother concerning the Methodists—a sect much spoken against and in many places bitterly persecuted. She communicated the little she knew, and directed him to an acquaintance who would further inform him. Soon his steps were directed to a Methodist preaching. How strange it all seemed! No church; sermon without manuscript or notes even; prayers without books; singing in full and mighty chorus; but the holy fervor that pervaded all the service wrought deeply into his soul. Henceforth he was a Methodist, though he did not formally unite with them till sometime after. The inner religious life as unfolded in the sermon of this day far exceeded his own experience, but that experience soon had large increase. Soon he began to hold meetings for reading the Scriptures, prayer, and exhortation. Many attended these gatherings, and holy influences rested upon the people. The fervency of his prayers and the eloquence and unction of his exhortations were singularly effective. Persecution soon arose and drove him from one and another place of worship, when the parental home became his sanctuary.

A beautiful fact is given in this connection. This lad regularly accompanied his mother to a religious meeting of females, where he conducted the exercises, giving out the hymns, and reading and expounding the Scriptures. These must have been happy hours to his devout and loving mother. And how pure and good the moulding of his own youthful life in such fellowships! After a while he sought fellowship with the Methodists, who highly appreciated his remarkable gifts. Soon he was licensed to preach, and multitudes flocked to hear one so young and yet so effective in his ministrations. At twenty-one he began to travel and preach under the direction of the Wesleys. This was in 1766. Hence it is a fact not unworthy of note that the beginning of his regular ministry synchronizes with the origin of American Methodism, in the founding and building up of which his own life would have its richest unfolding.

John Wesley's thoughts were often beyond the sea, observing the colonies rising on these shores. He anticipated their rapid growth, and looked to them as fruitful fields for the earnest religious movement, with its peculiarly active and aggressive methods, now under his own direction. It was already begun here, but the laborers were very few for fields so broad. So in the Conference of 1771, Wesley said, "Our brethren in America call aloud for help; who will go?" Young Asbury, with others, responded. This call, though unexpected, did not take him by surprise or bring a new subject to his mind. Already, while preaching the Gospel through Northamptonshire and Wiltshire, his own thoughts were turned to America, and he felt his soul strongly drawn toward her. Indeed he had, in a measure, reached the conclusion that here would be the field of his life-labor. So, often, souls are moved by unconscious influences toward their true mission. Asbury, in his peculiar mood, regarded this call as from the Master, and hence could not decline or even hesitate. Of course so wise an overseer as Wesley promptly accepted him. Immediately he departed for home to commune with his fond parents, and to inform them of his plan. The communication was a trial both to himself and to them. Specially must it have been so to the mother, who had so wisely and lovingly nurtured the son. He makes the following brief note in his journal: "I went home to acquaint my parents with my great undertaking, which I opened in as gentle a manner as possible. Though it was grievous to flesh and blood, they consented to let me go. My mother is one of the tenderest parents in the world; but, I believe, she was blessed in the present instance with Divine assistance to part with me." So, after a brief visit among his friends and to the fields of his earlier labors, he sailed, September 3, 1771, for this country.

Then America was further away from England than now. More than fifty days were required to bring him to these shores. The voyage was stormy and tedious. His discomforts were many. Some strange oversight had let him depart without a bed or sufficient provisions. Sleeping on the boards and short meals were not agreeable; but he murmured not, as many, with far less motives to patience, had equal trials. The period was not an idle one. The ship was his parish. He preached, prayed, exhorted, and went the rounds of pastoral visitation. There was diligence, also, in reading and study. Of course it was a period of much devout reflection; and a little insight into these reflections is far more interesting than the ordinary experiences of such a voyage. His own words afford us that insight:

"Sept. 12.—I will set down a few things that lie on my mind. Whither am I going? To the New World. What to do? To gain honor? No, if I know my own heart. To get money? No; I am going to live to God, and to bring others to do so.... If God does not acknowledge me in America I will soon return to England. I know my views are upright now: may they never be otherwise!" "Sept. 15.—I feel my spirit bound to the New World, and my heart united to the people, though unknown; and have great cause to believe that I am not running before I am sent. The more troubles I meet with, the more convinced I am that I am doing the will of God." He and his companion, Richard Wright, landed in Philadelphia October 27. They were most welcome. The former writes: "The people looked on us with pleasure, hardly knowing how to show their love sufficiently, bidding us welcome with fervent affection, and receiving us as angels of God."

The Methodist movement was already begun in America. It commenced in 1766, five years before Mr. Asbury's arrival. Hence, this is its centennial year.

Events widely separated are often strangely united. In the latter half of the seventeenth century the troops of Louis XIV. laid waste the Palatinate on the Rhine. These sorely persecuted Palatines, being Protestants, were scattered abroad, many of them to distant lands. About fifty families, through the favor of Queen Anne, escaped to Ireland, and settled near Rathkeale, in the County of Limerick. But isolated, as they were, and without proper pastors, they became greatly demoralized. Vice reigned over them with little restraint. But Wesley's itinerants came early among them, and a wonderful reformation was wrought. Wesley, who visited them in 1758, made record in his journal of the wonderful change. He found "no cursing or swearing, no Sabbath-breaking, no drunkenness, no ale-house among them. They had become a serious, thinking people, and their diligence had turned all their land into a garden." Out of this vineyard came the vine of Methodism for the New World.

In 1760 a company of these people came to New York. Among them were Philip Embury, a local preacher, and Mrs. Barbara Heck—names worthy of record. But for a while the religious life of these Wesleyans declined. Embury, a modest man, neglected to preach. Matters grew worse and worse. But a better day was at hand. Barbara Heck, finding a number playing cards, was deeply moved in her soul, and, seizing the cards, threw them into the fire, and then poured burning words of warning and exhortation into the ears of the men. Straight she went to Philip Embury, and summoned him, as from God, to his mission, charging upon him a responsibility for their blood. It was enough. Immediately she went and brought four persons to his house, who, with herself, formed the congregation; and he preached and then organized a class.

Thus began the Methodist movement in America. The little company grew rapidly and soon overcrowded the house of Embury. He was early reinforced by Captain Webb, of the British army. He was remarkably zealous and effective, and not only contributed much to the progress of the work in New York, but also successfully preached the Gospel through the surrounding country.

About the same time Robert Strawbridge, also a local preacher from Ireland, began the work in Frederick County, Maryland. He commenced preaching in his own house, and there formed the first Society. Soon he built, near by, the noted Log Meeting-house. It was a rude structure, twenty-two feet square, with holes cut for a door and windows, but remained without either, as, also, without a floor. But it had a pulpit and a preacher in it. This unfinished cabin was the cradle of a vigorous, noble Methodism. The Society worshipping in it sent its messengers and spread its healthful influence through vast regions of the country. Strawbridge himself was full of zeal, itinerated extensively, and preached in various parts of Maryland, in Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. When he died his old parishioners of the Log Church bore him to his grave, singing as they went a triumphal hymn of Charles Wesley. The new religious movement constantly spread, and societies began to be formed at different points from New York to Virginia. Upon the arrival of Asbury there were about six hundred members.

Asbury landed, as we have seen, in Philadelphia. Methodism was introduced there by the zealous Captain Webb in 1767 or 1768. Through his exertions St. George's Church was purchased in 1770, and was, for many years, the great church, the cathedral of American Methodism. There it still stands. Mr. Asbury was taken to this church on the evening of his arrival, and there he began his American labors. And we have now before us a ministry running through nearly forty-five years, and which, for its energy and industry, its toils and trials, its travels and suffering, its sermons, pastoral services, general supervision, and results, rises upon our view in almost peerless grandeur. Even to sketch such a life through all these years would far exceed our limits. Brief and rare jottings are all that we can give. These, with a summation in the proper place, will suffice for our own purpose and the interest of the reader.

After laboring a while in Philadelphia, he set out for New York. But he never forgets the command, "As ye go, preach;" and hence his journey through New Jersey was a preaching tour. On the way he meets with Mr. P. Van Pelt, who had heard him preach in Philadelphia, and now kindly invited him to his house on Staten Island. Having no fixed time to be in New York, he accepted the invitation, accompanied him home, and preached in his house on the day of arrival, it being Saturday. On Sabbath he preached again, morning and afternoon; and in the evening at Justice Wright's. Mr. Van Pelt was a man of worth and position, and his home furnished a favorite resort for Asbury for many years. In the prevalent notion the earlier operations of the Methodists were limited to the poor and ignorant. This opinion is erroneous. Their early history contains the names of many families of affluence and high-social position.

Asbury now went to New York and began his labors there. But though these were abundant in the city, they were by no means limited to it. He made constant preaching excursions through all the surrounding country. Thus Staten Island, Westchester County, and parts of Long Island and New Jersey, were soon added to his parish. This was his invariable custom. Whether in New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or Norfolk, he always added a large circuit, through which he would travel and preach, mainly during the week-days. And these excursions were often extended many miles. Thus he kept constantly moving and preaching.

He has now fairly entered upon his American work. He has left his home and come over the broad sea to labor among strangers. He has found an open door. Having mingled with the people, and preached from place to place already in several colonies, he has had opportunity for observation upon colonial life, its spiritual wants, and the probabilities of successfully ministering to them. He has had time too for much personal reflection, and a searching inquisition into his own motives and aims. There has been time for reaction, had there been any such tendency, from the enthusiasm that brought him to these shores. Under such conditions observations upon his inner life, such as his journal enables us to make, picture the man to our view more perfectly than any narrative of his daily labors. Here we find as a chief fact his entire consecration to his chosen work. He has no powers to except or hold in reserve. His motives are the purest and noblest. The love of God and man is a fire in his soul. And there is the most utter absence of selfishness and worldly aspiration. Intensely earnest, and formed to rule, he is yet free from all fanaticism, arrogance, and severity: indeed is clothed in humility and kindness, most rigid in observing the rules that he urges upon others, and specially self-chiding. We give in illustration a few extracts from his journal, running through several months after his arrival:

"I find my mind drawn heavenward. The Lord hath helped me by his power, and my soul is in a paradise. Whatever I do, wherever I go, may I never sin against God, but always do those things that please him!" "I trust that I am in the order of God, and that there will be a willing people here. My heart and mouth are open; only I am still sensible of my deep insufficiency, and that mostly with regard to holiness. It is true, God has given me some gifts; but what are they to holiness? It is for holiness my spirit mourns."

Having stated that he preached three times on a Sabbath in New York, though very ill, and that the next day he rode to New Rochelle and preached twice, he adds:

"In the night I had a sore throat, but through the help of God I go on, and can not think of sparing myself:

"No cross, no suffering I decline,
Only let all my heart be thine."

"I want to breathe after the Lord in every breath."

Earnest as these words are, and intense as the religious feelings expressed, they are yet the utterances of a man remarkably calm, reflective, and self-poised. Nor are they the promptings merely of youthful ardor, or the inspiration of new scenes. They had no abatement, but rather increase, through all the years of his American mission, till in a good old age he finished his work and went home to rest. The same fervent piety and glowing zeal pervade his journal to the very close. And never was a life more in harmony with a record. This insight into his inner life is requisite to any proper estimate of his character.

Asbury was a most effective preacher. His manner was plain, direct, fervent, and devout. Often he was eloquent; not so much in the sweep of thought or glow of the imagination as in a marvelous pungency of the home truths which he uttered, and the holy unction which inspired him. He ever looked for immediate fruits, and was rarely disappointed. In all his bearing there was a moral elevation that commanded the respect of the thoughtful. Hence he found a welcome not only in the cabins of the poor, but in the mansions of the rich and refined. It was a common thing for him to be invited into families of the higher circles, and those not Methodists or members of any church. And as he was the representative man of religious societies as yet little respected—indeed, much contemned, this fact clearly shows his personal manners and worth to have been such as to command the esteem and friendship of many who else had regarded him with disfavor.

He was a chief directive force in the Methodist Societies before he became formally their head; and his influence, so judiciously wielded, supplied a pressing need. These Societies wanted a controlling mind. Good men were serving them as pastors; yet each was virtually independent, and some evils had already grown up. The Wesleyan usages were not carefully observed. No primary necessity for these was ever claimed, yet they seemed requisite to the Methodist movement. Its methods were homogeneous to its spirit and mission. Asbury was most earnest for these usages, and with kindness, but with unyielding firmness, he everywhere insisted upon their observance. Thus the Societies soon acquired uniformity and stability.

He was specially grieved to find the itinerancy tending to a disuse in America. The preachers were inclined to remain in the cities or to limit their labors to particular points. Such a mode, while serving well for others, was not suited to the Methodists or to their mission in America. Asbury brought all his strength to correct the existing tendencies, and to secure the itinerancy in its most active form. Upon nothing did he utter more earnest words. And he did not thrust others out, assuming the Metropolitan for himself, but was ever ready to go the first and the furthest. "My brethren seem unwilling to leave the cities, but I think I will show them the way." So he wrote, and so he certainly performed. Thus again: "I humbly hope before long about seven preachers of us will spread seven or eight hundred miles, and preach in as many places as we are able to attend." And he made no delay. Ever moving himself upon extended tours, he gradually brought others into the same plan. Thus "running to and fro," and preaching almost every day in the week, and often two or three times, they bore the Gospel to thousands who else had rarely heard it. And this itinerant measure, whereby the Methodist ministry have gone through villages, and rural districts, and out-of-the-way places, and kept pace with the rapid frontier advance of the people, is largely due to the good service of Asbury.

In 1772, when he had been one year in the Colonies, and was twenty-seven years of age, Wesley appointed him Assistant, or Superintendent, under himself, of the American Societies. He was now really their head, with an appointing power over the preachers. Wesley was far away, and knew that the government was with Asbury. This appointment is a noteworthy fact, and shows his standing in as competent a judgment as the world knew. True, these Societies were small; but they were rapidly growing, and, in the remarkable prevision of Wesley, their early greatness was clearly seen. He was himself a man of almost peerless administrative powers, and of large experience in just such work as he assigned to Asbury. He knew well its difficulties and importance, and that the future of the cause largely depended upon the character of its founder and organizer. He, too, ever chose men only for their fitness, and expected a thorough performance of the work assigned them; hence his selection of one so young for such a position evinces his lofty appreciation of Asbury's qualities. And that marvelous judgment never went more directly to the mark. Though he was probably, at his own request, superseded for a while by Mr. Rankin, a man of large experience and abilities, yet his was ever the moulding mind.

Asbury spent six and a half years at New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk, as centres, but only as centres. The labor given to these cities was immense, but was more than duplicated by that given to "the regions round about." He was ever moving, and no opportunity for preaching was ever omitted. In churches, in cabins and mansions, in school-houses and groves, in taverns and under jail walls, every where, and without ceasing, he was preaching the word of life. Then he added an immense sum of pastoral labor in visitations, and in meeting and edifying the Societies in the methods peculiar to themselves. Wishal he was a most diligent student, and given to reading.

His life-drama has an episode. In the summer of 1776, having suffered a severe illness, and being much exhausted, he determined to go to the Hot Sulphur Springs in Virginia and recruit. Why shouldn't he? People go now to watering-places; good people and ministers go, and who blames? After prostrating and severe toils do they not need recreation and recuperation? Then let them away to Saratoga, or Newport, or to whatever place may promise best. But the privilege is not of modern growth; it belonged to Asbury as much as to any now. So he went to the Springs. We shall be entertained in following him, and also enlarge our knowledge of his character. We start with his journal:

Monday, July 14, 1776.—We set off for the Springs. That an opportunity might be lost, I departed at night to the tavern where we lodged. On Tuesday we reached Frederick, and collecting as many people as we could by a short notice, I preached, and found my spirit at liberty.

We proceed with the merest jottings. Next day he was thrown from his chaise, but, through a kind Providence, not much hurt. Coming to Hagerstown, it seemed to him that Satan ruled there; but his mind found relief and comfort in delivering his Gospel message, though he saw little fruit. He considers it "one thing for a preacher to do his duty, and another thing for the audience to do theirs." On the next day a ride of forty miles brought him to the Springs. His ever observant mind quickly surveyed the ground, and as quickly formed its conclusions and purposes. Thus he writes: "Here was work enough for a preacher if he desired to be faithful. My soul was happy; and I felt myself totally delivered from the fear of man, determined, by the grace of God, to discharge my duty." Next day: "My soul was in peace; but the burden of the Lord rested upon me. I could not be satisfied till I declared to the people their danger and duty." So he preached the first day, and held a meeting for exhortation and prayer in the evening. The Springs, where he has come to rest and recruit, are at once his parish. He is always methodic, and has his rules here, while resting, as well as when laboring. Thus:

"My present mode of conduct is as follows: to read about a hundred pages a day; usually to pray in public five times a day; to preach in the open air every other day; and to lecture in prayer-meeting every evening. And if it were in my power, I would do a thousand times as much for such a gracious and blessed Master. But in the midst of my little employments I feel myself as nothing, and Christ to me is all in all."

One day a sore throat and a rain compel him "to be dumb." Next day his throat is worse, and he has a blister behind his ear; but his conscience is pure, and he quietly submits to the will of Heaven. But he soon transcends his prescribed limits, and preaches every day, adding the labor of extended excursions through the surrounding country. He will ever have a circuit, and we shall soon find it embracing the whole country.

Now that he is at the Springs will it not be well to observe a little his inner religious life? People and ministers who are deeply religious at watering-places can be trusted at home and in church. How is it with Asbury under these new conditions? He speaks for himself:

"My soul enjoys sweet communion with God." "The peace of God abideth constantly with me." "The congregation was rather increased; many were affected, and one man fell down. It clearly appears that I am in the line of my duty, in attending the Springs; there is a manifest check to the overflowing tide of immorality, and the prejudices of many people are in a great degree removed. So that I hope my visit to this place will be for the benefit of the souls of some, as well as for the benefit of my own body." "My soul is kept in the love of God, but longs for an increase of the divine gift." "Spent some time in the woods alone with God, and found it a peculiar time of love and joy. O delightful employment! All my soul was centred in God!"

These jottings, out of what would fill pages, and running through many days, evince the same deep, earnest religious life that we have observed elsewhere. Upon the whole, with all the Christian advancement, he would be rather a curiosity at Saratoga in the year of grace 1866.

Thus he rests and recruits for about six weeks. His home is none the pleasantest. "The house in which we live at the Springs is not the most agreeable; the size of it is twenty feet by sixteen; and there are seven beds and sixteen persons therein, and some noisy children. So I dwell among briars and thorns; but my soul is in peace." But, pleasant or unpleasant, his time is up, and he must away. The Springs having been his parish for six weeks, he must give the people his farewell:

"Having taken my leave yesterday, in discoursing on the parable of the sower, I this day turned my back on the Springs, as the best and the worst place that I ever was in; good for health, but most injurious to religion."

We reach a period of deep trial in Mr. Asbury's life. The war of the Revolution was now upon the colonies, and though there was nothing in fact that indicated a want of friendliness on his part to the American cause, yet circumstances were such as to awaken suspicion and place him under sharp surveillance. He was an Englishman, as a number of his fellow-laborers were. They were all under Wesley, who had declared himself in opposition to our cause; and though he soon changed his mind and earnestly defended us, the knowledge of this did not for a long time reach the Americans to relieve the adverse impression of his earlier sentiments. Besides, most of the English missionaries were unfriendly—some of them imprudent, and all, except Asbury, left the country. Under the intense excitement of the times here were facts enough to awaken suspicion, and arouse a fiery persecution against him. But he felt upon him the care of many souls; and, though sad at being left alone, was resolved to remain whatever might come. For a while he was in peril of prisons, and death even. Once a ball passed through his chaise, but harmed him not. Through all this he bore himself as a hero. But at length the storm raged so furiously that it was deemed judicious for him to withdraw for a season from his more public labors. He consented, and retired to Judge White's in Delaware. He was a man of position and influence, and a very devoted friend of Asbury. Only for a brief period, however, did he seek entire seclusion, as, ere long, he secured the friendship of many leading men of the State, which greatly enlarged his bounds. Soon he had the whole State for his parish: but still he felt greatly straitened, and sighed for broader fields.

Here he spent a little over two years, but was far from idle. With the exception of a few weeks, he almost constantly traveled and preached. And thus he laid broadly and deeply the foundations of Methodism in the State. Many leading families were added to it. And though at the time Asbury severely felt the straitness of his limitations, yet afterward he regarded this as one of the most useful periods of his life.

There were several leading families that befriended him, and some that he added to Methodism, of which we would gladly write. One we can not pass unnoticed. We refer to Richard Bassett's, of Dover. A lawyer by profession, and on his way to Maryland, he stopped for the night at Judge White's. Asbury and some of his preachers were there at the same time, and the opening of a door disclosed them to his view. Learning from the good hostess who they were, he requested his horse that he might leave, but was urged to stay. Then he was peremptory in his demand, but she was more peremptory in hers that he should remain; so he yielded to his fate. In his interview with them the impression made upon him was rather favorable, so that, at least for form's sake, he invited a visit from Asbury. He accepted, and in due time went. His coming was rather a trial to both the lawyer and his wife, but they tried to make the best of it. The result was the conversion of both, and their warm attachment both to Asbury and to Methodism in all its peculiar usages. Afterward, this same couple once rode forty miles to see the good and great man. Mr. Bassett was one of the first men of Delaware, of vast influence, and very large wealth. "He was an eminent lawyer, a Judge, Governor of Delaware, a member of the old Congress in 1787, and a Senator under the new Constitution. He was a delegate from Delaware to the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States." Till the day of his death he was a simple-hearted, earnest, joyous Christian and Methodist. When they were both old and near their rest, Asbury was pleased to record him his "long-loved friend."

But, in 1780, the time of his enlargement came, when he was free to go where he would; and quickly he was away, as upon the wings of the wind. As an eagle, just liberated from his cage and bearing away into the azure heights, thrills in every fibre with the joy of his freedom and heavenward flight, so Asbury exulted to be away through the valleys and over the mountains as an evangelist to the people. We have already thought him a wonderfully moving man; but the future so far transcends the past that he seems just now to have started. His tours henceforth, and running through thirty-six years, are continental. We are jaded and puzzled in following him. He is, say, in Ohio, and starts for South Carolina, having to pass through the vast wildernesses or thinly-settled regions of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia; but ere we would expect him there, he is far away into New York or Massachusetts, having passed through all the intervening States, holding conferences and constantly preaching on the way.

Before his starting upon this great career a number of the preachers had met with him at Judge White's and formally appointed him Superintendent, Rankin having left the country. He was now again the head of the Methodist Societies, with an appointing power over the preachers. One who has thoroughly studied his life thus pictures his future career and its results. "And now began those incredible tours over the continent for the remainder of his life, which, with his daily preaching in chapels, court-houses, barns, private houses, or the open air, present perhaps the most extraordinary example of ministerial labor in the history of the Church, ancient or modern. The reader is bewildered with the rapidity of his movements; but through them all the tireless, the invincible, the gigantic apostle appears, planning grandly, and as grandly executing his plans; raising up hosts of preachers, forming new churches, new circuits, and new conferences—extending his denomination north, south, east, west, till it becomes, before his death, coextensive with the nation, and foremost, in energy and success, of all American religious communions."

He first hastened southward, through Virginia and North Carolina, to quiet some troubles, and to prevent division among his Societies. There had been wonderful revivals, especially in Virginia; but disputations had arisen upon some points, and he could not rest till harmony again prevailed. Here are jottings from his journal that lift the curtain from the country and the people, and also reveal the toils of his journeyings as well as his own invincible spirit:

"We set out for Crump's, over rocks, hills, creeks, and pathless woods and lowland. The young man with me was heartless before we had traveled a mile; but when he saw how I could bush it, and sometimes force my way through a thicket and make the young saplings bend before me, and twist and turn out of the way or path—for there was no proper road—he took courage. With great difficulty we came in about two o'clock, the people looking almost as wild as the deer in the woods. I preached. I have only time to pray and write my journal—always upon the wing, as the rides are so long and bad roads. I can see little else but cabins in these parts, built with poles. I crossed Deep River in a flat-boat; and the poor ferryman sinner swore because I had not a silver shilling to give him. Some were drunk, and had their guns in meeting."

This is in North Carolina:

"We crossed the mountain at the Gap, near my bed where I slept last summer. We have, not unfrequently, to lodge in the same room with the family, the houses having but one room. This, with the nightly disagreeables of bugs to annoy us, shows the necessity of crying to the Lord for patience. In the midst of all I thank God I enjoy peace of mind. Oh, how many thousands of poor souls have we to seek out in the wilds of America, who are but one remove from the Indians in the comforts of civilized society!"

We have seen that a number of the preachers, being Englishmen, had left their work and returned home; but many were being raised up, who more than replaced them. A valuable accession about this time was Thomas Ware. His commencing to preach has a little romance in it; and Asbury is so brought into the scene as to appear in an interesting phase of his versatile character. Coming into young Ware's neighborhood he sent for him, and after a very interesting interlocution on religious topics, "he then," the young man relates, "looked at me very sternly, and said: 'What is this I hear of you? It is said you have disturbed the peaceful inhabitants of Holly by rudely entering into a house where a large number of young people were assembled for innocent amusement, and when welcomed by the company and politely invited to be seated, you refused, and proceeded to address them in such a way that some became alarmed and withdrew, and the rest soon followed.'" The young man replied, in substance, that perhaps he had been over-zealous, though the matter had been much exaggerated; that they were his acquaintances and friends; and that, having related to them his Christian experience, and reminded them that he had often gladly mingled with them in such scenes of gayety, he now in turn wished them to go with him to hear the excellent Mr. Pedicora, his spiritual father, preach his farewell sermon. The grave man had another question. "Was it not bold and adventurous for so young a Methodist to fill, for a whole week, without license or consultation, the appointments of such a preacher as George Mair?" An explanation of this also was attempted. Mr. Mair was suddenly called away by family affliction; there was much religious interest in some places—some of the appointments were new, and there was no one to hold any meetings: "I was therefore induced soon after he was gone to resolve on going to some of these places and telling those who might come out the cause of the preacher's absence; and if I was sometimes constrained to exhort these people without a formal license it was with fear and trembling and generally very short, unless when the tears of the people caused me to forget that I was on unauthorized ground."

All this while Asbury was reading the young man, and now knew him well. The sequel is this: "I said, 'Mr. Asbury, if the person who informed you against me had told me of my errors I would have acknowledged them.' Here he stopped me by clasping me in his arms, and saying in an affectionate tone: 'You are altogether mistaken, my son; it was your friend Pedicora who told me of your pious deeds.'" Henceforth he was a preacher, and fully realized the large expectations of the stern, tender Asbury.

While Asbury moves rapidly upon his extended tours, overlooking the Societies, holding the Conferences, and ever preaching, we will hasten directly to Delaware, and to the famed Barratt's Chapel. It is Sunday morning, and he is there to enter the chapel at the same time, having come to preach. But the pulpit is already occupied by a man small of stature, and gowned as an English clergyman. Asbury advances to the pulpit, and, extending his strong arms, embraces the little man and kisses him in the presence of the whole congregation. Who is he? A great leader in the cause of Methodism, and famed both in the Old World and the New; who in rapidity of movement excels both Wesley and Whitefield; the father of Methodist missions, and to whom the missionary movements of the various Evangelical churches are far more indebted than to any other; who, many years after, died on shipboard, while conducting a missionary force to Ceylon, and was buried in the Indian Ocean: Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., late of Jesus College, Oxford. When Asbury saw that this great and good man had come to help him in the work so dear to his heart that great heart melted in grateful love. After many years, when he had entered upon the next century, and had heard that Dr. Coke was buried in the deep sea, he was pleased to record him "the greatest man of the last century in Christian labors."

We are in 1784, an epochal year of American Methodism. The war of the Revolution is now over, and the old colonies are free and independent States. The Methodist Societies have come out of the dark and trying period of the war largely increased. And Mr. Wesley, recognizing the new state of things as providential, deems it wise that these growing Societies should cease from all formal connection with those in England, and be regularly organized into a church. To accomplish this was one object of Dr. Coke's coming. So he brought strange things to the ears of their chief pastor. Asbury was astounded, and none the less that it was proposed to consecrate him the episcopal head of the newly organized church. But the famed Christmas Conference was soon held, and both the organization and consecration became facts. Francis Asbury is henceforth known in Methodist parlance as Bishop Asbury.

It is proper here more directly to describe him. Many portraits, taken by gifted pens, are at hand:

"Bishop Asbury was 5 feet 9 inches high, weighed 151 pounds, erect in person, and of very commanding appearance. His features were rugged, but his countenance was intelligent. His nose was prominent, his mouth large, as if made on purpose to talk, and his eyes of a bluish cast, and so keen that it seemed as if he could look right through a person. He had a fine forehead, indicative of no ordinary brain, and beautiful white locks which hung about his brow and shoulders. There was as much native dignity about him as any man I ever saw. He seemed born to sway others. In dress he was a pattern of neatness and plainness." "He was studious, somewhat introspective, with a thoughtfulness which was tinged at times with melancholy. His was one of those minds which can find rest only in labor; designed for great work, and therefore endowed with a restless instinct for it. He was a rigorous disciplinarian, disposed to do every thing by method; a man of few words, and these always to the point; of quick and marvelous insight into character. His mind had eminently a military cast. He could plan sagaciously, seldom pausing to consider theories of wisdom or policy, but as seldom failing in practical prudence. The rigor which his disciplinary predilections imposed upon others was so exemplified by himself that his associates or subordinates, instead of revolting from it, accepted it as a challenge of heroic emulation." "Who of us could be in his company without feeling impressed with a reverential awe and profound respect? It was almost impossible to approach him without feeling the strong influence of his spirit and presence. There was something in this remarkable fact almost inexplicable and indescribable. Was it owing to the strength and elevation of his spirit, the sublime conceptions of his mind, the dignity and majesty of his soul, or the sacred profession with which he was clothed? But so it was; it appeared as though the very atmosphere in which he moved gave unusual sensations of diffidence and humble restraint to the boldest confidence of man."

Now that it is Bishop Asbury he does not linger, but, if possible, hastens the more, and from year to year enlarges the bounds of his circuit. Ere long we find him, with Dr. Coke, at Mount Vernon, in an interesting, friendly interview with General Washington. Their reception is most cordial, and they dine with him, and are warmly urged to tarry for the night. A leading subject of conversation is the ever "vexed question," and as much vexing as vexed; also the matter of a petition to the Assembly of Virginia for the abolition of slavery in that State. They find that great man in full harmony with themselves in opposition to the institution. Bishop Asbury ever had a profound esteem for General Washington, and it is plain that that esteem was sincerely reciprocated. In the New York Conference of 1789 the Bishop moved that it was proper for the Church to present a congratulatory address to General Washington, lately inaugurated President of the United States, also expressing therein their approbation of the Constitution and their allegiance to the Government. The Conference unanimously acceded to the proposition, and, at their request, the Bishop prepared the address, and presented it to the President at a time which he appointed.

The President's response, proceeding in fitting terms and noble sentiments, concludes thus :

"It always affords me satisfaction when I find a concurrence of sentiment and practice between all conscientious men, in acknowledgment of homage to the great Governor of the universe, and in professions of support to a just civic government. After mentioning that I trust the people of every denomination, who demean themselves as good citizens, will have occasion to be convinced that I shall always strive to prove a faithful and impartial patron of genuine, vital religion, I must assure you in particular, that I take in the kindest part the promise you make of presenting your prayers at the throne of grace for me, and that I likewise implore the divine benediction on yourselves and your religious community."

This was the first address of gratulation and loyalty that he, as President, received from any Christian communion.

Again the Bishop is far away upon his toilsome journeys. He is now penetrating the rough Holstein country, and makes the following entry in his journal :

"We made a more for Holstein, and entered upon the mountains; the first of which I called Steel, the second Stone, the third Iron Mountain; they are rough, and difficult to climb. We were spoken to on our way by most awful thunder and lightning, accompanied by heavy rain. We crept for shelter into a little dirty house, where the filth might have been taken from the floor with a spade. We felt the want of fire, but could get little wood to make it."

But he is soon far away into other regions :

"We had to cross the Alleghany Mountain again at a bad passage. We came to an old forsaken habitation in Tiger's Valley. Here our horses grazed about, while we boiled our meat. Midnight brought us up at Jones's, after riding forty or perhaps fifty miles. The old man, our host, was kind enough to wake us at four o'clock in the morning. We journeyed on through desolate, lonely wilds, where no food might be found, except what grew in the woods, or was carried with us. Near midnight we stopped at A——s, who hissed the dogs at us, but we went in. I lay along the floor on a few deer-skins with the fleas."

He is still upon his tour, preaching as he goes :

"There attended about seven hundred people, to whom I preached with freedom; and I believe the Lord's power reached the hearts of some. After administering the sacrament I was well satisfied to take my leave. We rode thirty miles to Father Raymond's, after three o'clock, and made it nearly eleven before we came in. About midnight we went to rest, and rose at five o'clock next morning. My mind has been severely tried under the great fatigue endured both by myself and my horse. Oh, how glad I should be of a plain, clean plank to lie on, as preferable to most of the beds; and where the beds are in a bad state the floors are worse!"

In the spring of 1790 he sets off through Tennessee for the interior of Kentucky. Then these regions were mainly a wilderness. Here and there was a station or block-house, with a few settlers. Massacres by the Indians were a common occurrence. The journey was full of toils and perils, but the Bishop had been requested to come to Kentucky, and he was not the man to decline. A guard met him in the Holstein country; and the whole company made eighteen men, with thirteen guns. He writes: "Our way is over mountains, steep hills, deep rivers, and muddy creeks; a thick growth of reeds for miles together; and no inhabitants but wild beasts and savage men."

Having spent a few days in Lexington, preaching and holding a Conference, he writes again :

"My soul has been blessed, and I am exceedingly pleased with the people. I would not, for the worth of all the places, have been prevented in this visit, having no doubt but that it will be for the good of the present and rising generation. It is true, such exertions of mind and body are trying; but I am supported under it; if souls are saved, it is enough. We fixed a plan for a school, and called it Bethel, and obtained a subscription of upward of three hundred pounds toward its establishment."

After traveling hither and yon, preaching to the scattered settlements, he writes: "We set out on our return through the wilderness with a large and helpless company; we had about fifty people, twenty of whom were armed, and five of whom might have stood fire." The Bishop was chief of the band. Once, being threatened with an attack by the Indians, they traveled nearly all night before halting. He notes three days' travel: "Monday, forty-five miles; Tuesday, fifty miles; Wednesday, sixty miles." And this in such a wilderness!

But now he is the head of a numerous people, and well paid for his toils! Yes, he receives sixty-four dollars a year and traveling expenses.

Through all these years he is establishing schools, founding various charities, and is no doubt himself the most generous giver on the continent. He is the first to introduce Sunday-schools into America, and is a Bible and tract distributor long before there is either Bible or Tract Society.

In his travels perils often came with toils. Thus we read in his journal :

"We came upon Catawba River, where we could neither get a canoe or guide. We entered the water at an improper place, and were soon among the rocks and in the whirlpools: my head swam, and my horse was affrighted; the water was to my knees, and it was with difficulty we retreated to the same shore."

Having at last got over, he writes :

"We went on, but our troubles were not at an end; night came on, and it was very dark. It rained heavily, with powerful lightning and thunder. We could not find the path that turned out to Connell's. In this situation we continued until midnight or past; at last we found a path which we followed till we came to dear old Father Harper's plantation; we made for the house and called: he answered, but wondered who it could be; he inquired whence we came; I told him we would tell that when we came in, for it was raining so powerfully we had not much time to talk. When I came dripping into the house, he cried, 'God bless your soul, is it brother Asbury? Wife, get up!'"

The home of Dr. S. Hines, in Kentucky, was a favorite stopping-place with the Bishop. One night, while lodging there, a messenger came in haste for the Doctor's professional service in behalf of a man who was dangerously ill. It was at quite a distance, the night dark and stormy, the Doctor himself quite feeble; so he responded that he thought he could not go. Asbury heard the conclusion, and it was more than he could bear; so he shouted out, "Go, Doctor, instantly, and save the man's life!" It seemed to the Doctor as a voice from heaven, and he made the greatest possible haste to be off. Returning in the morning, the Bishop saluted him, "Well, Doctor, how is your patient?" The response was, "To you, Bishop, under the blessing of God, that man owes his life, as he must have died before morning." The Bishop, speaking right from his ever-working soul, said, "As long as you can drag yourself about always be found doing something." The Doctor was now an earnest Methodist, but once was very different. Upon the conversion of his worthy wife, which was before his own, he deemed her in a kind of derangement, and put a large blister upon her back to draw out the Methodism. Years after, in relating it to Bishop Asbury, he might well say, "What a fool I was to do so!" Her patience and meekness soon won him to the same cause.

Traveling through East Tennessee, he was impressed with the fact that so many were migrating westward. His first thought was for their spiritual good. So he writes: "We must take care to send preachers after these people." These words expressed the very life of the religious movement which he was leading. Then from the trials of these people he derived a lesson of personal patience. Thus: "A man who is well mounted will scorn to complain of the roads when he sees men, women, and children, almost naked, paddling barefoot and barelegged along, or laboring up the rocky ascent, while those who are best off have only one horse for two or three children to ride at once."

Bishop Asbury was never married; a fact regretted by some of his friends. But he gave his reasons for it, and whoever fairly weighs them will scarcely find it in his heart to blame him:

"If I should die in celibacy, which I think quite probable, I give the following reasons for what can scarcely be called my choice. I was called in my fourteenth year; I began my public exercises between sixteen and seventeen; at twenty-one I traveled; at twenty-six I came to America; thus far I had reason enough for a single life. It had been my intention of returning to Europe at thirty years of age; but the war continued, and it was ten years before we had a settled, lasting peace; this was no time to marry or be given in marriage. At forty-nine I was ordained Superintendent Bishop in America. Among the duties imposed upon me by my office was that of traveling extensively, and I could hardly expect to find a woman with grace enough to enable her to live but one week out of the fifty-two with her husband; besides, what right has any man to take advantage of the affections of a woman, make her his wife, and by voluntary absence subvert the whole order and economy of the marriage state, by separating those whom neither God, nature, nor the requirements of civil society permit long to be put asunder? It is neither just nor generous. I may add to this, that I had little money, and with this little administered to the necessities of a beloved mother until I was fifty-seven. If I have done wrong, I hope God and the sex will forgive me; it is my duty now to bestow the pittance I may have to spare upon the widows and fatherless girls, and poor married men."

He did not urge his own course upon his preachers, though, as to the young men, he deemed it important that they should not be too hasty in the matter. Much of his work, specially on the extended frontiers, required single men; besides, his theory was, that they should wait till they had formed a ministerial character, and acquired some suitable qualifications for the duties of their office, and also, by a larger experience, be the better qualified for the judicious selection of a wife. He had his troubles in this matter. Many of his young preachers were early captured. It is related that there was a certain circuit in Virginia where they almost invariably married. So the Bishop, supposing the women to be blamable in the matter, and resolving to balk their business, sent two decrepit old men into the circuit, persuaded that no one would woo them, however easily they might be won. But the balking was in his own plan, for both married during the year.

His soul, in all its studies, plannings, and cares, in the supervision of so many preachers and churches, was ever the home of the most beautiful and tender filial love. Thus he writes to his parents:

"I last evening made arrangements for a remittance to you. My salary is $64. I have sold my watch and library, and would sell my shirts before you should want. The contents of a small pair of saddle-bags will do for me. Your son Francis is a man of honor and conscience. As my father and my mother never disgraced me by an act of dishonesty, I hope to echo back the same sound of an honest, upright man. I am well satisfied that the Lord saw fit you should be my parents rather than the king and queen, or any of the great."

Again:

"I have often revolved the serious thought of my return to you. I have frequently asked myself if I could retire to a single circuit, step down, and act as lay-preacher. This, if I know my own heart, is not my difficulty. With humility I may say one hundred thousand respectable citizens of the New World, three hundred traveling and six hundred local preachers, would advise me not to go. I hope the voice of the people is the voice of God. I am like Joseph, I want to have my parents near me. I am not ashamed of your poverty; and, I hope, after so many years professing religion, you will not be wanting in piety. You have spent many pounds upon Christian people, I know, from my childhood. Happy was I when this was done, and I hope it will come home to you in mercy."

When his good mother died he wrote in his journal a beautiful tribute to her memory:

"For fifty years her hands, her house, and her heart were open to receive the people of God and the ministers of Christ, and thus a lamp was lighted up in a dark place. She was an afflicted yet most active woman, of quick bodily powers and masculine understanding nevertheless, so kindly all the elements mixed in her. Her strong mind quickly felt the subduing influences of that Christian sympathy which 'weeps with those that weep,' and 'rejoices with those who rejoice.' As a woman and a wife she was refined, modest, blameless; as a mother—above all the women in the world I claim her for my own—ardently affectionate. As a mother in Israel few of her sex have done more by personal labor to support the Gospel and wash the saints' feet. As a friend she was generous, true, and constant."

Asbury's whole nature was generous and kindly. He dearly loved his friends, was tenderly affectionate toward children, and deeply sympathized with the suffering. When in Chillicothe, Ohio, he visited the grave of a dear friend, wife of Governor Tiffin, and sister of Governor Worthington; and returning to her late home, he wrote:

"Within sight of this beautiful mansion lies the precious dust of Mary Tiffin. It was as much as I could do to forbear weeping as I mused over her speaking grave. How mutely eloquent! Ah! the world knows little of my sorrows; little knows how dear to me are my many friends, and how deeply I feel their loss!"

His attentions to children were most kindly and winning. Like the Master, he would take them in his arms and bless them. Here a simple fact speaks much. One day a little boy, seeing him approach the house, ran in and said: "Mother, I want my face washed and a clean apron on; for Bishop Asbury is coming, and I am sure he will hug me up." When his dear friend, Rev. Henry Willis, died he hastened to the stricken family, expressed his deepest sympathy for the bereaved wife, then kissed and encircled in his arms the six orphan children, blessed them in the name of the Lord, and prayed with them. This was the stern man, the autocrat—i. e., Bishop, ruling over many preachers and people.

His tours were now, and had been for many years, truly continental. He had no starting-place, his round being as complete as a circle, though his movements through it, if not quite so rapid as the lightning, were often quite as zigzag. Once, when traveling in Ohio, a man met him, who abruptly asked, "Where are you from?" He promptly answered, "From Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or almost any place you please." No answer could have been more literally true. Never was it truer of a general-in-chief that his headquarters were in the field than it was of Bishop Asbury. If we should take Baltimore as a starting-point, his course would lie through Delaware and New Jersey, touching Philadelphia by the way, and reaching on through New York and through New England as far as Maine; then it would sweep round northward and westward into Western New York. Once it carried him around through Canada. From New York his course would lie westward through Pennsylvania and Ohio to its southern boundary, often touching Western Virginia by the way. His route on the return would carry him through Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, the Carolinas, Virginia, and Maryland. For many years he made annually this long tour. And there were so many divergences from the directer lines that the average of his yearly travels was eight thousand miles. Nearly all was accomplished on horseback. Much of it was through wildernesses and against many hindrances. Add now his ceaseless preaching, his frequent illness, his seven or eight yearly conferences, each occupying nearly a week, his care of so many churches and preachers, with all the thousand incidental demands upon his time and strength, and you have a measure of toil never surpassed, if ever equaled.

He is always at work in the families or taverns where he lodges on the ways of travel, in the churches and conferences on week-day and on Sunday. When sixty-seven years of age, and much broken, we find him traveling six thousand miles in eight months. This is twenty-five miles a day, and, considering the roads, enough of toil in itself. But you must deduct eight or ten weeks for his conferences, and hindrances by sickness, and by floods and mountains that could not be carried by assault. Then, adding all the other labors, where is the like of this? In such labors he has reached Virginia and held his conference. Now he has twenty days till the Baltimore Conference, and may rest. We want him to rest. We say in our souls, Dear Bishop, rest! How welcome in many good homes in Virginia and Maryland! There, near Baltimore, is Perry Hall, the splendid home of his dear friend Harry Gough, and a favorite resort of his. Or, how his coming would gladden the beautiful homes of Governor Barratt, or Judge White, or Governor Bassett, of Delaware? But does he rest? No. "The Bishop preached every day, going miles out of our direct route, visiting and confirming the churches during the interval between the Virginia and Baltimore Conferences."

Amidst all he is a diligent student. Beginning his ministry with little culture, and ever upon the wing, he made himself familiar with the Scriptures in the original Hebrew and Greek. He was well informed on general subjects, particularly history and theology. "In practical prudence, the wisdom which is profitable to direct in the government of large bodies of men, he perfected himself beyond almost any modern example, as the great results of his administration prove." He encouraged education, and founded schools, and a college even, though it perished by fire while he was yet in the career of his toils. Finding, in his extended frontier tours, very many without proper medical treatment, he studied medicine and profitably ministered to the sick.

Who can estimate the deep and pervasive, healthful and elevating influence of such a life? It is as broad as the whole country, and there are few homes in which it is not directly or indirectly felt. His preachers and people felt the glow of his piety and zeal, and the inspiration of his heroic life. He was as an oracle among them, and, traveling so extensively, was the teacher of all. His sermons, his counsels, his exhortations, and prayers would be remembered and talked over in each place for months after he had passed on. Then his expected return would renew the recollection and the conversation; so that he was much as one with them all the while. Such a life is mighty, and beautiful as well. Away in Ohio, and in 1812, he writes: "People call me by name as they pass me on the road, and I hand them a religious tract in German or English, or I call at a door for a glass of water and leave a little pamphlet. How can I be useful?"

Thus, going with the people, and sending his preachers with them through all those vast regions, now forming numerous mighty States, he laid deeply and broadly the foundations of a noble Christian civilization. He wielded the chief forces which have moulded and fashioned their social, moral, and religious life. These forces have survived him, and moved onward with the people, and wrought upon them to the present day. They have likewise extended to the utmost east, and north, and south, and wrought upon them there. And however others may have influenced the speculative, religious thought of America, no one has wrought so deeply and broadly into its living religious thought and feeling. The fruits of his plans and labors were marvelous in his own day; and they have wonderfully flourished down to the present time. To-day his followers, in the close affinities of ecclesiastic polity and Christian faith, number, in their ministry with the local, 28,000, in their communicants about 2,000,000, with all their vast educational, moral, and Christian appliances, and an affiliated population of about 8,000,000.

But now in his seventy-first year, in the spring of 1816, he is still upon his great tour. He has come up through the Carolinas into Virginia. He is in Richmond, worn, weak, sick. Most men would have been sick abed while he has been traveling and preaching. It is Sunday morning. He must preach. Entreaties and remonstrances ever are resisted; he must once more deliver his message in Richmond. Then strong and kindly arms bear him gently into the church. And there, seated in the midst of the thronged people, he opens his message: "For he will finish the work and cut it short in righteousness." For nearly an hour, his words, still plain and wise, direct and pungent, fall upon the listening, weeping people. It is his last sermon. In a few days the wheels of life that have run so swiftly stop forever. From Richmond he moves on till he reaches the friendly home of George Arnold, near Fredericksburg. There he lingered a few days amidst loving friends. On the Sabbath a Christian service was held in his room, and just at its close he went home to his rest.

Thus he ended his forty-five years of American labor. When he came to these shores the materials gathered to his hand were 8 or 10 preachers and 600 members. With these he began to lay the foundations and rear the Church. He lived to see it a noble structure. He left 211,000 members, and about 3000 preachers, itinerant and local. His sermons in America are reckoned at 16,500, or at least one a day; his travels at 270,000 miles, or 6000 miles a year. He presided in about 225 conferences, and ordained more than 4000 preachers. These conferences must have required the time of four years. In Christian labors none have equaled; in the wisdom of his administration and the success of his plans, few, if any, have surpassed him.

In the May soon following his death, and during the session of the General Conference, his remains were carried to Baltimore. There all his leading preachers, and a multitude of members and citizens, followed him to his grave and buried him as their father. And here we pronounce over his grave his own words uttered over that of Willis, and in which he so vividly pictures his own life of toil in contrast with the peaceful repose of his friend:

"Rest, man of God! Thy quiet dust is not called to ride 5000 miles in eight months, to meet 10 conferences in a line of sessions from the district of Maine to the banks of the Cayuga, to the States of Ohio, Tennessee, Mississippi, to Cape Fear, James River, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and the completion of the round. Thou wilt not plan and labor and arrange the stations of 700 preachers. Thou wilt not attend camp-meetings and take a daily part in the ministration of the Word, and often consume the hours which ought to be devoted to sleep in writing letters upon letters."

THE SWORD OF DAMOCLES.

HE who reads that ancient fable,
Wondering at the plot,
Seeing in it no resemblance
To life's common lot,
Reads it as an unknown language,
Comprehending not.

Over every human being Hangs a sword in air,
From mysterious heights suspended
By a single hair;
Though perceived not, though unheeded,
Yet forever there.

Keener than the sword Assyrian
Flashing through the fight;
Deadlier than the sword of Gideon
Battling for the right;
Than Excalibur more subtle
In its cunning might.

Like the Damoclesian weapon
On the palace wall,
Hangs Fate's falchion, sternly threatening
Evermore to fall,
On the lofty, on the lowly,
On the great and small.

On thy head, oh child of folly,
With the blow of blame;
On thy heart, unconscious lover,
With the smite of shame;
On thy hopes, ambitious dreamer,
Leaving not a name.

On thy gray hairs, weeping mother,
Ere they bring thy dead;
On thy pale face, girl of passion,
Ere the night is sped;
On thee, priest before the altar,
Ere thy prayer is said.

On thee, maiden, with eyes shaded,
Waiting at the gate;
On thee, young man, ripe and earnest,
Come to thy estate;
On thee, weary one, who crieth,
"Why so late—so late?"

Fall it may with swift-winged vengeance
Bidding evil cease;
Fall it may with blest redemption
Bringing sweet release;
Fall it may with angel's summons
Like a song of Peace.

THE FOOL CATCHER.

THE Fool Catcher and I were walking down the street, the Fool Catcher with his book of names under his arm, and I, wishing that I had been born, lived, and died, in those quiet days before he commenced his grand rounds. Mrs. Smythe herself came to the first door at which we rang; the briskest little woman in the neighborhood. With a bow the Fool Catcher handed her his card.

"Oh!" said Mrs. Smythe, looking first at the card and then curiously at my companion, "So you really do make your rounds! But you are at the wrong house; Mrs. Clematis lives the next, the next—why—good Mr. Fool Catcher," stammering and startled by something in the look of his eye—"you don't, you can't, you surely don't mean that you came for me?"

"Dear Mrs. Smythe," answered the Fool Catcher, blandly, "there are many species of Fool; and, candidly, I have not on my books a more monstrous instance of extravagant folly than your life. Why, my dear Madam, it is well known that you have paid over all your husband's peace and your children's comfort to keep the sun from your carpets, dust from your cornices, and scratches from your furniture; to say nothing of the fact that being given a good husband and sweet children to develop into a family, you have nothing to show, at the end of fifteen years, but an unfaded carpet and a set of china, without a flaw, that you had on your marriage. Sorry to distress you, but really you must fall into line, ma'am."

So Mrs. Smythe took up her march behind me, and we went on to the door of Mrs. Clematis, a dear little soul; but standing to Mrs. Smythe for smartness in the ratio of a tack to a marline-spike.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Clematis," said the Fool Catcher, politely raising his hat to that little woman, quaking in her door. "Sensible, sunshiny woman!" to us. "She has discovered that families are not made for houses, but houses for families. I have a great respect for her. Her husband is one of the happiest men in town," and if you can credit me, the Fool Catcher passed on; actually passed Mrs. Clematis's door and stopped at Grinder's. I was not anxious to attract the Fool Catcher's attention more particularly to myself, but I could not help ejaculating:

"Why, this is Grinder's house!" as if I had said Minerva's.

"Yes," retorted the Fool Catcher, curtly; "one of the greatest fools on my list. Men desire money to buy ease and the good things of this life; but Grinder sacrifices all ease and all good things to get more money. He has a charming wife, whom he might love if he had time; but he hardly exchanges ten words with her a week, he has no time to spare from money-making; children running wild, because he can spare them no time from money-making. Fine tastes never gratified; he must make more money; an iron constitution wearing thin for want of rest, from the hurry of money-making. Fall into line, Mr. Grinder!"

And so here were we—Mrs. Smythe, Grinder, and I—marching on after the Fool Catcher.

Across the street stood an Irish girl at her area gate, and, as she stared at us, dropped from her hand a letter which the Fool Catcher caught, and glancing over it, smiled grimly. It read as follows:

"Its movin agin Ive been Maggy & livin out now is like the young ladies at the piano you touches one key here & another there & don't stay long on none of them When I'm sick of 20th Street I tries 17th unless I takes a notion to 34th when I flies in a temper with 17th Street & so on And so im livin now with a woman in 23d Street I has the waitress, place & theres two ladies beside meself, for cook & chambermaid & a colored boy to do errands & tend door & a day woman in every weck to do the washing & ironing that the woman Mistress Blivins that is tried first to put off on the lady thats cook & meself & we are very respectable though we has no reception day & no man waiter But thin I minds them things the less that I have me eye on a place in the avenue & in this way we has variety & a chance to study the american faymale character & I does the thing regular becase I wants to improve my mind & acquire general information & oh Mollie its a quare thing is the american faymale character for the ladies you see are all as good as each other & so none of em wont lift a finger becase her neighbor dont & the poor american women thats sewin out their hearts they are all as good as any body too & theyll starve sooner nor live out becase they wont take the ladies airs & the ladies ll suffer sooner nor have em becase they cant stand the womens airs & so we steps in even if we dont know b from bulls foot & rules the ladies that is as good as each other & better nor the poor american women jist becase theres nobody else to be had & they knows if they sends us off to day theyll git no better or worse to morrow & if youre thinkin that this is some of my blowin why didnt I hear Mistress Blivins with me own ears complainin that she couldnt eat the dinners & that I broke more nor my wages in china by the same token that she darent send us packin."

"Oh, Holy Vargin!" here burst in the Irish girl, "to think that I shud iver be cotched fur a fool! Worra! worra! and what will—"

"You are quite mistaken," cut in the Fool Catcher, handing back her letter. "You are any thing but a fool, my dear; but you can call your mistress if you please."

And so Mrs. Blivins fell into line, and we marched on—Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—when we came suddenly on Mollie, in very high boots, and very short skirt, scalloped, ruffled, be-braided, be-buttoned, and be-tasseled; a monstrous knob of back-hair, covered with a net, bristling with small curls, of which I haven't the name, but which unassisted Nature would be apt to term coiffure à la Fido; in front a species of hair-work, a hirsute fortification, elevated high above her forehead, and likewise defended by curls, and somewhere between the front and back-hair a small flat pancake of straw and ribbon, half hidden on the top of her head. As this dainty apparition approached us, shoulders held high and square, elbows stiffly out, and head very high, as if determined not to be held responsible for the wonderful exhibition under her huge, stiff, swaying hoop, we halted involuntarily to add her to our ranks; but the Fool Catcher suffered her to pass on, which she did without once glancing toward us, following her with something like pity in his inflexible face.

"We make distinctions," he explained to us. "Some are born fools, some achieve folly, and some have folly thrust upon them. You have all of you achieved folly; but she has folly thrust upon her. I have considered her case, and I really can not find that she has any thing else offered her. She is a girl of enterprise, and if any thing better was given her to do, would be likely to do it; but the father and mother, who have not educated their daughter beyond the standard of a fashion-plate, deserve a place in my ranks. Step in, Madam; walk up, Sir!"

And so we marched on—Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I. On the next corner stood Judge Cathcart's house, and on the steps the old gentleman himself was watching us.

"Step down, Judge," said the Fool Catcher. "You belong to me, since your wisdom consists in not advancing, when you have legs, and the rest of the world is getting ahead of you."

"Don't believe in your modern improvements and new-fangled notions!" growled the old gentleman. "There were no Fool Catchers in my time."

"Or you would have been snapped up long ago," retorted the Fool Catcher; "and you too, Miss Stryffer," seeing that lady peeping out from her blinds. "You have made some good points concerning the duties and rights of your own sex; but when, to gain these points with men, you threw aside the gentleness that belongs to women, I was obliged to set you down in my book. Step down, Madam! I ask you reluctantly, I assure you; but then you should have remembered that men are used to hard names, ridicule, and denunciation from other men, and know how to meet it; while by nature they are incapable of making good defense against the tough blade of a truth, or a good argument, with a hint of feminine sweetness."

And so we marched on—Judge Cathcart, Miss Stryffer, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—to Mrs. Patchouli's door. I stared; Miss Stryffer stared.

"Why, what has she done?" asked Grinder.

"A very estimable woman," quavered Mollie's mother.

"Yes, but jealous of her husband's very eyelashes," said the Fool Catcher, with an air of disgust. "If he looks down, she knows he is guilty; if he glances aside, it is at the lady in the window; if he chats with a neighbor, ah! there is an intrigue. Whereas, if Mrs. Patchouli would only spend the time and energy that she devotes to discovering and denouncing her husband's infidelities in making herself agreeable, she would have in herself the best possible warrant against a cause for jealousy. Fall in, Mrs. Patchouli!"

At the same time ringing vigorously the bell next door. I had done with astonishment, or here would have been cause for wonder, for this was John Pilar's house, who looked at the Fool Catcher and at us with ineffable surprise.

"Gentlemen, here is some mistake," remarked John Pilar, with dignity.

The Fool Catcher ran over the list in his book.

"John Pilar, No. 7684 Fifth Avenue; owns also house in Fisher's Alley.' This must be you, Sir. You live in this palace; you own that pigsty. You live in the palace because it is comfortable, and you own the pig-sty because it pays well. No need of repairs there—no matter who complains, or who moves out, or what horrible hole it becomes! There are always more who must have homes. So here are you, called a sensible man, yet forgetting that there is an air-line on which your tenement-house sends your palace its daily quota of disease and death; and wondering, when your daughter dies of malignant fever, whence it came, as she was never exposed. And here are you, supposing yourself a Christian man, and yet doing unto your brother—because he is your poor tenant and helpless—all that you would dislike to have him do to you in his place. Come down, John Pilar. Here is no mistake!"

And so we marched on—John Pilar, Mrs. Patchouli, Miss Stryffer, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—till we came to Mrs. Pelion's door, where the Fool Catcher had difficulty in making himself heard, so great was the clamor within of Mrs. Pelion's children.

"I think no woman was ever so troubled as I!" cried Mrs. Pelion, coming out from among them with an exhausted air of having been torn in pieces, and of bringing only a very small portion of herself to meet us. "Herbert is so spirited, and the baby is so precocious!"

"Make them obey; other mothers do," suggested the Fool Catcher.

"Oh! but my children are unlike others," answered Mrs. Pelion, looking fondly on her offspring, who were disobeying her in all directions. "They laugh at punishment," administering as she spoke a series of pats, of about one-kitten power (a nine-days' old kitten), about the shoulders of the offending Herbert; and then turning on us pathetically, "You see; they are so determined. Herbert! put that book down! Was there ever such a child? Herbert!" But Herbert, hearing that he was invincible, went, of course, calmly on his way with the forbidden volume, and shrugging his shoulders, the Fool Catcher requested Mrs. Pelion to fall into line; and so we marched on—Mrs. Pelion, John Pilar, Mrs. Patchouli, Miss Stryffer, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—till we found old Catchew, furiously berating his son, young Tom.

"Softly, softly, my good Sir! What is the trouble here?" inquired the Fool Catcher.

"The trouble!" roared Catchew, who was in a purple rage; "why here is this thankless spendthrift puppy complaining of his allowance; and that he can't keep even pace with the follies of other young fellows of fashion like himself. Whining to me for spending money! Why, when I was his age I was at the head of a firm; I was, by George, Sir; and if—"

"One moment, Mr. Catchew," interrupted the Fool Catcher, quietly. "Has young Tom any business or profession?"

"Certainly not," returned the old gentleman, briskly. "I intend my son to be a gentleman, a college-bred gentleman. If I have no education no one can say but he has, and been brought up in luxury too! Never had to lift his finger for himself; and to think now that he should fly out—"

"As you say," cut in the Fool Catcher. "To fly out at him now would be a sort of treachery on your part when you have so carefully trained him to luxury, helplessness, and dependence on you. For what I can see you must die or support him, Mr. Catchew."

"When I was his age I supported myself," commenced old Catchew, but the Fool Catcher stopped him short, and so we marched on—old Catchew, Mrs. Pelion, John Pilar, Mrs. Patchouli, Miss Stryffer, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I; when who should we meet but Mrs. Phyffe!

"How are the children, Mrs. Phyffe?" asked the Fool Catcher, softly.

The lady stared.

"I haven't the least—I mean—really—how can I tell? They are with their nurses."

"And your husband, Mrs. Phyffe? I hope he is quite well."

"Dear me!" cried Mrs. Phyffe, fretfully; "why, I hardly see him except at church. How can a woman know any thing about husband and children that has three parties a night and such a visiting list as mine on her hands? to say nothing of one's bonnets and back hair."

The Fool Catcher sighed.

"And where are you going, Mrs. Phyffe?"

"To order a pair of wings," cried the lady, with animation. "I am to appear as an archangel, like the French countess, of whom I read, at somebody's ball in Paris."

"Fall into line, Madam!" said the Fool Catcher; but lo! Mrs. Phyffe slipped out of his hands, and floated away like so much thistle-down.

"Too light to be caught," murmured the Fool Catcher, looking regretfully after her; "decidedly we must have butterfly traps! Ah! good-morning, Mr. Kral;" but Mr. Kral, who with his wife was entertaining a guest, did not hear.

"Lovely weather for walking," observed the lady.

"Yes," returned Mr. Kral, "but you could never persuade my wife of that. She never finds any weather for walking."

"Any time since my marriage, you mean, dear!" answered Mrs. Kral, quickly, and growing furiously red.

"Have you seen your new neighbors?" asked the guest uneasily, turning the conversation.

"Ah, there it is!" cried Mrs. Kral. "I have been trying to induce Mr. Kral—"

"My dear, permit me—our neighbors are not yet—"

"Mr. Kral is always behindhand," continued the wife.

"Or has not so much curiosity, perhaps, as—"

"You have curiosity enough in some cases," cries Mrs. Kral, with great spirit. "You beset me to call on the Simpsons, but then Mrs. Simpson has young and pretty daughters."

"If you mean by that—"

"Oh! I mean nothing at all. I am quite in the wrong, of course. I always have been since my marriage, though before it I was supposed—"

Here the Fool Catcher stepped in, to the relief of the lady who sat aghast before the furious couple, with "Fall into line, my good friends!" and so we marched on—Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, old Catchew, Mrs. Pelion, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I; and seeing Jack's father helping his little son at work on a mud fort, we opened our ranks; but the Fool Catcher only lifted his hat respectfully, and passed on to the study where John's father sat grimly reading the news.

"And where is John?" asked the Fool Catcher.

John's father looked at his watch.

"At his Greek; every thing goes by system here. Up at five, Sir; shower-bath, ten minutes for dressing, hour's reading, walk, breakfast. Greek, arithmetic, Latin, drawing, dinner. Geometry, history, walk, composition, elocution, supper; an hour's play, reading aloud, prayers, and bed at half past nine precisely. That's my system, Sir," said the father; "no useless talking allowed; no straying off with other boys; bed hard; food plain; reading all solid; every thing hard, solid, thorough; that's my plan, Sir; and it works—works like clock-work!"

"But then the poor little pendulum will wear out one day," said the Fool Catcher. "Step into line, Sir!" and so we marched on—John's father, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, old Catchew, Mrs. Pelion, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—when we met young Bourse, who buttonholed the Fool Catcher, to talk to him about the Jack Beanstalk's stock.

"Can't be a mistake!" said he, energetically. "I have some twigs from the stalk, here, in my pocket. A bean that I planted in my own garden sprung up in the first hour, and grew ten feet in a day. If you will step down to my office I will show you one of the golden eggs laid by the hen of the giant that lives at the top in the glass-house; and some of our men have been far enough up to hear the twanging of the giant's harp; while only yesterday we found among the leaves a touching letter dropped by the giant's wife begging us to effect her release. I tell you it is a sure thing; stock going like—"

"Fall in line!" said the Fool Catcher, coolly, pouncing at the same instant on one man trying to convince another by argument, and a woman who was snubbing another woman.

"Fall in line! Fall in line!" cried the Fool Catcher, very red: "you, Sir, ought to know better; and you, Madam, why do you complain of men while you use your own sex so ill?" and so we marched on—the man, the woman, young Bourse, old Catchew, John's father, Mrs. Pelion, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—till we reached the counting-house of old Ossa, who was just looking over his insurance policies.

"How about your daughter?" asked the Fool Catcher. "Is she insured?"

"Don't know what you mean," said old Ossa, staring.

"Does she know any thing?" asked the Fool Catcher.

"Not much," returned Ossa, grinning. "What is the need? I hate clever women."

"How if you fail, then?"

"But I shan't fail. Besides, she'll marry some rich fellow or other—young Bourse, or young Tom Catchew."

"How if she marries some poor fellow?"

"If she does, I'll cut her off."

"How if young Bourse or young Catchew should fail?"

"But he won't fail."

"How if he dies and leaves his property involved?"

"What the deuce are you driving at?" cries old Ossa, perplexed.

"Why not instruct your daughter in something beyond beaus and back-hair?" pursued the Fool Catcher.

"But nobody does; and I hate clever women; besides, she will marry some rich fellow, I tell you."

And so we marched on—old Ossa, the man, the woman, young Bourse, old Catchew, John's father, Mrs. Pelion, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I, when—in no matter what street—stepped out from her carriage Mrs. Prew, of whom the Fool Catcher made polite inquiries concerning a journey she had just achieved.

"The country was very well, but the people are really intolerable," returned Mrs. Prew. "People who desire to be exclusive will soon be forced to eschew traveling. I assure you, Mr. Fool Catcher, I had no comfort. I turned my back to people on the boats and cars. I had all my meals served in my own rooms. I looked over every body's head; but, after all, do what you will, there is the consciousness of a crowd, promiscuous, ill-dressed, second-rate, staring."

"Fall in line, Madam!" cried the Fool Catcher, hastily, as if conscious and afraid of a strong desire to box the lady's ears; and so we marched on—Mrs. Prew, old Ossa, the man, the woman, young Bourse, old Catchew, John's father, Mrs. Pelion, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I—till we came to a lecture-room, where Mr. Anonymous was addressing Mrs. Stowe, Mrs. Browning, Rosa Bonheur, Gail Hamilton, Harriet Hosmer, and Mrs. Lewes, as follows:

"MY DEAR LADIES,—Homer represents the queens of antiquity as spinning wool, while the kings held counsel. Penelope spun. Lucretia spun. Milton sent Eve into the kitchen, while the angel was talking; and really, ladies, when women paint pictures as well as men, or write better essays than I can myself, or imagine a Zenobia, or give to the world a high-souled woman like Romola, or make two nations weep with a mother's wail for her sons, or help the great step of the century upward by an Uncle Tom, I must remind you gently, but firmly, that you are out of your spheres, and for what? Your painting, writing, sculpture is not equal to the best efforts of men, in similar departments, because—it is not; and if you advance the plea that you do such things to earn bread and butter, or support your children, I answer that there are other and more womanly ways of earning a subsistence, in which you can starve with decency and propriety; and in which you must remain if you hope for our admiration. Say to yourselves, ladies, not that I love dinner less but admiration more; and perish rather than get out of your sphere. If you are disturbed by what are called the promptings of genius remember that Penelope spun; a voice from the auditorium reminds me that she fibbed also. I shall only remark that I consider the interruption unladylike. I repeat; Penelope spun. Go to the sewing-machine, Rosa Bonheur; busy yourselves with puddings and hem towels, Mrs. Stowe. Make yourself a set of night-caps, Gail Hamilton. Ladies all, keep your respective talents with which, the Lord only knows why, you were endowed safe somewhere out of sight. Acknowledge your intellectual inferiority to man. When you meet an Irishman with a hod over his shoulder say to yourself this is a man. All men are superior to all women. This is my superior. Do this, and we will cheerfully acknowledge your spiritual superiority, and your greater fitness for heaven—"

"Fall in line, Sir!" interrupted the Fool Catcher, much disgusted; and so we marched on—Anonymous, Mrs. Prew, old Ossa, the man, the woman, young Bourse, old Catchew, John's father, Mrs. Pelion, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, John Pilar, Miss Stryffer, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I, till we saw Mr. Grimme and a woman in battered hoops and bonnet, thin, gray, anxious, and deprecating before a counter, on which was an armful of military coats.

"If you are not satisfied you can leave them," said Grimme. "There are plenty who will do the work at half the price."

"Three dollars a week," said the woman, plaintively.

"They will do it for half, I tell you."

"But with two children—"

"This is not an alms-house, Madam. I pay you for your work. Eight children or none makes no difference."

"Well," sighed the woman. "It is cruel hard. It does seem sometimes as if we couldn't live so; but I don't know where else to turn, and if you will pay me—"

"Can't pay you now," cut in Grimme, sharply, and buttoning up his coat. "I have paid out so much I am short; but you shall have it next week."

"Oh! but Mr. Grimme—"

"Will you take them or not?" says Grimme, with a savage thrust at the bundle of coats. "Come, one thing or the other, quick! I can't wait! I am going to prayer-meeting."

"Prayer-meeting!" echoed the Fool Catcher, with a gasp; "why this is the greatest one of them all. Thinks he can cheat Heaven. Head the procession, Sir!" and so we marched on—Mr. Grimme, Anonymous, Mrs. Prew, the man, the woman, old Ossa, young Bourse, old Catchew, John's father, Mrs. Pelion, Mr. Kral, Mrs. Kral, John Pilar, Mrs. Patchouli, Judge Cathcart, Miss Stryffer, Mollie's father and mother, Mrs. Smythe, Mrs. Blivins, Grinder, and I.

"SANCTUARY PRIVILEGES" IN ROME.

CHRISTMAS-EVE in Rome! Where, except with the angels under the stars of Bethlehem, could one keep watch this holy night more fittingly than under the dome of domes, filled with the heavenly strains of the Pastorella?

"But, my dear, 'remember the medical man.'"

"Yes, so I do; but I hope you don't call leaving at three o'clock in the morning going out in the evening!"

What mortal woman, sanitary dragon though she were, could withstand sophistry so after her own heart as this? "Christmas comes but once a year," and Christmas in Rome not once in every lifetime.

In anticipation of and by way of atonement for this dubious indulgence, we piously set ourselves to the zealous cultivation of health by retiring, shortly after eight o'clock, to the bedroom which had been prepared for us, somewhat to our surprise, by a venerable chamber-maid in black broadcloth and gold-bowed spectacles.

Prolonged silence.....

"What time can it be?"

"Good! so you are not asleep!"

"Asleep one's first night in Rome! The air is full of electric influences, and glorious ghosts, and—and [yawningly] the music of the spheres."

"The air is fuller of must and dust, which that musty, fusty, crusty old chamber-maid stirred up with his solemn old paws; and all the music you hear is that squeaky old bag-pipe in the café below; and, what is worse, it is only ten o'clock!"

"Is that all? Heigh-ho! What was it that Murray said about service to-night at the French Church?"

"Military mass: fine music!"

"Let's go! It will be over in season for St. Peter's. We might as well make a night of it; for what with the air, and the music, and the witchery of a first night in Rome, there is no sleep for us."

Forth we went into the night, as innocent of all knowledge of Roman topography as the Babes in the Wood; but, thanks to the special Providence which protects all "innocents," we came to no harm, although more than one villain must have spared us for the very joke of the thing. Brigandage was rife at the time even in the best and most frequented streets of Rome, and our course led us through gloomy by-ways, ill-lighted and unwatched.

Furthermore, so intoxicated were we with the rich old wine of classic, historic, artistic (in one word), Romantic association, which we had this day for the first time begun to drink, that ordinary caution seemed to have forsaken us, and we sought our way recklessly, asking it of here and there a passer-by; but oftener pausing under some less opaque street-lamp to deliberately unfold the map of our "Murray," whose red hue unblushingly bewrayed our greenness to every observer. This after midnight, in the tortuous paths which we struck out for ourselves, between the great dome of the Pantheon and the loftier dome of the Vatican. The only apology for this fool-hardiness is the prolonged army experience of the one, and the fascination of a rare "lark" to the other.

At San Luigi de' Francesi, where we paused on our way, a superb illumination of the high altar, a suffocating crowd of spectators (including, possibly, two or three hundred worshippers), and a mighty roar of good organ and execrable vocal music.

So child-like and absolute was our faith in Murray at that time that we stood until past one o'clock, Christmas morning, amidst the horrid din and oppressive odors, patiently waiting for the exhibition of the "fine music" and "the military mass with great pomp." But the music waxed coarser and more blatant till its final suicidal crash; and wherein consisted the militariness of the mass, which was celebrated pompously enough, we have yet to discover, unless it lay in the dozen French soldiers who shouldered arms and prowled through the aisles with their ugly hats on.

Reluctantly following the retiring multitude, we withdrew our unsatisfied souls and exhausted bodies; but speedily forgot all in the delicious excitement of searching for St. Peter's. To be sure the service was announced for three o'clock, but must we not (oh, innocents!) go early to get a seat? On we went. What cared we for cavernous streets, for weary feet, for lurking robbers? Were we not every moment drawing nearer and nearer to It—the wonder of the world? It was an epoch when our feet at last struck the old Pons Ælius, flanked by seventeenth century angels (which some one wittily calls Bernini's "breezy maniacs"), and when, crossing the Tiber, we passed under the shadow of that mighty tomb where Rome lies buried, with an angel balancing himself above the door of the sepulchre.

Ye who are whirled in millionaire state to St. Peter's, heralded and encompassed by commissioner, courier, and lackeys, and behold for the first time its glories, vulgarized by the garish sunlight, receive—whether ye will or no—the commiseration of a pair of foot-sore pilgrims who, following only the beams of a strange constellation—a starry cross shining afar, with no other attendants than the midnight stars—came out at last into the great Piazza, with no sound to break the sacred silence but the musical rhythm of the twin fountains, at once the simplest and the grandest in all Rome. There they stood, clinging to each other, thrilled and entranced in that awful solitude, scarcely daring to lift their eyes so far toward heaven as that Marvelous Dome, whose mere shadow crushed them. The darkness, and their excited imagination, magnified indescribably the proportions of the immense Cathedral in their view, until—what with the season, the hour, the solitude, the companionship, the weird duskiness, no mortal eye, I am convinced, ever beheld St. Peter's more impressively.

When our senses returned we realized that we were indeed all alone. The Piazza, which strikes the beholder often at first as disproportionately small, lengthened and broadened as we walked on and on toward the sombre pile. After we had passed the cruciform gas-lights not a gleam of light appeared, except here and there in the remote colonnades which shut in the Piazza. Obviously the sexton hadn't come, and we began to exercise our fledgling skepticism in fearing that Murray had blundered, and the Pastorella was not for our ears.

After sitting for some time on the great flight of steps leading up to the Cathedral, meek and subdued under the natural action of our fatigue, the languor of the hour, and the reaction from our ecstasy, we suddenly discovered an apparition under the colonnade on our left. One of the Papal guard was pacing his beat sullenly, occasionally glowering at us as suspicious characters. Having projected at him—done up in choice French—the Yankee question, "What time are the meeting begun?" he received it, metaphorically, on the point of his bayonet, and gruffly rejected it. But here, as often, German proved our angel of deliverance. The guard could not withstand the same inquiry done up in his vernacular burr, so he graciously informed us that the sacred doors would open at three o'clock—and not till then.

Returning a quarter of an hour later from an unsuccessful search for a cup of black coffee, in which to drown our impatience, we found that a few shivering shades had crept into view at immense intervals along the great flight of steps. To our distempered vision they seemed the remorseful ghosts of Nero's band of tormentors, who were wont to kindle into awfully grotesque torch-light devout martyrs for the illumination of this old arena, and who on this holy night were come to do grievous penance where once they kept impious revel. But when at last an official ascended the steps and unlocked the massive door, we recognized somewhat offensively the mortality of those with whom we came in contact, as we pushed with the now numerous crowd into the vestibule. So high did my enthusiasm run that for a moment after the sudden illumination of this vestibule I mistook it for the Basilica itself, but fortunately did not beat a hasty retreat, like the Yankee of the British Apocrypha, who departed inveighing against the "conceit of these fellows, when their confounded old meetin'-house ain't any bigger than Brattle Street!"

Having lighted the great lamps of the vestibule, our "light-bearer and path-preparer" unlocked a little side-door, and, as we followed him curiously with our eyes, began to ascend a flight of stone steps, torch in hand. We were half inclined to follow bodily, not knowing but through that strait gate our way to the Holy of Holies must lie. But we refrained, although a dozen men pressed after him; and presently the bells of the tower rang out merrily, and the ringers came tumbling down the steps, and unlocked at last the temple itself to our eager feet. The romantic excitement of the time and place almost overpowered us as the people lifted the ponderous leathern curtain and we passed in.

In a moment the crowd had melted away in the immensity, and we stood alone in St. Peter's in the dead of Christmas-eve. The delicious atmosphere rapt us away into a trance of delight. Far away tremulous stars faintly glimmered before the high altar; near us all was dim, save that on our right a lamp burned before the exquisite Pietà of Michael Angelo, the Mater Dolorosa holding the dead Christ in her arms. The Lord pardon thy servant in this thing, if in the house of Rimmon I bowed down myself then and thereafter, whenever I entered the cathedral, feeling that the living Christ was not far from that little chapel! It was strange, and consoling as strange, to kneel on this storied pavement, and offer petitions for the little soul far away whose sweetest eyes were at that moment just opening to the dawn of her first Christmas. With hearts at rest we wandered through the beautiful twilight, dimly discerning the magnificence of the pavement and the columns, and the stately grandeur of statues and sepulchral monuments, with whose minutest lines we subsequently became familiar, till finally we stood by the great baldacchino which flaunts its stolen bronze beneath the pure majesty of the dome.

As we reverently approached the marble railing which incloses the shrine of St. Peter's chair we started back abashed as we saw below us, kneeling on the floor of the Confessional, no other than the Holy Father himself. It was only after repeated glances at the majestic figure, and a furtive consultation of our Handbook, that we were reassured that we were not trespassing upon private devotions, but were viewing instead Canova's admirable statue of Pius VI. This monument contrasts pleasantly with the self-complacent attitudes of the majority of his predecessors and successors throughout the cathedral.

It was now after 3 o'clock. On either side of the altar are a few permanent "pews," in Yankee parlance. In one of these we solemnly seated ourselves, wondering at the scantiness of the congregation. Half a dozen gentlemen and ladies were near us, but where were the crowd who had entered with us? After patient waiting for half an hour without sign of increased illumination, parson, choir, or congregation, our attention was fixed, during our restless glances about us, by a brilliant light in a chapel far down the nave. Suspecting the truth, we leave the upper seats of the synagogue as speedily and shamefacedly as possible, and hastening to the blaze, find that there indeed is service already begun—and why not, for is this not the chapel of the choir? The half-dozen benches were of course already occupied by less punctual worshippers, so that we "early birds," instead of winning the proverbial reward, were doomed to stand throughout the service.

Every thing around us was novel. The altar was one blaze of light. The little chapel was crowded suffocatingly as to its auditory; while its equal number of priests, etc., spread themselves aggravatingly at ease in their ample stalls. In the topmost range were seated the biggest wigs, or rather tunsures, comfortably wrapped in ermine capes; below them sat a row of gray squirrel-skins; and still lower, violet robes with tunics of lace and muslin; while last of all came a bench full of violet and very sleepy boys. This last bench frequently sent forth skirmishers into the midst of the melée, who darted hither and thither armed with candles and authority by no means little or brief. Once in a while an ermine or a squirrel who had overslept himself would come pattering in, with a bow for the altar and a profounder bow for his fellow-rodents, who reciprocated the compliment without intermitting the discordant, but it is to be hoped devout, growl, which they had been pleased to set up before our entrance.

When at last the grand procession came marching in with candles, crosiers, mitres, and what-nots, I am afraid somebody thought the Grand Mogul thereof was no less than Pio Nono himself, and gazed accordingly with quickened pulse-beat. But it was only a comfortable cardinal-bishop who played he was Pope, with gorgeous paraphernalia to perfect the illusion. After his attendants had marched him in and deposited him in his gorgeous seat, as if he had been a big doll which they had just found in one of their red stockings, they at once set themselves at work in awkward boy-fashion to undress him to an alarming degree, and then to attire him again in what a Yankee would call his "store-clothes," and finally to prance about him admiringly, precisely as my baby is now doing with her beloved doll Minnie. This Doll behaved well, considering his provocations; and when at last his tormentors had retired to a little distance to rest themselves and survey their treasure, he gazed complacently upon his fat, bejeweled fingers, spread out upon his knees, and seemed to think the rôle of show-puppet not so bad after all.

During the lull we inspected our fellow-auditors. Judging from appearances there were among them not more than ten Romanists, and the majority of the assembly were unmistakably English. Murray very properly condemns all improprieties in the behavior of tourists during Romish ceremonials, but it was just a little funny to notice the anxious subservience of that autocrat's slaves—"Britons never will be," notwithstanding. Having read in their authority that a black dress and veil were en règle for all services in the Sistine Chapel, and for reserved seats at the ceremonies in the Basilica of the Vatican during Holy Week, almost every dowager and damsel of them all was scrupulously clad in weeds on this joyful anniversary, and exposed herself to rheumatisms and catarrhs by the supererogatory concession of a flimsy veil in lieu of a sensible hat. Furthermore, these excellent women (like the aggravating wife in Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities") "flopped" at the least provocation, and some of them were sure to go down at the wrong time, and discover the blunder just in season to lift up their heads and stare about defiantly for any chance observer during the solemnest parts of the service. Quite a number, indeed, knelt unflinchingly during the whole ceremony, so as to be on the safe side.

There was, however, one Aunt Betsey Trotwood who stood bolt upright with Protestant lip, sneering and nose sniffing even at the very instant of the elevation of the Host. An outraged official behind her whispered "down," but she only tossed her head an inch higher, and settled herself more firmly upon her broad English basis; whereupon by a dextrous application of his staff of office to the rear of the rebellious knees, he brought her suddenly into position, where she had the sense to remain.

When one's conscience forbids sufficient compliance with the prescribed rites of any place or season, what alternative remains to good-breeding but to forego the service? That boor who, having solicited the honor of presentation to Pio Nono, refused to receive the customary papal benediction, deserved a sharper rebuke than that of the gentle-eyed father, "I think the blessing of an old man could do you no harm!"

But to return to the chapel of the choir. Amusing Britons ceased to interest when the heavenly music of the Pastorella began. We have longed to lay hands on the score, and assure ourselves whether this music were really more seraphic than we had ever heard besides. Certainly our enjoyment of its exquisite harmony was so great that the three hours' standing which we endured for its sake were of little account to us, and the strains which still float in our memories are marvelously sweet. The organ was superbly played, and the choir of male voices left no room for desire that Patti, or even Jenny Lind, had been there. The soprano was singularly smooth and sweet. Possibly the beauty of the music was enhanced by its contrast with the responsive chanting of the squirrels, ermines, etc., wherein they went on to iterate and reiterate in the gruffest and most snuffling manner that they were respectively Owls of the Desert, Pelicans of the Wilderness, and Bulls of Bashan.

Talk of Yankee expectation! Every priest and Levite in Rome takes snuff, and uses a great banner of a yellow pocket-handkerchief with a resonance that would put to shame the most catarrhal State Legislature in our country, while no spot or time is sacred to them. Our good Abbé S—— told us, with the naivest delight (as proving the Vicegerent's humanity), that he actually saw the Pope take snuff as he was going up to the altar to celebrate Mass!

This is an old scandal. As long ago as Pope Urban a bull of excommunication was issued against any priest who should introduce his snuff-box into his official service, whereupon Pasquin turned against the Pope a blast from the sacred canon, quoting Job's remonstrance: "Against a leaf driven to and fro by the wind wilt thou show thy strength, and wilt thou pursue the light stubble?"

This Christmas service was shamelessly disfigured. One gross fellow, upon whom devolved the onerous duty of holding up a candle while the Doll spelled out occasionally a sentence from a big book held before him by another obese boy, when he rested from his labors sat just behind the Cardinal, and actually spat offensively directly before the holy altar upon the stair of which he sat.

It was good to go out into pure daylight, for as we descended the steps the guns of St. Angelo hailed the rising of the Christmas sun with a grand salute, and our first night in Rome was over.

Twelfth-Night, the anniversary of the presentation of gifts to the Christ-child by the three kings, is the favorite gift-season in Rome. Santa Claus is ousted by a certain old beldame, yclept Befana (corruption of Epiphania), wizened and ugly, who delivers rods to bad and presents to good children. Tradition reveals something to the following effect in regard to her origin and history. She seems to have been the prototype of Martha, the famous housewife of Bethany.

When the gorgeous train of the three kings swept by her domicile she was absorbed in the fascinations of Spring cleaning, and in response to all entreaties to gaze at the holy cavalcade, she only brandished her broom the more zealously, saying: "I'll see them when they come back!" But, alas! every body knows that they returned by another way; and wicked King Herod was foiled, and poor old Befana stands to this day, broom in hand, and eyes protruded, looking in vain for glories which she will never, never see. It is not strange she should be so implacable toward even childish peccadilloes, inflicting present pain to avert eternal dole.

Why all the Roman world should flock to the Piazza di San Eustachio on this famous night I know not; but thither they have been, year after year, since the beginning, and find rare entertainment for their pains; and with them went I, under the protection of a party of Americans, on the last anniversary, stealing away from my sleeping invalid like an arch-conspirator. It was after midnight, yet the Corso was all alive, and every shop whose specialty is eating, drinking, or articles of virtue, open and thronged. It was charming to meet the fathers, mothers, big brothers, godfathers, bachelor uncles, etc., hastening home with love-laden eyes and hands, or in eager pursuit of some treasure for the little people who lay dreaming compassionately of poor old Befana.

As we approached the Pantheon the crowd grew denser and the excitement deepened. The streets leading into the Piazza di San Eustachio were barred against the entrance of carriages, and filled, like the Piazza itself, with booths for the sale of every imaginable commodity, the vendors watching all night for the chance of disposing of their wares to the turbulent crowds. It was pitiful to see some of these sales-people; weary women and sleepy children shivering and screwing open their eyelids all the long night for a possible handful of baiocchi. Some of the more prosperous were furnished with a large brasier of burning coals, and still more with the national scaldino—the little earthen basket for embers, which seems the chief solace for Roman women, rich or poor. As the entire vicinity was brilliantly illuminated by candles and torches of every description, and by vessels of oil with floating wicks, the effect was startling to a novice.

I was at first too dazed by the wild scene to enjoy it, and repented bitterly my escapade. The cries of the vendors, the chaffering of the buyers, the unrestrained laughter and babble of the spectators were crazing. Every few moments we were forced aside by the approach of a grotesque procession of revelers who came dancing down upon us, sounding trumpets, beating tambourines and drums, blowing whistles, working gigantic "jumping-jacks" (three feet and more in height), with innumerable other "soul-stirring" and "ear-piercing" devices. Our party was eminently grave in its composition, made up as it was of two clergymen of the Dutch Reformed and the Methodist Churches; three ministers' wives; with the excellent physician to the American Legation and his wife, whose hospitality and kindly offices toward their countrymen and countrywomen visiting Rome are above praise.

But here were we in the midst of Bedlam, and our only alternatives were instant flight or a pell-mell entrance into the revel. While I was preparing myself for the first a shrill blast in my ear, discharged by no less a personage than our portly Dominie himself, quickly succeeded by the deafening flourish of a tambourine above my head by his elegant little wife, provoked me to the second. In five minutes' time, following our leader, the entire party were furnished with the peculiar Befana whistle in the form of parti-colored plaster images, or with ringing tambourines, and were doing their utmost to swell the din. It was noticeable, and perhaps humiliating, to Independence-day braggarts to see how wild and apparently uncontrollable the sport could wax, and yet nothing take place which was either brutal or offensive. There was no drunkenness, no fighting, only unbridled jollity. So fascinating did the sport become that even the silence of the streets on our return did not quell it. We whistled and rung our merry bells to the last, even sounding a defiant blast in the ears of the innocent sleeper at home.

This was our matin service. After dejeuner my friend and myself, with her bright Baby Bell and her nurse, went to vespers at the church of Ara Coeli.

In this ancient church, built on the site of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, the wooden Bambino now usurps the place and healing prerogative of the uglier (if possible) bronze wolf, to which Roman women many centuries ago brought their sick children in faith.

A flight of 124 steps, which once served as the approach to the Temple of Quirinus, now leads up to the church. Up these steps climbed great Cæsar on his knees once upon a time, and at their foot Rienzi fell, and so did Baby Bell. These magnificent steps were crowded with worshipers of the Bambino and of Mammon. Devotees and sight-seers made their ascent slowly through the press of vendors, who detailed clamorously the virtues of their wares, consisting of books, pictures, rosaries, and charms of every sort.

The pictures and images most popular among the devout were shameful caricatures of the Christ-child and truthful copies of the sacred Bambino, whose miraculous graces and gifts are the prime care of the Franciscans of the convent connected with this church. As the country people hold the Bambino in special honor, and flock to its feast, this was our most favored opportunity for seeing picturesque costumes, and we lingered long on the steps, observing the various groups as they arrived, and the exhibitions of national shrewdness, drollery, and superstition.

The Bambino ought to be good in atonement for its unspeakable hideousness. It was (of course) wrought from a tree of Mount Olivet by a pilgrim, who, as an artist, must have been like Jean Paul's grandfather—"poor but pious." This devout hewer of wood having fallen asleep over his chopping, that Pre-Raphaelitist of artists, St. Luke, (of course) happened along, and added the finishing touches with his ubiquitous brush. It strikes an unprejudiced inspector of this twin composition that either artist might have done better with "t'other dear charmer away." Their united efforts have certainly produced the strangest of all strange gods. Its uncouthness is somewhat concealed by a rank overgrowth of diamonds, rubies, emeralds, etc., sown lavishly by the halt, maimed, and blind whom it has healed. It is borne in state to the bedside of the rich and noble invalid, while the poor carry their sick to the Presepio itself. The thing can always be seen for a fee (being displayed to the curiosity-hunter after various preparatory genuflections and incensings on the part of the pious showman), but from Christmas to Epiphany its healing beams arise without money or price.

Among the stories current in Rome is one of a devotee, whose zeal outran her honesty. Being the mother of a frequently ailing family the draft upon purse and time made by the employment of the Bambino became oppressive. Accordingly she planned and executed with holy guile the following device: Procuring from the nearest carpenter, or whittling for herself a counterpart of the idol, she seized the first opportunity when the Bambino was making a professional call at her house and confiscated it bodily, sending back to the unsuspecting Franciscans the "counterfeit presentment," adorned with the true relic's gewgaws. All went well that day in the lady's home, and all went ill in the Convent. At night, however, according to the story, the vigils of the monks were disturbed by mysterious knockings, and at last a plaintive voice cried, "I am the Bambino, let me in." Whereupon the holy men exclaimed, with horror, "Avant blasphemer! The holy Bambino is safe in the Presepio." But the pitiful voice kept pleading until the gates opened, and behold there was, indeed, the genuine image, clad only in its native graces, which, going forthwith to its manager, cast out the bogus baby and took possession of its own again. What became of the purloining materfamilias my informant said not.

In one of the chapels of the church we found a grand tableau of wax-figures, representing a scene in Bethlehem, which inspired Baby Bell's vociferous admiration. In the centre lay the Bambino in the Virgin's arms, she being appropriately dressed for the occasion in a robe of crimson silk, liberally spangled, surrounded by a bevy of most idiotic-looking representations of wise men and beasts. Over against this caricature of that divine scene, which St. Matthew alone has painted from the life, was erected a little platform, from which boys and girls declaim the glories of Mary and the miracles of the image, which no child of them all would not disdain as a doll. It was here that Hans Christian Andersen's Improvisatore made his debut.

The children were of various conditions; but there was not one of the dozen who spoke during our visit who could not have given practical lessons in elocution in any American college, which it would be to its advantage to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." There was none of the millinery display which bedizens the actors in our day and Sunday school exhibitions. The only attempt at any thing of this kind was in the person of a young woman of six or seven years, who, in honor of the occasion, had extinguished herself by her mother's big bonnet and long-fingered gloves; but there was, on the other hand, no trace of the shamefacedness and starched awkwardness which infects the bone and muscle and cuticle of young American speakers. There was one morsel of a boy, perhaps four years old, who combined the dignity of Everett, the honied sweetness of Curtis, the impassioned action of a Ward Beecher, with an inimitable grace of his own. This seems extravagant; but several American gentlemen who joined us on this occasion declared the speech of this infant by far the finest exhibition of oratory they had ever heard.

But our delight speedily gave way to other feelings. After vespers, chanted by filthy Franciscans, the great event of the year took place. A magnificent band of music was stationed in the nave, to whose superb marches a long procession, bearing gorgeous banners and splendid symbols, moved once and again through all the aisles of the church. Ecclesiastics of various ranks in rich attire, followed by a dreary file of unclean monks, whose bare feet matched in hue their dingy robes of brown. With various marchings and preparatory ceremonies the whole glittering train swept up to the chapel-tableau, and after profuse genuflection, and grimace, and waving of odorous censers, the image was given into their care, when they all marched and counter-marched again, with the Bambino carried at their head in the arms of a bishop, who resembled Daniel Webster, and looked quite as sheepish as that great statesman would have done if forced to carry a big black doll at the head of a Fourth of July procession. The scene without the church was even more amazing than that within. The great flight of steps, the pavement, and every window and loggia in the vicinity were thronged; and when the great procession finally moved to the central door, and the blushing bishop held aloft the Bambino without, as within the church, men, women, and children fell upon their knees in adoration.

Having viewed St. Peter's under a variety of aspects, it remained for us to behold it as the well-appointed stage for the exhibition of Pontifical High Mass, with all its pomp and circumstance. As Pius IX. has outdone the world in Mariolatry, it would be probable that Candlemas or Purification-day would, under his reign, be observed with peculiar honor as a high feast. Therefore we seized this occasion for going up to the great temple with some degree of that state which I have previously decried—we signifying a sister clergywoman and myself, the young divine preferring on this occasion a solitary "prowl" in search of spoils about Trajan's forum.

Robed and veiled in unmitigated black we drove toward the grand Piazza. As we drew near the throng of carriages increased until we were forced to fall into line, moving at a funeral pace behind a Cardinal's gilded coach, with its red umbrella strapped upon the roof. At regular intervals dragoons were stationed, reining their superb horses with one hand, while the other held a drawn sword. As we entered and passed down the nave, we found the magnificent pillars tricked out with gala crimson-and-gold, while before the bronze statue of Jupiter, or Jew-Peter (this musty pun could never be more relevant than here), burned the massive golden candlesticks, which cost either 20,000 or 200,000 scudi each—my note-book being blurry hereabout.

With minds conscious of rectitude of toilet we marched solemnly to the sacred inclosure, where on Christmas-eve we had sat in lone state, but which was now nearly filled with ladies in black. A stately chamberlain eyed us critically, and then graciously passed us in, we returning the gaze with interest, as his costume presented far more attractive points than ours—consisting as it did of a Spanish cloak of velvet, knee-breeches, a stiff ruff about the throat, and at the wrists soft ruffles of priceless old lace; and, above all, a superb necklace of gold.

Having been brought to approve the action of the Church Fathers in regard to costume long before I reached the church, as I saw with what modest grace the veil enfolded the lovely Madonna, my companion, a simple glance around the charmed circle to which we were now admitted convinced me that no costume could be so universally becoming as that ordained and rigorously enforced upon all aspirants to these seats of honor during church ceremonies. It occurred to us that were Protestant assemblies of worship less kaleidoscopic in coloring, corporeal and spiritual vision would be less distracted, and the number of obtrusively-homely women be reduced. Yet it was amusing to see how feminine ingenuity had contrived to introduce richness and even variety into the strictest compliance with the absolute law. Of course the robe—so it were black—might be of serge, silk, or regal velvet; while the head was adorned with every degree of quality and quantity, from the rich folds of a superb mantle (transformed by the aid of jeweled pins into a veil for the nonce) to a coquettish little barbe, or a square foot of simple bobbinet.

Before us sat a party of English women, whose improving conversation we could not escape. Among their words of wisdom were the following: "Who was the Bishop who officiated on Sunday?"—meaning at the English church just beyond the Porta del Popolo. "Bishop Whipple, dear."

"Where is he Bishop, pray?" "Mimosa, on the western coast of Africa!" But here comes a full drum corps playing lustily, as they usher in two regiments of soldiers, who, being stationed in a double row the entire length of the nave, stand with bayonets fixed during the service.

A brief interval; immense sensation among the girls around us; enter the Guardia Nobile. Our matron souls were not totally unmoved by their perfections. They are the flower of Roman nobility, and yet what knightly deed was ever done by the bravest of them all? The uncouthest soldier-boy in Yankee blue who ever kept faithful watch before a loyal camp outranks them. And yet, in the impassioned words of one of the improving English colloquists before us, "What lovely legs!" Golden helmets, with stiff white plumes, black "waterfalls" three quarters of a yard long, white knee-breeches, high top-boots, blue (scarlet when at their grandest) coats, completed the costume of these physically and sartorially magnificent fellows, who lead captive silly women (particularly English and American school-girls), and stand with drawn swords on either side of the Pope's chair. Next come in long procession the Swiss Guard in the horrible auto-da-fé-ish livery which perpetuates the single blunder of the inspired architect, sculptor, painter, poet, statesman, Michael Angelo, who designed it, nodding.

But behold Pio Nono himself borne in gorgeous procession of cardinals, bishops, etc. Although the twelve bearers walk softly, yet the old man reminded me of certain little boys who, aspiring to ride the elephant around the ring at a menagerie, find the exaltation more productive of sea-sickness and scare (against which pride struggles with a sickly smile) than of the anticipated triumph. However, the Holy Father shut his eyes bravely and stretched out two fingers in benediction, and was at last safely deposited in his crimson-and-gold robes before the altar, and after a moment's pause made for his throne at a rapid pace.

The choir from behind a screened balcony pealed forth glorious music, during which poor Pius again lost his liberty and his gay robes, and appeared at last clad in purest white.

A long ceremony of presentation followed, in which a score or so of church dignitaries marched in solitary state up to the throne and made their salam. The Cardinals graciously received the Pope's hand, which they kissed, humbly kneeling; inferior grandees confined their osculation to the cross on his slipper. Close at hand stood an obliging individual, who caught up the train of each courtier as he approached the throne, and giving it a dextrous double twist (as if by a species of patent clothes-wringer) saved him from inextricable entanglement in his redundant drapery, and enabled him to accomplish the ascent, descent, and retreat (turning the wringer backward for this last purpose, and giving the spreading train a final snap after the manner of laundresses with bed-linen) with all the independence of a Bloomer.

Now came the blessing of the candles. All the priestly throng were furnished with at least three feet of as yet unblest wax, as were the majority of princes, ambassadors, etc., who occupied sacred inclosures still nearer the Pontiff than ours. Each candle was laid across the knees of his Holiness, the owner thereof receiving it (the candle) kneeling, first thrusting his head under it as if it were a yoke, and retiring after another application of his lips to the sacred slipper.

A stout old gentleman, with white mustache, in gorgeous uniform, and covered with decorations, lugged up his great candle, and was rewarded by receiving the cardinal's privilege of touching the Pope's hand; he proved to be that martyr for the faith, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, instead of General Scott, as I at first imagined. Ignition instantly followed benediction. Star after star twinkled into light. Once more the Pope mounted upon his elephant, well-balanced this time, since, while one hand was outstretching in benediction, the other was grasping a huge lighted candle.

But it was a beautiful sight when the great procession swept through the immense Basilica, with the glitter of gold and silver and precious stones, the flash of intensest colors, and the thousands of stars gleaming through the glorious aisles. When it was most remote from us it seemed like the shimmer of the milky way, or like the going forth of Ursa Major with all the stars in his train. At its approach all the devout fell upon their knees, except the august Guardia Nobile, and the undevout bowed their heads in obedience to the injunction, Honor the king. Next us had been sitting a little old nun with a bundle done up in a white rag, which consisted of four dirty old candle ends, and a broken umbrella top (to the best of our judgment). Our attention was suddenly recalled from the procession by a sulphurous odor, and we discovered that our sister had deliberately struck a match and lighted her candle-ends, which were dropping greasy tears over our garments, while she alternately wept and prayed in a very rapture of devotion, and picked at the four obstreperous wicks with a crooked pin. Somewhat remorsefully (for we could but admire the absorbed adoration of the little old woman, however misplaced), we insisted on her instantly stanching the tallow lachrymals, but we suffered greater torments thereafter from a succeeding fit of smoky sulks which outlasted the mass.

The final ceremonial was High Mass, and in spite of what we regarded the error and superstition, the moment of the elevation of the Host was indescribably sublime. The silence of death bowed the mighty assembly. A triumphant strain from the hidden choir broke the awful spell. Upsprang the soldiery with metallic ring on the marble pavement; the Guard Noble, who had bent one knee before the awful Presence, recovered their position and tossed their golden helmets defiantly; uprose the devout people, and last of all up came our pious little nun, all begrimed with smoke and tears. The ceremony was over, save that the Pope solemnly "poored" (as the children say) somebody on the shoulders. Somebody trotted off with his pat of benediction to the next ermine-caped dignitary and "poored" him; Ermine-Cape "poored" Red-Robe; Red-Robe, Violet; Violet, Black; and so on down. Each seeming to say, as in the juvenile play of "Button," "Hold fast all I give you!"

But when the Pope arose for the general benediction he was a grand picture, with his benign countenance, his pure white locks, his venerable figure, and majestically flowing robes of "spotless samite" (for aught I know to the contrary); and I gladly bowed my unworthy head, feeling that "the blessing of an old man could do me no harm!"

And now to the choicest privilege of all the sanctuaries of that City of Sanctuaries.

Come with me into the Piazza di Spagna. No, not up the long flight of steps through the picturesque groups posed to catch an artist's eye; later, if you please, you may climb to Trinita de' Monti and listen to the piping vespers of invisible nuns; but turn to the left and enter this low passage-way. It leads us into a pair of homely rooms, filled with those who, like the Church of the Catacombs, must observe the rites of their faith in secret. Only under the shadow of the dear old Flag, whose stars never burned so bright to their vision as then, through battle-smoke and tears of exile, can American Protestants find protection for their simple worship in Rome. They are of many names, varying station, and differing creeds, yet they all bow at one common altar in response to the entreaty, "This do in remembrance of Me." Our weekly visits to this homely audience-room are among our dearest memories of Rome.

Late in the evening of our first Sunday in Rome the silence of our unfrequented vicolo was perturbed, and our hearts stirred to their depths, by a familiar strain of music beneath our windows: "Let the Hero born of woman crush the serpent with His heel; for God is marching on!"

The mystery was solved when we were ourselves initiated into one of the choicest privileges. Yes, "sanctuary privileges," possible to a homesick American tarrying in the Eternal City. The physician to the American Legation and his charming wife, mindful of the land from which they came out, and of its Sunday evening chantings in family circles of "Psalms and Hymns and spiritual songs," are wont to welcome their friends quietly on Sunday evening to their handsome appartamento. The fragment of the sublime battle-hymn which had so thrilled us, proved to have been trolled by a party of young Americans sauntering to their lodgings after one of these home-like gatherings at Dr. Gould's.

UNDER THE ARCHES.

OVER the darkening waters

Just at the dusk I came.

When I reached the terrace and archway

The lamps, in their crystal caskets,

Held the night's jewels of flame.

Twin cities, kept asunder

By the strong arm of the bay,

Saluted, one the advancing night,

One the departing day.

I watched the cloud summits, no longer

Volcanic with sunset fires,

The many-roofed city beneath them

Lay like a long, low hill range,

With delicate peaks of spires.

I said, "Oh, sombre city!

Between the clouds and the bay,

I think that my life is like you,

Between the night and the day;

Save that, from its horizon,

There lift no spire-like pointings

To the starry lights of a heaven

That is ever too far away."

Up from the marge of the waters,

Under the arch, there pass'd

A throng from the farther city,

Onward, with footsteps impatient,

Fleeting and following fast.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 134.—Q

They had crossed the darkening waters,

They entered the arch's gloom;

And I thought of another crossing—

Of the stream that is ever darkened,

To the archways of the tomb.

I said, "Full many a burden,

Oh, restless waves of the bay!

Shifting from shoulder to shoulder

Seaward you've hurried away.

Not cold, as I think, nor cruel

To the dead, drowned sorrow there;

But touching the white face gently,

Gently the swaying hair.

Full many a woeful burden

You've floated through shade and shine;

But you never have stilled the beating

Of a wearier heart than mine."

Suddenly turning, I saw them

Above me, far on the heights,

The throng, pressing upward and onward—

On, past the many mansions

And the long, long lines of lights.

And I looked, with a strong swift heart-thrill,

To the utmost stars of the dome,

As I thought of another ascending,

Up from the death-cold river,

Out from the sepulchre's archway,

On to the restful Home!

MR. MUDDLAR'S MISTAKE.

AS I am Mr. Muddlar, and the story I am about to tell is one of my own discomfiture, I may as well allow myself in the beginning the privilege of a little explanation.

I detest people who are always thrusting themselves and their private affairs upon the public, and still more do I condemn those who are constantly running into stupid mistakes. But all men are liable to err, and in an unforeseen moment I enrolled myself also in the immense army of blunders. I committed a ghastly mistake which was not so blamable, perhaps, but which has told most unfortunately on my social position. It has, in short, made me ridiculous, and to be made ridiculous is one of the most blighting disasters that can occur to an aspiring young man in fashionable society. Now if I had committed a crime—killed some one, for example, in the heat of passion, or put another man's name to a check for a large amount, I should only have had some temporary difficulty. If my lawyer had not been a sharp one and well fed, I might, perhaps, have been sent to the Penitentiary for a year or so, until a new Governor should have been kind enough to let me out. I might, too, have had some severe things said of me in the papers, but what is that? The mass of mankind would have ignored me completely, and the women, always kind to a young and handsome man, would have pined me from the bottom of their sensitive little hearts.

It was my misfortune, however, not to commit a crime, only to perpetrate a blunder, and for that I must suffer.

It was the night of the Prince of Wales's ball, and I, the happy owner of a ticket, had been among the first to avail myself of its advantages.

Inwardly thanking fortune that no troublesome sister, aunt, or cousin, could make use of my arm or require my protection, and bother me during that evening of pleasure, I walked into the ball-room a well-dressed, well-looking, and serenely happy individual.

To be well-dressed and well-looking is the duty of every one who enters the charmed circle of society; and since my highest ambition has always been to push my way into the most sacred inclosures of distinction, neither of these duties have I ever disregarded.

Not being a practical man as far as business is concerned, I did not thwart the inclinations of an uncle, who early offered me an allowance "till I should be able to make my own way in the world." This uncle, who lives up in the country, and is a youngish and active man himself, certainly has no idea of the expenses of living in New York, as I have done, for some years. Still I have been afraid to urge my ideas too strongly upon him, lest he should entirely ignore them, which would be decidedly unpleasant. In the mean time business does not grow, but the claims of society are constant and enormous. I am continually receiving, and continually accepting ball, dinner, and lunch invitations. I can sing a little, and therefore am very useful in amateur concerts and private theatricals, and, indeed, I may say without vanity that I am a leading man in my set.

To return to the ball, however. I must freely admit that not merely to appear before royalty, and to obtain my rightful share of Green Seal, had I donned my best dress suit and a three-dollar pair of Jouvin's gloves. I was engaged to Adeline Forbes for the first set, and to meet her, and to close up a little affair that had been some time pending between us, was the principal object of the expense I had incurred.

A man in my position, with a soul too large to come down to the dry details of business, and also a taste for elegant life such as I possess, has only one means of escape from the demon of poverty—he must marry an heiress. It is a painful sacrifice, I must admit; but one which, in my case, could not be forgotten or avoided. So, looking around on the "garden of girls" for the best and most eligible parti, I lit upon Adeline Forbes.

She was very plain, of course—heiresses always are. She was tall, thin, yellow, and had a particular twang in her voice which thrilled me to the back-bone; but she had many good qualities. In the first place, her property was large, and entirely under her own control; she was generous to a fault; and had, I was certain, a great regard and admiration for me. I had been for a long time hovering on the brink of an offer, and this night I was determined should finish up the proceedings.

I therefore hunted her out the very first half hour that I was in the walls of the Academy. She was on the arm of that disgusting fortune-hunter, Staples, with a splendid bouquet in her hand, but received me with the utmost pleasure, and a blush that was even more flattering.

"You have your bouquet, I see," said I, taking it out of her hand, while Staples retired in disgust. "I suppose you know where it comes from."

Now these remarks really mean nothing, and amount to nothing in case the bouquet is sent with a card; but in case of its being an anonymous gift (as flowers so often are), the person speaking gets all the credit. I can not afford to send bouquets, but I might as well get some credit for my wishes, if not for my deeds.

Adeline looked down and blushed again.

"I think I can guess," she said, archly; "these are your favorite flowers, Mr. Muddlar."

"Hit, by Jove!" thought I, but I said nothing. I only smiled and looked up at her (she was considerably taller than I) with a beaming expression.

"And what a lovely dress!" I went on to say, and how it becomes you. I never saw you look better than you do at this moment!"

This was perfectly true, but Adeline was a fright at the best of times. Just then the music struck up, and I, intent upon closing my business with Miss Forbes before she should be dragged away from me by her impatient partners, said the fatal words on the spot, and offered myself, heart and hand, to my scraggy goddess in blue and diamonds. Her answer rather astonished me, but was encouraging:

"I am somewhat taken by surprise," said she, "although I now see I should have been prepared for this, but I hardly supposed you were a marrying man. Last week I should have accepted you at once; something has occurred to-day, however, in my private affairs, to make me hesitate. You must give me time to think it over."

I trembled lest some fall in stocks should have imperiled her fortune. I should not, perhaps, have said any thing, but Adeline was amiable and obtuse, and I thought I could risk it:

"I hope," said I, "you are not troubled about any thing important—any miserable money affairs or losses; it is terrible to think of your being unhappy about any thing!"

Here she was joined by Staples, who had been dogging her for some time. She had no opportunity for the reply I hoped to hear; however, to keep her a few minutes longer, I proposed joining the great crowd that was going up to be introduced to the Prince of Wales.

Everybody remembers the catastrophe of that evening. Just as Adeline and I were advancing toward the dais, there was a sound as if of cannon going off, a sudden stir and tumult among the women, and Adeline Forbes, although on my arm, went down about two feet lower than her accustomed level, and I was left standing high and dry on the uninjured part of the platform.

For a moment my usual presence of mind deserted me; instead of immediately hauling her out of the pit, as I should have done, I rather hastened out of the immediate scene of danger, and when I recovered myself and returned to her aid, Staples had pulled her out and carried her away with him.

This was certainly a most unfortunate occurrence, but it was one I was powerless to prevent. No one with a particle of sense could be expected to run the risk of breaking a leg under such circumstances, and not being a very powerful or stalwart person, had the fair Adeline come down upon any part of my corporeal frame I should have been squeezed into jelly in the space of five minutes. So Staples got the better of me for a time, and I retired discomfited.

I may say, however, that I managed to pass the time till supper quite pleasantly, in spite of the disappearance of my fair one. I waltzed with several pretty young girls, who were good dancers, though bad matches. I was not introduced to the Prince myself, though I spoke to many that were; indeed I may claim to have interchanged some words with his Royal Highness in person, although probably unknown to him, for I managed so cleverly that in coming out of the supper-room he nearly knocked me down in the angle where I had taken my position, and when I begged his pardon he told me it was no consequence whatever; which was as much conversation as he exchanged with most of the people that evening.

But I now come to the point of my story on which I can no longer dwell with calmness. Certainly the "bottle imp" himself must have arisen out of the glass inclosure from which I took my first draught of Champagne, and firmly, although unseen, attached himself to my fortunes on that night. Never again was I to walk through the mazes of good society an unmarked man, and never to be sure that the smile with which I was greeted by a new acquaintance was not the result of a too intimate knowledge of my fatal mistake.

It was just after supper was announced, and I, always ready on a great emergency, had already made friends with a waiter, and was helping myself liberally to the good things provided, when I heard a soft and well-known voice behind me. The words were these:

"Why, there is Tommy Muddlar! I know him by his hair!"

Now I hate to be called Tommy, and allusions to my hair, which has an auburn hue, are decidedly disagreeable; but when the voice that spoke was that of Bessy Graham, the rosy-checked, little country maiden, whom I flirted with when I staid at my uncle's in the summer, and dreamed of all winter long, anger was simply impossible. I flew toward her immediately, with the newly-opened Champagne bottle in my hand.

"My dear Miss Bessy! When did you come to town? I am delighted to see you!"

The truth was, that was my second bottle of wine, and the unexpected pleasure of meeting my old friend threw me completely off my guard, so I said a great many very foolish things. In the first place, she was as pretty as pretty could be; fresh, fair, and gentle as a new-blown daisy, and with that arch, simple coquetry that is so attractive in the young and graceful. Then I well knew that she in her heart of hearts really preferred me to all the rest of the world. In her country home I had shone as a brilliant meteor, summer after summer, before her dazzled eyes, and now she appeared upon my theatre of action, and charmed me in return. Her dress was faultless; how, with her restricted means and country tastes, she could have contrived such a telling toilet I am at a loss to imagine; but there she was, fresh, radiant, and confiding, and all for me!

I soon saw that her manner was somewhat distrainée, as if some hidden sentiment she dared not divulge were struggling for utterance; and I felt at that moment that I should never marry Miss Forbes, come what might, and that Bessy, with her empty purse, was worth a thousand Adelines rolled into one.

The Champagne and sentiment had decidedly affected my mental vision.

"Bessy," said I, recklessly, "how is that wonderful uncle of mine? Does he never mean to die and leave me his money?"

"You wicked young man!" said she, quite soberly, "I hope he will do nothing of the sort. What are you good for if you can't make your own way in the world with so many advantages?"

"What advantages?" said I, breathless.

"No matter," said she, shaking her head, and looking extremely roguish; "there is an heiress here, at this very ball, I have no doubt, whom people say Mr. Muddlar is very devoted to."

"Upon my word, Bessy," said I, "it's all dencued nonsense! I have flirted a little with Adeline Forbes, but I don't care a pin for her, and you know it perfectly well. She is a tall, gawky-looking animal, and resembles a giraffe in crinoline. I can't bear her!"

"And you never seriously thought of marrying her?" said Bessy, her large soft eyes looking larger and softer as they were bent full on my face.

"No, 'pon honor I never did; and if you will marry me, Bessy, I will promise never to see Adeline Forbes again!"

By this time the wine was so completely in my head that I do not hold myself responsible for any of the remarks that followed. I told Bessy a thousand things that I might better have kept to myself, and concluded by offering to show her at a distance her dethroned rival. All this time she said nothing but blushed, and looked rather frightened at my vehemence. She would not even give me any sort of an answer, but threw me over for a definite reply till the next morning at her hotel. When I proposed to hunt up Miss Forbes, however, she assented, and put her hand in my arm immediately.

That was altogether the pleasantest night I ever passed in my life. Bessy knew no one but her escort, a fat old lady who troubled nobody, and, taking her under my protection, I threw expediency to the dogs and devoted myself exclusively to her. We danced together (I took good care not to introduce any one else), we walked together, and talked together till three o'clock in the morning, when tired, but radiant, I committed her to the care of the fat chaperon and bade her an affectionate adieu.

Then the excitement died away, and I knew that I had made an eternal fool of myself!

The reaction was sudden and complete. Had the floor opened for the second time that evening and swallowed me up I should have thanked my stars and gone down contented; Brown might have boarded me over, and I should have smothered and made no sign. As it was I groaned aloud in agony.

"What is the matter?" said Miss Forbes coming up, looking really anxious, "I have been standing near you for some time and you have not seen me. You look so ill, Mr. Muddlar, is any thing distressing you?"

Here was a lucky means of escape! Adeline was a nice girl after all, and as to money, she could buy out poor little Bessy a hundred times over. Perhaps after all I could take the back track in time—so I sighed and said—well, no matter what I said—but Adeline Forbes went home that night as much engaged to me as I was to Bessy, and I went home a perjured man, with two women on my hands and a frightful headache torturing my brain.

I may as well admit that I did not sleep any that night; indeed, I did not attempt it. Taking off my best coat, I wrapped myself in my traveling-shawl, and endeavored to meditate on my dreadful position. Finding this impossible, I put my head out of the window (my room is a sky-parlor in Bleecker Street, looking back), and tried to cool my fevered brow. Alas! there is a sailor living next door who keeps a parrot. This parrot was spending the night outside of the window, and hearing mine open began, with his usual vulgarity, to swear in the most frightful manner. He informed me that I was a fool forty times over, and wound up by requesting me, in every tone of which his shrill voice was capable, to go to the devil. Unfortunate wretch that I was, had I not already reached that goal?

I concluded, as the morning began to dawn, that I would write a note to Bessy and explain my position. She was a warm-hearted, confiding, simple-minded country girl, and after dropping some tears over my unhappy fate and her own disappointment, would return in a few days to her own quiet home, and disappear from my path forever.

As to Adeline Forbes, I was not such a fool as to let her slip through my fingers. Heiresses are not to be met every day, or married by young men without fortune or profession. Plain as she was and unlovable, she was nevertheless a prize, and after having gone as far, and succeeded as well as I had, no Bessy or any other woman should stand in the way of my happiness.

Happiness? Yes, I pondered over the word, but after repeating it once or twice it seemed altogether natural and proper. It is happiness to have one's debts paid, one's home palatial, and one's future secured. All this would come with Adeline Forbes, and even with such a drawback I could call it happiness.

I sat down to write my note to Bessy. It was long, affectionate, and explanatory. I told her that had my uncle done the handsome and proper thing this painful conclusion to our friendship would never have occurred. I explained the miserable state of my finances, the constant calls and drains that society made upon my time and purse, how unfitted I was for a quiet domestic life, and how unable to push my own way in the world, as the more sordid and grasping of my contemporaries seemed so well able to do. The end of the note, however, was the most delicate part of the affair. In it I intimated that I knew that there was one person who loved me better even than her fortune; she had plainly showed me that her feelings were beyond her own control, and that in my broken-hearted condition I was uncertain what the issue would be of this complicated affair. She was plain, she was awkward, she never could have my heart—that altogether belonged to Bessy—but she loved me to distraction, and I pitied her. If Bessy ever saw me dragged into a hapless marriage, let her not blame me, but blame, as I did, my wretched destiny and a sordid relative.

This was the end of the note. As I directed the envelope to the New York Hotel, where I knew Bessy was staying, I remembered that that too was the abiding-place of Miss Forbes.

This young lady was in a delightful state of orphanage. She had an old aunt who chaperoned her and did her bidding; but she was dependent and harmless; such relatives count for nothing in the domestic drama. Adeline was therefore to all intents and purposes an independent female.

As early as was proper in the morning I made my appearance at the New York Hotel, and requested of the obsequious waiters admittance to Miss Forbes's parlor. Under the circumstances this was nothing out of the way, particularly as Adeline always saw her company in her own suit of apartments. I was informed, however, that Miss Forbes had left word that I was to be shown into the public reception-room, and there accordingly, "chewing the cud of painful meditation," I remained three-quarters of an hour at least. At the end of that time I rose to go in search of the waiter who had taken my card, when I beheld advancing toward me two forms whose appearance and contiguity sent cold chills over me in rapid succession.

Here were Bessy Graham and Adeline Forbes, arm in arm, talking together, and walking directly toward me.

My first impulse was to take my hat and run; my next to see what was the meaning of this extraordinary conjunction of circumstances, and whether it bore upon me or not. I still hoped, fool that I was! A man with two women in league against him had better give up the game as lost; and the moment they came near enough to show the expression of their faces I saw that I was their enemy, and that they had made common cause against me.

They shook hands with me, however, with an assumed cordiality, and almost leading me into an unoccupied corner, they each drew up a chair and waited silently, as if for me to begin the conversation. Of course I said nothing. What could a man say who had got himself into such a ridiculous position? I took up my hat and began to rub it round with my glove, in a most conscious state of confusion, I have no doubt.

"I was not aware," said I, at last casting a dagger-like glance at Bessy, "that you and Miss Forbes were friends."

Bessy smiled a wicked, contemptuous smile.

"Yes, we are the best of friends," she said; "her aunt is also an aunt of mine, so we may be said to be almost related. That is not the point, however, Tommy Muddlar. You have offered yourself last night to two young women, and naturally they feel somewhat curious to know which offer you mean to stand by. Don't be afraid, my dear Sir," she added, blandly;

"speak your whole mind; we shall be able to bear the information, whatever it may lead to."

Just to think of that simple-minded child Bessy, talking to me in that style! I was petrified. "Bessy," said I, throwing into my voice all the pathos it was capable of, "did you get my note, and did you betray me?"

Here Adeline, who had said nothing so far, recovered her voice and spoke. "Bessy is my friend," she said, "Mr. Muddlar, and has done the kindest thing in her power in undeceiving me in this manner. Ugly as I am, a perfect giraffe in crinoline, I have a heart as well as a fortune. I do not wish to give one without the other. I believed you were sincere, why I know not, except that I am too credulous, and not a very good judge of character perhaps. Bessy has undeceived me, and I am eternally grateful—" She stopped, and the tears came into her eyes.

What a mistake I had made! This woman, after all, concealed real feeling beneath her uninviting exterior, while Bessy, little Bessy, was a viper, a vixen, and a termagant. What a double fool I had been!

"Thomas Muddlar," said Bessy, going on, and driving the iron still deeper into my soul with a malignity perfectly disgusting, "I consider your whole behavior in this matter as beneath contempt! I never did think much of you, since the first time I had the pleasure of meeting you under your uncle's roof. To eat a person's bread, and then to sneer and scoff at the bounty which keeps you alive, is a meanness of which I believe you alone are capable. This second development of character is, therefore, perfectly in keeping. It was a great restraint to listen to you last night in silence; I had a reason for it, however, and my self-control has proved extremely useful to all parties. I never had the least intention of accepting you for one moment; your pathetic note, therefore, was entirely thrown away."

"Then you have been deceiving me in the most shameful manner!" I said, angrily; "and what is more, I do not believe you now, it is all jealousy!"

Miss Forbes looked at me sharply.

"Mr. Muddlar," said she, "if I believed you capable of real love for Bessy I could forgive you all your sins against me. Heiresses," and she sighed softly, "are the natural prey of society, and must suffer in silence. If," she added, with much dignity, "want of money is the only bar between you two say so at once; I have influence, and can get some position for you, if that is the only difficulty in the way. I am entirely above petty enmity in a matter like this."

"Well, I am not," said Bessy, quickly. "I despise such characters from the bottom of my heart; and as to marrying Mr. Muddlar, I would not do it if he were like a Hindoo idol, incrustated in gold. I abhor fortune-hunters, and heiress-seekers, and men who live on other people's money. The man I marry must be honorable and independent as the day. Sneaks and parasites I detest!"

Bessy looked as angry as I ever saw a woman when she said this, but so handsome that I forgot every thing else as I looked at her.

"Where will you find this paragon?" said I, with a sneer.

"I have found him!" said she, abruptly, stopped and added with a smile that lit up her whole face like an illumination, "he is your uncle!"

Here was a death-blow. My heart died within me as I thought of my allowance; however, there was no use in compromising myself farther. I only said, hoping for a brief moment that it might be a hoax:

"Are you going to marry my uncle, Bessy Graham? I do not believe it."

"It is quite true, and your uncle is not very far off, and will confirm the statement if necessary, also my friend Adeline."

I turned to Miss Forbes, but not for farther information; I felt that that was useless.

"I owe you a humble apology, Miss Forbes," I said, taking my hat and preparing for departure. "Bessy has nothing to complain of in me that her vindictive nature has not been fully able to revenge; but to you I feel, and ever shall feel, grateful. You have a heart, and in this trying moment you have neither reproached nor contemned me. I only wish I could prove to you how much more attractive your kindness makes you appear in my eyes than any external advantages."

"It is no matter," said she, drawing away from my offered hand; "your opinions now can not influence me, and should never have done so. I have been weak, short-sighted, and I blame myself more than I do you; but you have been unkind, most unkind!"

"I know it, and you most generous; but forgive me, Adeline, I will never trouble you again; let us part as friends."

I put out my hand again, and she took it, and let me hold hers a moment with a most lovable pressure. I really believe if that confounded giggling Bessy had not been looking on I should have carried the day after all! I really loved Adeline Forbes in my heart at that moment, and with nobody standing by I could have made her believe it; but no, the Fates were against me. Two gentlemen entered together at the moment and greeted us with many smiles and much boisterous warmth. My uncle and Mr. Staples.

I am quite certain that the latter had been within hearing of the best part of the conversation, for Bessy, I think, would not have told and Adeline dared not; but any way it was all over town the next day, and my chance of a rich marriage was gone completely.

This is the story of my great mistake; and as every body has joked me about it until all shame was lost on the subject, I determined to tell the whole truth of the case, and so make an end of it forever.

Of course the women would have nothing more to say to me, and the men were glad to have an opportunity to laugh and sneer. But it did not make so much difference after all. Adeline Forbes, in an unobtrusive way, got me a lucrative position in a friend's banking-house, which has rendered me for some years independent of my uncle and Bessy. My business this summer will take me abroad for a year or two, and when I return, if Adeline Forbes is still unmarried (she has refused Staples I know), who can tell, after all, what may be the upshot of Mr. Muddlar's Mistake?

A STUDY OF LEGS.

SIX o'clock and ten minutes.—Here's a nice-looking place in the basement. Now for a little refreshment. I'll pop down here a moment. "Coffee and toast, my lad, as quick as luck." I wish this stool had a back. I'd give a dollar to lie down a quarter of an hour. What, Legs—all Legs! People on the sidewalk above me, all hurrying along Broadway, are nothing to me but legs. Brown legs, blue legs, gray legs, and black legs; big legs, little legs, long legs, short legs—all kinds of legs. I see nothing of their bodies or arms from my seat, but I seem to make out the whole of each man. What nonsense! What I see is only shaking trousers of various hues and dimensions. But there are limbs in each, and in each limb a thousand pulses and a thousand nerves.

There goes a leg. It is gone. My hat upon it, that leg is after the doctor. It moved with an indescribable anxiety and urgency. There was a tongue higher up thronged with unspoken words of announcement and appeal. The heart that was pumping the blood into that leg was leaping with burdensome solicitude. A wife was dying. I see her. She knows she is to go. The doctor said as much days ago. She tells her husband not to seek the physician. But is there no hope? She might be saved if the doctor would hurry. She might die before he could return. What anguish in his hesitation! A kiss and an embrace, passionate to violence, and he goes. "Don't leave me, John!" John's answer is a choking sob and a burst of tears as he rushes to the crowded and heedless street to fight a way through the throng with those poor aching legs I saw. Oh, John, turn back—

There goes a leg of substance. There is good rich fat in those pantaloons. Tenderloins rare, fine old Madeira, with now and then a nip or so of the pure vinum adustum straight from the Custom-house—all have a say in it. That leg is on its way to a carriage. It was in favor of every forward movement of the Army of the Potomac, regardless of loss of life. It was not a leg to be daunted while substitutes averaged $600 and railroad stock was high. That was a loyal leg, and, with the blessings of Providence and a lucky turn in the Stock Exchange, it staid loyal throughout the war.

There is a blue leg—two of them, though not well matched. I see whose they are. They are carrying a soldier to his agent for the fiftieth time to inquire whether the Pension-office has placed him on the roll. The last time he inquired a letter from the Commissioner was shown him to the effect that the sworn affidavits of three respectable soldiers who saw him bayoneted did not prove any thing, but he must get the captain or some other officer he served under to certify to the facts "on his honor." He is thinking now whether his agent wrote to the Commissioner what he told him to say, viz.: That one of his officers was a man of honor, and would not certify because he did not personally witness the wounding; and the other, who did, refused the favor of a certificate. And he told him to say, moreover, that the oath of a private soldier was better than the word of honor of an officer. But, poor fellow! what do you know of law? You had better give up looking for your pension. Every body knows you were hurt in battle, but you are an unpopular fellow with your officers, and you can not get your pension without them.

There's a leg that will win. It is a long leg, with a bad piece of old dry-goods on it. It is not springy, agile, or quick; yet not sluggish; nerveless, and insensible. It carries an unhappy man, who has always been worsted, but who never stays whipped. He takes long, camel-like strides, putting his foot here and there irregularly, but always—just like that now—with a dogged conclusiveness and a fair, flat emphasis. He is all head and feet when he walks, the rest of him taking all adventitious shapes, but these two extremities being ever consistent with each other, like opposite poles of a battery. His voice is unmusical—I can see it in the crook of his knee now—and his manners undignified. His clothes are decent, for he is too unaffected to dress in ostentatious rags, and too negligent of social favor to dress genteely; and as barely decent, he is never looked at except when he unconsciously provokes derision by acting as if he were somebody. He never can comprehend how he should be so strangely misunderstood by all the world; and now, at forty, he begins to feel as if he did not care. He does not see his way clearly through the world, but plods on. He will not conform to the world, and does not dream of the world conforming to him. He does not care much about it. His ambition died with his youth, and he is a lonely bachelor. That leg has length of days and invincible tenacity. Other men will be declining when his strength will be at its height. Go, old fellow, and marry! Forty is only a little too old for you. For the world will shortly take a turn that will give you some hand in its affairs. Such a leg as that never got cold since the world was made without a great fuss being made over it by the king, the bishop, and the biographer, unless casualty locked its pulse before old age. The reason you have not been famous for twenty years past, man, is that you would not cheat the world out of its honors. But then if you had done so, by this time you would have been found out. Jog on, long leg. The French Academicians are talking about you now, a little, though they know nothing about your name or person. Prepare yourself, old glum, with some babies and a fireside. Without an Aurora the fogs of your long night will hover over your coming noon; but she would shine them away, and give you a morning for the long and cheerful day which will come for you yet. But he is gone to his star-gazing.

There's a leg that does me good. It is clothed in coarse and dirty cloth, but comes to a neat, fair fit. It is rapid, yet I see by the passive in-step that it is fatigued. It is going home to sweet kisses and a hot supper. It has bustled about a shop all day, and was glad when the six o'clock bell rang. The industrious and skillful mechanic always adjusts his clothes, washes his hands, and presents a respectable mien when he goes home. He knows where little Kitty will meet him, how Neddy will run, and the baby will peep. His wife is not waiting for him, for I see by that leg that I am thinking about the right man. She will look at the clock, and then bring in the tea, because she knows just when he will come. This evening she allows fifteen minutes later, because George is to go to a bookstore over on Grand Street for a copy of a new book of the rudiments of science for children, and to see a sick woman over on the Bowery. She feels pleased, for she has good news to tell him. She has just been told by the agent that the landlord (mirabile dictu!) has lowered the rent in consideration of their careful tenancy, and agreed for another year at a handsome abatement. With this difference George is to buy drawing materials for Jane, some additional furniture for the parlor, and pay for photographs for distribution among kindred and friends, besides an increase in the amount of the customary charities, and have yet a smart sum for the savings-bank. Go on, George! You are the typical citizen. On you and your likes rest all the glories of nations and peoples. From fire-sides such as yours emanate all the institutes of public order, public good, and public will. Let all the learned, the great, and the rich pass away, and you would still be a nation, great as ever, a society perfect as ever, a people mighty as ever. Go home, George, where you belong.

That leg, now, is a brisk one. Pretty as a patent medicine bottle, it comes down into the neatest little boot of all the world, and pats along with a thousand supernumerary little jerks, as if, like an echo, it would die if it stopped, or as if, like the dancing moon in the water, it had so many motions that it did not know what to do with them. That is a young leg. Its nerves are strung at the golden thumb-screws by the rosy fingers of Hope, who trails her shining gossamers, thick as hair on the head, through the soul of that youngster, and shuts out all winds, but the breeze of her own impalpable wand with which she shakes the shining delusion into infinite complexions for his rapture. Is she a deceiver? No. He deceives her. He abjures conscience and reason and devolves upon Hope the responsibility for his happiness through life. She is doing as best she may. But, young man, hold still a moment. Listen! If only you could keep your legs still, your head would soon reckon up your account. Whose boots are those? Whose watch is that? Whose money is in your pocket? "Necessities to a gentleman." Eh? Nothing is necessary that is not right. "Trifles easy to reimburse." Yes, but to whom easy? Not to the poor, and the rich are those who have, not those who expect riches. I see you, long years hence, in situations too terrible to describe to you. But I see you, at the best, long years hence, in shabby and threadbare clothes, with cast-down countenance, wasted form, and feeble step, soliciting humble but honest employment, with a real desire to begin a new life. But your heart will be too heavy with its burden of bitter regrets. Gentlemen's clothes, watches, and pocket-money you will not have. That leg I see now, so elastic and elegant, will be trembling and languid, awkward with shame and ugly with premature age. Why not put off the fine things now? Think what you would make by it. All prepossessions in your favor, years of industry and opportunity before you, and all the blessings and powers of youth still yours—what should you care for boots, watches, and pocket-money with that leg I see on you now? Take the habiliments and lose the legs, or throw aside the habiliments for a while and save both them and the legs. Save your legs; did I say? Your honor—your soul, boy! Save it. But he don't hear me. He's gone.

More legs—that is a coward's. His knees are lifted high at each step, while the lower leg and foot dangle, and the latter slaps the ground like a shingle. He walks with his abdominal muscles and helps them with his shoulders, which he does by relaxing the breast muscles and turning his elbows outward. The step is heavy and decisive once made, because the creature has not courage enough to qualify it. Poor coward! The scorn of women, the sport of wags, the tool of tyrants. Cowards are not always born so, as it is certain that the brave were not always born to intrepidity. Will nobody speak a word for this worst punished of all offenders? Shrinking sensibility in childhood can be turned into cowardice by calling it by so shameful a name. The child does not doubt that it is really natural irresolution; and to believe you have not the courage to do it, is saying that you are afraid to do it. These legs in all their life, perhaps, have encountered no danger but what it was possible to fly from; and they fled, of course, because their owner, believing himself a born coward, had sense enough not to expose himself. That his passion of resistance is moderate argues not against his capacity for iron firmness, but conclusively in favor of his having—as those legs unmistakably have on all occasions—self-possession enough about him to know how to escape. Yet those legs are delicately moulded—I see by the knee-pan—but muscular, I see by the calf. The instep is flattened by the habit of gait, but its mobility in the air shows its high arch, an unerring mark of manhood, of nerve, and of daring. This coward was born to no weakness but a humane horror of the brutal and sanguinary, and an exquisite sense of outward contact, spiritual or physical. That he should shrink from violence should have but exalted the courage to which he was born. But the vulgar notion of courage—that is, a love of fighting, he never thought of questioning; for what priest, or poet, or historian ever did? and as he was most distinctly conscious of an unspeakable horror of a fight, he never undertook to withstand danger like others, until, in course of time, he acquired a habit of living in a state of apprehension, which made it the principal business of his life to foresee and escape danger from every thing. Come, man, don't be afraid; you are young yet—put down your foot like a man, walk with your legs, swing your arms, look straight ahead, fill your lungs and allow your abdomen to go about its business. There's pluck enough in you for a terrier; though your wife don't believe a word of it, and never did, poor girl! She found out your imagination, your taste, your love of excellence, and, especially, your love for her. But that you concealed three years for fear Bob Davis, a rival, would knock you down. Now I'll give you a definition of bravery. You go home and ask your wife whether it is satisfactory. If she says so, all right. Act on it. Say this: A brave man is one who will not desist from a just purpose in consequence of peril to his person. If you stick to that your neighbors will find you as brave as themselves. And if you stick faithfully to it you will, as any man—but particularly the great murderers of history would have been—be pretty sure to get to the end of life without one single fight. But slap, slap goes the poor fellow's feet on the sidewalk, and other men's legs thicken the throng.

Here is a leg to write a book on. That is a thing of power. It is long, sinewy, and easy in motion, but with a marching precision that wastes not a fibre's tension. The foot is planted so firmly and regularly that the ground seems always to smooth itself where this man walks. No inequality in the pavement disconcerts the perfect action of the limb; and there is a consciousness of power in the gait that inspires an instinctive action in all the neighboring legs to get out of the way. The person moves fast, but the legs do not seem to be quick because they measure the time and space, and fit both without any jerking. That man is a born leader. Among all mankind he is most certain to find his level. Men, however proud, delight in being proud of some greater object than themselves. What is voluntarily conceded is not so great as what can oblige concession. Greater self-confidence than mine obliges me to concede leadership to you, Iron-leg. Arrogance is your greatness—and great it is as the world goes; for by that you have the most skillful, the strongest, the most gifted hands in the community where you reside to turn your grindstone. Imputed talents show in you fruits like real ones do in others, because you conduct a kind of presidency over the riches of other minds, and even claim that doing so is exercising the highest talent of all. Grant you, Iron-leg, it is the talent of kings and rulers; but you will never get a presidency over the intellectual progeny of the tramping old stargazing bachelor, whose legs I saw a while ago, nor over the poet's song, the painter's pencil, or the philosopher's microscope. You—

Bless me! Here is my coffee and toast, cold as a dog's nose! Now I must be after my own legs.

THE FOOD OF BIRDS.

“HOW rich our Lord God must be!” says Martin Luther in his Table-Talk; “I do verily believe that to feed the sparrows in Germany costs Him more than all the revenue of the King of France.”

What do all the birds eat? Where do they all find food enough to support their own lives and the lives of their young? These are questions which are continually coming up in everyday life, together with that other set of reproachful queries as to why the birds don't eat up the caterpillars and canker-worms, and let alone cherries and strawberries. In view of the very general interest which attaches to the matter, and of the frequency with which the above-mentioned questions are asked, it seems strange that so small an amount of organized knowledge bearing upon this subject has as yet been collected.

As to the large amount of food which some birds are capable of absorbing there is a set of thoroughly scientific experiments by Professor Treadwell, of Cambridge, upon the young of the American robin. A couple of vigorous, half-grown birds having been selected in the early part of June, the Professor began to feed them with earth-worms, giving three of these to each bird the first night; next day he gave them ten worms each, which they ate ravenously; but thinking this quantity of food to be greater than that which could naturally be supplied by their parents he limited the birds to this allowance. On the third day he gave to each bird eight worms in the forenoon; but in the afternoon he found one of them becoming feeble, and soon after it refused food and died; on opening it, he found the crop, gizzard, and intestines entirely empty, and concluded therefore that it had died from want of sufficient food, the effect of hunger being perhaps increased by cold, as the thermometer was only about 60°. The other bird, still vigorous, he put in a warmer place, and increased its food, giving it the third day fifteen worms, on the fourth day twenty-four, on the fifth twenty-five, on the sixth thirty, and on the seventh thirty-one worms. These quantities, however, seemed to be insufficient, and, as the bird appeared to be losing plumpness and weight, the Professor began to weigh both the bird and its food, and to tabulate the results of these weighings. By this table it appears that though the food was increased to forty worms, weighing twenty pennyweights, on the eleventh day the weight of the bird rather fell off, and it was not until the fourteenth day when the bird ate sixty-eight worms, weighing thirty-four pennyweights, that his weight began to increase. On this day the weight of the bird was twenty-four pennyweights; he therefore ate forty-one per cent. more than his own weight in twelve hours; weighing after it twenty-nine pennyweights, or fifteen per cent. less than the food he had eaten in that time. On the fifteenth day a small quantity of raw meat was offered to the bird, and it being found that this was readily eaten it was afterward employed to the gradual exclusion of worms.

As an offset to the objection that the earth-worm contains but a small amount of solid nutritive matter, the bird was fed upon the twenty-seventh day exclusively on clear beef, in quantity twenty-three pennyweights; at night the bird weighed fifty-two pennyweights, this being but little more than twice the amount of flesh consumed during the day, no account being taken of the water, earth, and gravel, of which large quantities were daily swallowed. This presents a wonderful contrast with the amount of food required by the cold-blooded vertebrates, fishes, and reptiles, many of which can live for months without food, and also with that required by mammalia. A man at this rate should eat about seventy pounds of flesh per day, and drink five or six gallons of water.

With regard to the question, how can this immense amount of food required by the young birds be supplied by the parents? Professor Treadwell enters into the following computation: Suppose a pair of old robins with the usual number of four young ones, these would daily require, according to the consumption of the bird subjected to experiment, two hundred and fifty worms, or their equivalent in insects or other food; suppose the parents to work ten hours, or six hundred minutes, to procure this supply; this would be a worm in every two and four tenths minutes; or each parent must procure a worm or its equivalent in less than five minutes during ten hours, in addition to the food required for its own support. But after all the Professor is compelled to confess his inability to reconcile the calculation with actual observation of robins, which he has never seen return to their nests oftener than once in ten minutes.

The bird experimented upon by Professor Treadwell attained its full size on the thirty-second day after having been captured, after which time it ceased to increase in weight; its diet from this time on amounted on the average to eighteen pennyweights of beef or thirty-six pennyweights of earth-worms per day. From the fact that the bird thus continued in its confinement, with certainly much less exercise than in the wild state, to eat one-third of its weight of clear flesh daily, the Professor concludes that the food consumed by it when young was not much more than must always be provided by the parents of wild birds.

But it is more particularly with regard to the quality of the food of birds that we know so little. In the pewee and the king-bird the naturalist sees a couple of large "fly-catchers," of exceedingly interesting habits, to which the largest courtesies should be extended; while in the eyes of many farmers these birds are simply malevolent destroyers of bees; and it may well be possible that, by destroying insectivorous insects as well as bees, these birds really do more harm than good, looking of course from the lowest utilitarian point of view.

Everybody is aware that the crow eats a few grains of corn at the time of planting, and that the robin eats cherries and strawberries with avidity when these are to be had, but what do most of us know of the food of the crow, or of the robin, during the other fifty weeks of the year, more than that the latter is occasionally to be seen regaling himself upon earth-worms and the former upon carrion? that the contents of the stomachs of a dozen or two of crows have been examined and recorded by naturalists? and that the species is accused of sucking the eggs and destroying the young of various small birds which nest upon the ground? By the standard works upon Ornithology we are told that the crow devours insects, grubs, worms; that he destroys mice, moles, and other small quadrupeds; and that he will eat snakes, frogs, and the like, as well as fruits, seeds, and vegetables. But the testimony is so meagre that we may well pause to question its worth when called to sit in judgment upon the moot question whether or no, year in year out, the crow does commit more of good than of evil as regards mankind.

Then there is the cherry-bird, with his striking traits of beauty, beneficence, and evil, to-day sweeping away the canker-worms as with fire and sword; and to-morrow cleaning out the cherry-trees as effectually as if a flight of locusts had passed over the land; and again, a few months later, feasting upon the cedar-berries in the same reckless way. And yet how little do we really know of the ordinary food of the cherry-bird; for with the foregoing items we have accounted for only three or four weeks of his yearly life. It is note-worthy, by-the-way, that, with the Baltimore oriole, the cherry-bird is one of the very few members of the feathered tribe which will greedily eat the hairy caterpillars which infest our orchard trees.

The American goldfinch, or black-winged yellow-bird, with his notorious liking for the seeds of dandelions, lettuce, and the thistle, can be followed through a month or two, and some of the vireos and wood-warblers no doubt find an abundance of moths and other insects to supply their wants; while the dietary of the various woodpeckers seems to be tolerably well understood, though it has lately been asked by a distinguished ornithologist whether, after all, the country boy's name, "sap-sucker," as applied to some of the woodpeckers, is altogether a misnomer?

But how is it with the swallows? Take the hardy "white-bellied swallow" (Hirundo bicolor) for an example, as he follows the sun northward with a seemingly most indiscreet haste. What does he find stirring in the insect line during the first days of his arrival? What do the blue-birds eat from day to day during their long sojourn? And so on with all the rest.

With regard to the robin all these questions have been answered very satisfactorily—at least in so far as a single locality is concerned—by Professor Jenks, of Middleborough, Massachusetts, whose very interesting report to the Massachusetts Horticultural Society will be found in the published Journal of that Association. Professor Jenks, having determined to make the food of the robin a subject of special investigation throughout an entire year, in order that some positive conclusion might be arrived at in reference to the utility of this bird to the horticulturist, adopted the following plan of investigation: (1.) to obtain birds at daybreak, mid-day, and sunset; (2.) to obtain birds from both the village and the country; and (3.) to preserve in alcohol the contents of each gizzard. Beginning with the first week of March, 1858, specimens were actually examined at least weekly, and most of the time daily, to December, and during the winter months at least semi-monthly.

As far as the specimens procured at daybreak were concerned no positive information seems to have been obtained, since the gizzards of these are represented to have been either entirely empty or but partially distended with well-macerated food. But the birds killed in the latter part of the day were uniformly filled with food which had been only recently taken. Numbers of male robins made their appearance at Middleborough early in March, but it was not until the second week in April that any female birds were noticed. From the early part of March up to the first of May not a particle of vegetable matter was found in the gizzard of a single bird. Nine-tenths of the whole mass of food examined during this period consisted of a single kind of larva, the Bibio albipennis, of Say, though a great variety of other insects in all stages of growth and development were also met with. Of the larva in question from one to two hundred specimens were frequently taken from a single gizzard, and usually when this larva was found it was the only food in the stomach. During the month of May the Bibio larva entirely disappeared from the gizzards, being replaced, up to the 21st of June, by a variety of insects, or worms only, including spiders, caterpillars, and beetles of the family Elateridae, the parents of the well-known wire-worm so destructive to corn and various seeds at the time of planting.

The earth-worm, though a favorite food for the young bird, was found to be eaten but sparingly by the adult. After the 21st of June the Professor began to find strawberries, cherries, and other pulpy fruits, though these were still mixed with insects in the majority of instances; birds captured at a distance from gardens and fruit trees having less fruit and a larger number of insects in their gizzards than those taken near the village, the robin not being an extensive forager. This mixed diet continued from the ripening of the strawberries and cherries until October, the vegetable portion consisting, during August and September, in great part of elder-berries and poke-berries. During the month of October the vegetable diet wholly disappeared, its place being supplied by grasshoppers and other orthopterous insects. Early in November the robins which have passed the summer among us migrate southward—the few immigrants from the north, which are seen by us during the winter months, managing at that time to eke out a miserable existence upon bay-berries, privet-berries, and juniper-berries.

Somewhat similar in conception to the researches of Professor Jenks, though of much wider scope, are those to which M. Florent Prevost has devoted himself in France. As one of the naturalists in charge of the famous collections at the Garden of Plants in Paris this observer has had a peculiarly good opportunity to study the question now under discussion. During nearly thirty years he has taken pains to collect and preserve the contents of the stomachs of all the birds which have been brought to the Museum, to say nothing of large numbers of specimens procured specially by himself and by the foresters of numerous public and private estates who have interested themselves in his behalf.

It is to be regretted that the complete details of M. Prevost's researches have not been published. As yet we have only an abstract of his results, and the promise of a circumstantial account of his studies at some future day. Among the more note-worthy of M. Prevost's conclusions may be mentioned the fact that the food of birds varies according to the age of the bird as well as according to the season of the year—the observation of Professor Jenks, that earth-worms are eaten by young but not by old robins, being evidently nothing more than the particular case of a general law. M. Prevost has ascertained also that the young of the greater number of granivorous birds are really fed upon insects, and that even the adults themselves are insectivorous during the breeding-season. A familiar instance of which we have in this country the common chipping sparrow; and the same remark applies to those species of birds which in early spring devour the buds and young leaves of trees. It was found also that there are but few of the birds of prey—even those which are most truly carnivorous—which do not at times partake of insects as food.

The more carefully one studies the subject, so much the more astonishing does the place which is occupied by insects in the alimentation of birds appear. As every one knows, there are stated seasons of the year when certain kinds of insects make their appearance in large numbers, and at these times it would almost seem that the very abundance of this food induced the birds to partake of it. For example, during the interval when the June-bug is abundant portions of this insect can be found in the stomachs of the greater number of the birds which inhabit France at that season of the year; and the beetle in question is then found also in the stomachs of many quadrupeds, from the little shrew-mouse up to the wolf.

M. Prevost asserts his ability to demonstrate, so soon as the details of his researches are made public, that birds are in general much more useful than hurtful to the husbandman, and that even the damage committed at certain moments by the grain-eaters proper is largely compensated for at other times by the consumption of insects by these very birds. He insists, moreover, upon the necessity of seeking for new methods of protecting those crops which are liable to be injured by the feathered race, instead of resorting, as now, to the suicidal policy of destroying or seeking to destroy the latter.

The influence of food in determining the vagabond life which is led by many kinds of birds is remarkable. While some animals, without change of habitation, make out to obtain nourishment throughout the year by resorting to different kinds of food according to the season, others confine themselves exclusively to such aliments as can be obtained only under peculiar conditions of climate, their food being found only at stated periods in any one country. Now, in the case of quadrupeds, when a given species can not adapt itself to changing circumstances, can not obtain continuously the food suitable for its maintenance, hibernation is the usual resource: the animal simply sleeps through the unfavorable season. But with birds this curious phenomenon of hibernation does not occur—at least naturalists have not been able to detect any evidence of its existence; not even enough to account for the widely-spread popular belief or prejudice that swallows pass the winter in the mud of ponds; but instead of that, and equally dependent upon the question of nourishment, we have the still more remarkable phenomenon of migration, when, following the calls of hunger, the feathered myriads pass to and fro over the countries of the earth.

One curious point noticed by M. Prevost furnishes a remarkable contrast to the insatiable hunger and lack of endurance exhibited by the young robins of Professor Treadwell: it is, that some species of birds are capable, at certain epochs, of living for a long time without food, their stomachs being found to contain at these seasons no alimentary matter whatsoever, but only indigestible substances, such as, most commonly, the feathers of the bird itself in the form of large balls, the purpose of which appears to be to keep the stomach distended. This peculiarity was frequently observed in the various species of grebes, in the winter months, during the prevalence of frost.

It is undeniable that the results obtained by the naturalists above-mentioned are exceedingly valuable; but they serve only the more clearly to indicate the need of a more humane, a more manageable method of inquiry. There are few persons so situated that they could study the subject in the style of M. Prevost, and there are many who would shrink from the wholesale slaughter which is unavoidable in the system of Professor Jenks. What is needed is a method of research which shall not involve the destruction of the bird in order that we may examine the things which are put into its stomach. There is, of course, the familiar method of noting every particular instance in which birds are seen feeding upon any thing the character of which can be well ascertained. The method, if it were perseveringly carried out by a number of different observers, working in connection with each other, and all reporting to a common centre, would undoubtedly lead to valuable results. But besides this there presents itself another plan which, though applying, it is true, to only a portion of the breeding-season, could be so easily carried out that it would seem to be worthy of careful trial. This consists merely of a modification of the school-boy's system of rearing young birds through the intervention of the parent birds. The nest and young birds therein contained being placed within a wire cage, this is left hanging upon the tree from which the nest was taken, so that the parent birds can feed their offspring through the bars of the cage. This they will soon proceed to do, and in a short time will labor for the support of the young birds as tranquilly as if nothing had happened. Now to any one who has ever seen this method put in practice, and has noticed the heedless way in which the young birds push and crowd one another about whenever the parent comes to distribute food among them, it will be evident that there would be little or no difficulty in so arranging matters that a portion of the food proffered by the old birds should fall, not into the open mouths of their offspring, but into the bottom of the cage, whence it could be taken for examination at the convenience of the observer. Little if any thing more would be needed than to so adjust the position of the nest within the cage that the young birds could neither have access to the sides of the cage, nor be able to reach completely to its upper bars; and in case the food consisted of living insects, some adhesive coating, like glycerin, for example, would of course be needed at the bottom of the cage.

Now taking, for the sake of example, the one hundred and seventy species of land-birds which are enumerated in the Report on the Ornithology of Massachusetts, there are probably at least sixty per cent. of these, the habits of which, as regards food, could be thoroughly made out in a few years by a combination of the methods of research last mentioned, and by the united observations of several contemporaneous observers at different stations. Of the very general interest which would attach to a fund of knowledge of this description, and of its great importance, not only to the husbandman, but to all lovers of nature, there can be no question.

Is it too much to hope that in this land, where all men are familiar with the value of co-operation and accustomed to the conduct of Societies, there may not be one day established an Association for the Advancement of Knowledge which shall be truly in harmony with the spirit of the times in which we live? Such a Society, possessing somewhere a central office or bureau in charge of competent officers, and sending out ramifications into all sections of our common country, so that it could number among its active members every person of observant habits and scientific tastes throughout the length and breadth of the land, would quickly settle a host of questions, like this of the food of birds, which are too large to be grasped by a single man.

EDUCATION OF THE COLORED POPULATION OF LOUISIANA.

ONLY a few years elapsed after the settlement of Louisiana in 1699 by the French, before slave labor was introduced to aid in developing its resources and sustaining the colonists. For a century and a half since that period has the contest between freedom and slavery been waged there, and always under circumstances favorable to the latter. In many of the English colonies along the Atlantic coast loud and repeated remonstrances, until the era of the Revolution, were made to the mother country against the introduction of this element among the population; but in the early history of Louisiana we find that no systematic opposition was made to the use of slaves, or apprehension of future evils by their presence. The early governors welcomed slavery as the only means of causing prosperity to visit their country, and the whole moral and political influence of the people was in favor of its general adoption as a part of the political economy of the country. The monarchs of France regarded slavery as a proper element of industry in their colonies, and as long as their revenues were increased by the slave-trade they saw nothing but humanity and civilization in its practice.

The early history of this State blends the sober realities of truth with the poetry and romance of the Middle Ages. The chivalry of France and Spain watched over the birth of Louisiana. Kings and statesmen fostered its early growth, and the treasures of Louis XIV. were liberally expended to make it a success. Every thing which wealth, power, or influence could do was employed to make this colony one of the most favored in the New World. More than three hundred years ago its mighty forests, its endless swamps, and majestic rivers were crossed by De Soto, who, returning after a fruitless search for gold, when worn out by toil and disappointment, was buried beneath the turbid waves of the "Father of Waters," which he was the first to discover. A century and a half later other adventurous spirits attempted to explore and settle this country. Long before the English had made any explorations beyond the Atlantic coast and fringed the ocean with their settlements the French Jesuits had penetrated to Lake Superior, and, descending southward from the Great Lakes, had mapped out the country from the Falls of Saint Anthony to the Gulf of Mexico. Among these missionaries and adventurers are names which history will never pass over in silence. Nearly a hundred and ninety-three years ago Father Marquette and Joliet were the first explorers of the Mississippi. Seven years later Robert Cavalier de la Salle and Chevalier de Tonti descended this river to its mouth, and lived to tell of its grandeur in the gay salons of Paris. Following these heralds of a new empire came Iberville, Bienville, and Father Anastase, the founders of the first permanent settlement in the State, and the spring of the last year of the seventeenth century saw their first rude cabins erected on the bay of Biloxi.

But prosperity avoided the little colony at Biloxi. The settlers were accustomed to the bracing atmosphere of Canada and the milder breezes of France, and could hardly endure the burning heat of the sun and pestilential vapors of this semi-tropical clime. Sickness and death invaded their ranks, and their ignorance of the diseases peculiar to this climate carried many of them to a premature grave.

As early as the year 1703 the colony favored the introduction of slave labor. It had already been introduced into the West Indies from Africa, and it was very naturally supposed that it was essential to the prosperity of the country. Indians were first taken and compelled to work for the colonists, but they were soon found to be unprofitable, for they could not be confined to their masters' plantations. The same practice had already been tried in Massachusetts and Connecticut with a similar want of success. In order to supply the great demand for labor, Bienville, the Governor of the colony, wrote to the French Government proposing to exchange Indians for negroes with the West India Islands, but his request met with an unfavorable reception. When the entire control of the colony passed into the hands of Anthony Crozat, in the year 1712, slavery was already introduced, and he was authorized to perpetuate it by sending a ship once a year to Africa for negroes to be employed by the inhabitants as slaves. From this time, when slavery was first legally established in the colony, until the Proclamation of Emancipation—one hundred and fifty years—has the system of slave labor been tried with every facility for rendering it successful. It commenced when the colony numbered only about three or four hundred inhabitants; it has ever since been fostered by Legislative enactments and judicial decisions; it has struck its roots deep into the social system, and is it strange that it should be difficult to eradicate?

From Crozat the colony passed into the hands of the Company of the Indies, whose act of incorporation required that the demand for labor should be supplied with three thousand negroes. In all succeeding administrations slave labor seemed to be regarded as essential to the success of the colony, and until the last few years it has been the fixed policy of the people to make such laws as would protect it and render it perpetual.

The "Black Code," first established by Bienville, has ever been the model for all legislation on this subject. When the colony was first taken possession of by the Crown of Spain, in the year 1769, the laws of the Black Code were retained with such modifications as the Siete Partidas made on the subject of slavery. This system of laws, first completed in the year 1263, has ever since been the Blackstone of Spain and her colonies. Although founded on the Roman civil law, it is the most complete and well digested system of laws on the Continent of Europe, and is still the authority in the countries of America settled by the Spaniards. In this system of law the subject of slavery is well defined, and the regulations are evidently based on the code of Justinian. The old Spaniards seemed to have no scruples about the justice of this institution; their long wars with the swarthy Moors, and their proximity to the African coast, conspired to make them look upon this subject with complacency and lend it their sanction.

The early settlers of Louisiana were mostly descendants of the "Latin races." With the exception of a few Germans who settled in the parishes of St. John the Baptist and St. James, and who have now lost all trace of their former language and nationality, this State, up to the beginning of the present century, was settled wholly by people from countries bordering on the Mediterranean. In nearly every city the peoples of France, Spain, Italy, and Portugal are represented. They brought with them their customs, language, and their religion which they have carefully preserved. In one half of New Orleans one finds little to remind him that he is in America. He hears a foreign language in the streets, the shops, and the cafés. He finds hundreds of people not able to speak the English language, and who have never regarded themselves as Americans although natives of the United States. In most of the schools the textbooks and all the exercises are in the French language, and English is taught as a separate branch. When he enters the courts of justice, he finds the civil law to be the basis of all judicial proceedings, the Code Napoleon and the Partidas are oftener quoted than the commentaries of Blackstone and Kent, and often the examination of the witnesses and the pleadings of the counsel are in a foreign tongue.

This peculiar state of society in New Orleans has not been without its influence on the free colored population, who have become an element which will well repay examination. While the statute laws of Louisiana have been very severe against the marriage of whites with people of color, the social customs have tolerated it in a great degree. Since the first introduction of negroes into the colony a mixed race has existed there. The cohabitation of colored persons with whites is not allowed to have any legal effect; but the Catholic church recognizes unions of this kind, and binds the husband to support and provide for his offspring. This, however, does not prevent him from entering upon other marital relations.

Among the French and Spanish settlers and their descendants, the condition of the colored people, rather than their color as a badge of slavery, has been the subject of popular prejudice. They looked upon a slave and his descendants as an inferior class, simply because they were in a degrading condition of servitude, and not because they bore a darker skin. In the North and in States settled by the English the prejudice is one of color rather than condition. Here the colored man is tabooed, no matter what his antecedents may have been; the emancipated slave, just free from his master, is as much honored and respected as he who can trace his lineage through several generations of freedmen. The slightest admixture of African blood is fatal, not only to his social standing, but even, as a general thing, to his respectability; and this interpretation of the social laws is the one usually adhered to by the "American" population of the State.

After the revolution in Saint Domingo a great number of free people of color came to New Orleans to reside. Many of them were men of wealth and culture, owning large properties in that island, who had received their education in France. The French was their native tongue, and their early associations were with this race, which never carried the prejudice against color to the same unwarrantable extent which has prevailed in the United States. In their new home they found a State of society congenial to their taste; and, modified by their presence, it became one of the peculiarities of the Crescent City. From these people had arisen a class which is different from any other in the Union. They have been accorded many privileges and rights, which one would hardly expect in a State where the laws against education are as stringent as they appear on the statute books. Among the French and Spanish settlers an entirely different feeling existed toward their children of a mixed race from that which the emigrants from the States usually manifested. A man of the former class never appeared to regard such offspring as attaching any disgrace to his character, and was usually desirous of having them educated and trained up in such a manner that they would be an honor to himself. If he were living with a slave, it was the usual practice to emancipate her before she became a mother, in order that her children might be free, and the consequence was that they were sent to private schools, and obtained such an education as the father could afford to give them.

It sometimes happened, if the father were a man of wealth and influence, that the free child of a mixed race was sent to the most fashionable schools in the city, and it was no uncommon thing for them to be sent to the white boarding-schools at the North. In the former case the wealth and respectability of the parent was a sufficient guarantee for the admission of the pupil. In many instances they were educated in the best schools in France.

The number of these colored creoles who have received a foreign education can not be exactly stated, but it will not fall much short of two thousand. Among this class are many who have already obtained prominent positions among the people of their own color. Some are merchants, who are transacting a wholesale business with the principal houses in France; some are bankers, some are editors, and some are physicians, who have a large and lucrative practice, and have received their diplomas from the University of Paris. The profession of law has been so jealously guarded that they have never been allowed to practice in the courts, and their energies have been mostly confined to the medical profession and the various pursuits of trade. Their style of living and dress corresponds to their circumstances. In fine, I very much doubt whether there is another city in the United States where so large a colored population exist who are so prosperous and well-educated as in New Orleans.

The consequence of this state of society has been, that in this city private schools for colored people have long existed and prospered. The law has tolerated them by a significant silence on the subject. Public opinion has also tolerated them by a quasi encouragement and patronage. Under the old régime this was one of the delicate subjects which the people did not think it best to interfere with in advance. They reasoned thus: "Any thing so weak and insignificant as these schools appear to be can be let alone till some solid reason arises for suppressing them, meanwhile we are strong enough to protect ourselves against any evil results from this course." An opposite course might have defeated their own ends, and given some excuse for an excitement on the delicate subject of negro insurrections. So the law held its power in reserve, and while it placed heavy fines and punishments on those who taught the slave population, and kept a strict watch over the movements of the colored people, especially their religious meetings and social gatherings, it refrained from going any further.

But among this class of people there are social chasms as wide and deep as between themselves and the whites. Aristocracy is not confined to color, race, or condition. The very fact that the stringency of social laws shuts them out from all familiar intercourse with the white races; that they are obliged to worship in their own temples, attend their own places of amusement, educate their children at their own schools, and live as a separate and distinct class of people; and above all, that they have no political power, tends to develop this trait of character. It is unavoidable, and in some extent necessary, in order to enable them to preserve their own self-respect.

The same contracted views prevail on the subject of religion and education. The French creoles are mostly Catholics; and this is the creed which usually prevails in their private schools, although I am not aware that any of them require any religious test of their pupils or their patrons. Their sympathy for every thing French leads them to adopt the national religion of that country. These people have little to do with the Freedmen's Bureau, and do not recognize it as having any application to themselves. They object to being placed in the same class with the freedmen just released from bondage, and seem to feel that they are a superior race, in the enjoyment of advantages which their less fortunate neighbors never obtained.

Many of these free people of color have been slave-owners, sometimes the husband purchased his wife, and occasionally a husband was owned by a free woman. In some parts of the State they own large plantations, and occasionally had the reputation of being far more severe toward their slaves than the whites. During the recent war many of this class were as strongly in favor of the rebellion as the veriest fire-eater whom South Carolina ever produced, and they defended the divine right of slavery as zealously as any of the disciples of Calhoun or De Bow. They as firmly believe that the inferiority of condition necessarily attaches to itself a lasting dishonor as the whites do that color is a badge of an inferior race.

Mr. Bouguille, a very successful colored creole teacher in New Orleans, relates an instance illustrating this current of popular opinion among the people of his acquaintance. On one occasion, long before the war, he was the recipient of a bright-looking boy, whose master and father solicited the favor of his attending school. Mr. B. made no objections, as the respectability and standing of the father was a sufficient guarantee that no legal proceedings would result from the act; but after a few days he found that every one of his pupils had decided to leave him. They had found out that a slave was being taught in the same room with themselves, and their parents would not allow such an indignity to be perpetrated upon them. Finally, Mr. B. was obliged to compromise the matter by dismissing the slave pupil, and calling every day at his master's house to give him instruction. His pupils agreed to remain, and the school prospered as usual.

It has already been shown that these free people of color not only copy our prejudices but sometimes improve on the original. With a little observation one will find that their standard of respectability contains as many different strata as Hugh Miller discovered in the Old Red Sandstone—with about as many fossil ideas as he found classes of distinct vertebrata. Especially is this the case in their schools. In some of these private institutions the standard of respectability is very high, and only those of the best society, and whose skin is tolerably well bleached with an admixture of Caucasian blood, can be admitted. In others the grade is placed lower, but the same principle is recognized; while the great majority of the Professors make the social condition of the parents the only criterion. The majority of these schools are open to all pupils who were born free, and whose parents can afford to pay the monthly stipend required. They are usually held in private houses, without any external appearance which would indicate that the building was used for educational purposes. In former times the greatest care was often taken to conceal this fact, especially when there was any pretext for complaint.

There are at present in New Orleans from fifteen to twenty of these private schools. The Freedmen's Bureau knows nothing about them; the city government does no more condescend to notice them than it does the colored boot-blacks around Saint Charles Hotel. Yet they are silently exerting a great and beneficial influence on the free people of color; and the great success which has attended them clearly demonstrates that if the recently emancipated slaves are ignorant of the rudimental branches of an education it is not their own fault. In these schools men who would have been an honor to any white race or nation had their ideas first awakened to a love of study. Two illustrious examples are the Rev. Sella Martin of New York city, an eloquent preacher and pastor of a large and flourishing church; and Victor Sejour, now the private Secretary to Louis Napoleon, and one of the greatest dramatic writers in France. Yet these men were born in New Orleans, the latter in the Third District, and laid the foundation of their present greatness in these schools. These have imparted instruction to hundreds, who, on coming to maturity and finding no opportunity to display their talents in a land where they were a proscribed race, have sought other countries where the prejudices against color do not exist, and there acquired wealth and fame. These people are entitled to no little praise for their efforts under adverse circumstances to educate and elevate themselves. It speaks volumes in behalf of this race that they have been enabled to accomplish such results while taxed to support white schools.

Much the largest part of the colored creoles are of a mixed race; many of them can hardly be distinguished from persons of pure Caucasian blood, and so long has this gradual process of interpretation has gone on that it is often difficult to detect it. In many of the private schools there is not a single specimen of a full-blooded African, and in the schools under the Bureau, notwithstanding the influx of population from the country parishes, there is as much as seventy or eighty per cent. of the children of a mixed race. For this class of people own taxable property in New Orleans, valued at fifteen millions of dollars, and annually pay a school-tax of thirty-seven thousand dollars for the exclusive support of white schools.

The largest colored creek school in New Orleans is under the patronage of the "Catholic Bureau for the Instruction of Indigent Orphans" (Bureau Catholique pour l'Instruction des Orphelins des Indigènes), which was founded on the 20th of April, 1867. An old colored woman, a native of Louisiana, known as Widow Bernard Cavenot, died on the 20th day of June, 1857, and left to her will the lot and buildings situated on the corner of Canine and Gretna streets, for the purpose of establishing a school for colored orphans, and on the day last mentioned her influential friends of color residing in New Orleans organized a society for the purpose of establishing and supporting one or more schools for the instruction of indigent orphan children of both sexes. The society, being regularly incorporated according to the laws of the State, has the usual powers granted it of holding and acquiring real and personal property, and employs the monies arising from whatever source in the maintenance of the school, makes all laws and regulations necessary for the discipline, education, health, and religious instruction of the pupils, and, when they arrive at a suitable age, as given herein, will be competent of those who have them in charge to enter in trade and occupations—to send them out to learn some useful trade, or dispose of them in any manner which may be in accordance with the charitable designs of the institution. Persons who contribute the sum of two dollars and forty cents per annum are considered as directors. The institution now contains about two hundred and sixty pupils, taught by seven colored teachers. The two sexes are kept entirely separate—the boys on the first floor and the girls above. Instruction is imparted in English and French, as well as in both languages as read. It has been maintained until recently by contributions, charitable collections, the proceeds of balls, fairs, and occasional grants made by the Legislature and the Government, which, since the capture of the city by General Butler, has amounted to seven thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars. Before the occupation of the city by the Federal troops small appropriations were sometimes made by the State, but never sufficient to give it an adequate support. The method of instruction is very good, and the progress of the pupils has been in the teachers. Some of the pupils have mastered the primary rules of arithmetic, and progressed as far as the square and cube root. The specimens of writing these children are very neat and correct. The pupils read in both the English and French languages with great fluency and with a proper pronunciation. Their general conduct is quiet and orderly. They are neat in their person and fully dressed. With two or three exceptions they are all of a mixed descent, and many of them so white that it would be difficult to discover that they were originally colored or the African race.

This institution, though under the patronage of the Catholic Church, is entirely secular in its favor. No religious test is required, and children of every denomination attend. If they are not orphans in needy circumstances they pay a tuition fee of one dollar and fifty cents per month in bringing the expenses of the institution. This school is now under the charge of Professor Armand Lamasse, who has an excellent course of instruction, some of whom were educated in France and Spain. Lamasse. He has had a successful career; has been a great benefit to the free people of color in this part of the city.

In the parish of Iberville there is a large number of free colored families who have long resided there, and have accumulated considerable property. They have supported their own schools, and the general standard of education among them would be equivalent to any people in the South. It was their usual practice to select rectors as the principal teachers, and employ colored teachers during the whole year, the people paying a regular tuition fee. For more than fifty years have their schools been kept open in this manner, and the result has been that out of nearly one hundred colored families in that parish who were free before the war, only one family is unable to read and write, while among the white population from twenty to thirty per cent. are illiterate.

In the city of Baton Rouge a similar state of things exists. For some of the best specimens of the education of free people of color are found in a large percentage of the population, and are given in no less a variety and abundance than they have their churches and schools, but patronage and instruction, and the vast numbers in New Orleans, they have the strong elements of an important element of the population deprived of all political power and influence. In the country around Louisiana the free people of color own large tracts of land, and have long been known as wealthy and successful farmers. Before the war the colored population of the free colored children near Opelousas was a successful education for many years, and would amount about one hundred and twenty-five pupils and their teachers. In those days the usual terms were fifteen dollars a month for board and tuition. Since the school has been closed many of the pupils have been sent to the private schools in New Orleans.

For while the free colored people had many privileges allowed them through the influence of the dominant race, in different ways the educational advantages enjoyed by them in vari-age. Although it was a little short of death for a slave to be caught learning to read, and still more dangerous for them to teach one another, yet there were occasional instances where they managed to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. In spite of all the laws and edicts of State and municipal authority, the free people would sometimes secretly teach the slaves, and these would teach one another when they had an opportunity.

In so large a city as New Orleans, where great numbers of free blacks and slaves were crowded together, it was sometimes impossible to keep the latter in ignorance, notwithstanding all the precautions which were taken and stringent laws which were passed. Intelligent free colored men would often ignore the differences of condition, and run the greatest risks in teaching the slaves. They would have their schools at night in a room on some dark alley, where only one or two pupils were allowed to enter at a time, changing their locality every few weeks in order to avoid suspicion, and when their nocturnal exercises were over they separated in the same secret manner. Money was not the motive which induced them to run these risks, but the love of danger, the thirst for knowledge, the instinct of benevolence, and the habits of secrecy which slavery engenders prompted them to take this course.

One of the most prominent colored pastors of New Orleans, Rev. Stephen Walter Rogers, of St. Thomas's Church, has given the writer an interesting account of his efforts to obtain an education, which was emphatically a "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties." He was born in North Carolina, and brought to this State when but a few months old. When about fifteen years of age he was sold to a planter in Alabama, and having been removed to several places in Tennessee and Mississippi, at last he became the body-servant of his young master, who was very much attached to him and treated him almost like a brother. The planter, who was uncle to this young lad then preparing for college, put a great deal of confidence in this slave, and made it a part of his duty to act as commissary to the rest of the slaves in giving out their rations. On one occasion the slave ventured to ask his young master to teach him to read, and received the rather indefinite reply that "he would think of it." After a few days the young man went to town and bought Stephen a Webster's Spelling-book, and when he gave it to him, he told him that it would be death to him to be seen about the place with a book in his hands; and since the old master had gone to New Orleans, leaving the place in the hands of the overseer, he would have to be very guarded in his attempts to learn to read. This bit of good advice the slave was shrewd enough to heed, and so every night after the overseer had gone his rounds throughout the quarters, and satisfied himself that all the slaves were indoors, this favorite servant would get his book and slip out into his young master's room, and then for a period of three months there were very few nights that Rogers did not hear the clock strike two or three in the morning when poring over his spelling-book—the young master having taught him till he was overpowered with sleep.

At the end of this time the young master went to college, and Rogers opened a school among the slaves on the place, selecting only those for his pupils in whom he could place the most implicit confidence. The school-room was a stable-loft over the carriage-house; but for prudential reasons the school was never opened until ten o'clock at night, when they were satisfied that all the white people in the place had gone to bed. The usual school session lasted from ten until two in the morning. The school furniture was of the simplest kind; the seats were piles of corn, bundles of fodder, old harness, horse-collars, etc. Tallow-candles of their own manufacture were used by the pupils for lights, and the candlesticks were made of thick pieces of plank with holes bored in them; lamps were also made of tin, shaped somewhat like an oyster-shell, with a wick at one end: these being filled with lard and the wick ignited gave a dim light. The pupils, disposed in two rows on each of the seats, sat back to back, and left a space between the seats sufficiently wide for the teacher to pass. The number of pupils which he usually had was about forty; and as books were scarce and rather an unsafe investment, five pupils usually read out of one book, they holding the book and light alternately. Through the connivance of the young master a few spelling and copy books had been obtained for the use of the school; but after he left the plantation the school was supplied by a Jew peddler passing through the place and doing a business decidedly contraband, who furnished the negroes with twenty-five more Spellers at the price of one dollar each, which were kept carefully concealed when not in use. The greatest care was taken to keep the proceedings secret. In order to prevent the lights from betraying them the cracks in the stable-loft were carefully stopped with fodder, moss, cotton, rags, etc.; and in the winter the school met in a large cellar, to which they easily obtained access, as Rogers kept the key in his possession.

In this manner the school was kept up for about a year, at the low price of twelve and a half cents a pupil per month—just enough to pay for the books. At the end of this time the plantation and all the hands but five were sold, and the school completely broken up. Fortunately for Rogers, he was among the number who were not sold, but was brought to New Orleans, and here he was employed in a store for several months before his master found out that he could read. On making this discovery his master was far from being displeased, as in his new situation the services of his servant were far more valuable; and he was employed in sampling cotton, as a collector for the house, and general outdoor runner to the banks and steamboats.

In the year 1850, while acting in the capacity of a preacher, he published a small book of about fifty pages, consisting of extracts from his sermons, Bible narratives, hymns, and religious meditations, for the use of his Sunday-school. A copy of this book, entitled "Rogers's Compositions," now lies before me. The doctrines inculcated in it are strictly orthodox, and the language chaste and correct. It shows that the slave improved his advantages for reading to the utmost advantage. I do not know that there is another instance of a slave author on record, and certain it is that such an enterprise was very unsafe for him to undertake at that time. Not till after the glad news of freedom had been proclaimed throughout the land did he dare to let the public know of the existence of this work.

In a note to the writer accompanying a copy of the book Mr. Rogers says: "You will see by this little book, which I published in the year 1850, while I was a slave and superintendent of a Sunday-school of nearly three hundred scholars, which I gathered in one of our colored churches, that our colored Sunday-schools were in operation before the war. This book was a daring piece of my own; and you may safely say that you have seen a book published by a slave before the war, and at that time it was quite a curiosity, and a secret to the friends of freedom."

In the year 1852 the master died and left this slave free by his will, and on the eleventh day of May, the same year, he was regularly emancipated by the executor of the estate—the last slave set free in Louisiana before the passage of a law forbidding masters giving liberty to their slaves. For some years before he had been a pastor in one of the colored churches in New Orleans, and he still continues to be highly respected as a preacher.

It sometimes happened that a master wished to have his slave learn to read and write, in order that he might be more useful about his store, warehouse, or cotton press. In such cases a smart, intelligent slave was usually selected and sent to a private teacher, who gave him the necessary instruction. In order to protect the teacher from prosecution, and secure him from any legal consequences which might result from an illegal act of this kind, the teacher was furnished with a written permission from his master to instruct the slave; and this was posted upon the walls of the room, in order that the police might know who was responsible for this departure from the laws. A few years later, however, stringent laws were passed, prohibiting even this act of kindness. But the occupation of teaching the slaves was regarded as very degrading, and unless the teacher exercised more than ordinary prudence he was brought before the magistrate and severely punished. The police were ever on the alert to watch for any infringement of this rule, and it often happened that the teachers, with all the protection which the slave-owners could give, were mobbed and insulted by the evil-disposed "Thugs" who infested the city. It was for this reason that women were usually found, whose circumstances compelled them to perform this drudgery, their sex protecting them from annoyance. It often happened that in spite of all these precautions the educated slave was considered a dangerous person in the city, and had to be sold to gratify the pressure of public opinion, which could not be appeased without this sacrifice. When traded off like an unsound or vicious horse, and removed to a sugar or a cotton plantation, it was generally supposed that the Argus eye of the overseer would prevent his learning from doing much damage.

But these instances where the slaves learned to read by the consent or connivance of their masters or the free blacks were exceptions, and did not often occur even in New Orleans. Probably not one slave in a thousand learned to read, and a still less number learned to write.

AN HOUR AT SEA.

A FAIRER morning never shone than that on which Captain Jesse Amazeen left the Long Wharf of Oldenport behind him. There was just breeze enough to fill the great sails of the pilot-boat and float her along upon the smooth harbor-water, over the bar, and out to sea, till she lay like a cloud, beyond the sand-spurs and the breakers, on the horizon's rim. To the lounge on the capstan at the wharf's end in the town she looked like a sea-bird that had spread its wings and was hovering over its prey, and at last she vanished from his sight and fancy altogether. The sky was freshly washed from mist and murk, the air was full of its morning sparkle; there was a vigor in the full sweep of the sunlight over one, felt like the bubble of a draught of wine. Captain Jesse Amazeen whistled lustily at the helm, and every now and then paused to wet his whistle, while the boy and man who were his companions sang scraps of song and carved out plugs of tobacco, and gauged hooks for deep-sea fishing, and made themselves merry in general till some craft should heave in sight for Captain Jesse to hail and board and pilot up to town. But in all the range of his glass no craft appeared of larger size than his own, except those already making for another harbor on the other side of the Cape—and the morning wore into forenoon, and the forenoon into noon.

The charm of the long, unbroken day at sea, when one is to put back to familiar port and household scenes at night, never lessens, even to such an old sea-dog as Captain Jesse. The wide sweet solitude never grows monotonous or wearisome, trifles become circumstances, a gull winging by is an event, currents, winds, strange sails are incidents sufficient, the guest of all outdoors does not tire of the hospitality he receives. Nevertheless, when daily bread depends on yet something more, this mere personal enjoyment of space and height, of the curling wave beneath the prow, and the vast level plain to the ocean's edge gives place to the object for which one came; and Captain Jesse at last went below for forty winks, with the sun at the top of his eternal round, in order that he might come up all fresh for afternoon work, for it would be an odd day in his experience if before nightfall there should be no work to do.

Captain Jesse came up all right and bright at the close of his forty winks; and the boy and man took their turn below in a series of snoozes undisturbed by any necessity of looking out for a job, since Captain Jesse paid them by the day. So one delightful dream melted into another, and down in the hot little stifling black-hole of a cabin this hour broke upon the next, and all vanished together like foam, till with a long, dull scratch resounding beneath them, and then a shock of suddenly-ceased motion, the sleepers woke, rubbed their stupid eyes in bewilderment, gathered their scattered wits, rushed up the narrow companion-way to the deck, and found the boat—after floating about at its own sweet will and drifting in on the tide—now lay with shallow water every where about it, ashore, and firmly wedged in a sand-bar; and as for Captain Jesse Amazeen he was nowhere to be seen.

The redoubtable individuals looked about them then in perplexity, in amazement, in consternation, in terror. They had left Captain Jesse on deck—it was a physical impossibility that he could be any where else. Perhaps now he was behind the mainsail: no? Under the seat? No? Then he must have gotten out in the shoal water to push the boat off. No! Why, where in time was he? Had he gone below to hide and frighten them? But then Captain Jesse was not a man that played tricks. Could he have fallen asleep again and so have fallen overboard? Was there any earthly or unearthly reason for him to have made away with himself—to have committed suicide? Unable to believe their senses they hallooed and shouted and danced about like madmen.

Notwithstanding all this rather late exertion on their part Captain Jesse Amazeen was nowhere to be seen—neither did his ghost answer any such invocation. His boots, it is true, stood large as life, just as he had taken them off in the morning after reaching open water; but as for himself he had put on in their stead the shoes of silence, the cap of invisibility, and had left for parts unknown; nor was it even to be conjectured where he was. The heat of the day had been sweltering, there was not a whisper of wind, the sails hung in large loose wrinkles, the sun had declined from noon, and the west was already burnished with golden afternoon light. It was after four o'clock. How long had Captain Jesse been away, and whither was he gone? The two wore their lungs sore with cries and calls, in hopes some one from the shore might catch the sound and come to their help and Captain Amazeen's—there was nothing else for them to do except to tear their hair; and at last they sat down in desperation to wait till the night-tide should float them off again.

But while this worthy pair had been taking it so easily below deck Captain Jesse had been in far less enjoyable plight. Left alone at the helm of the pilot-boat, and the sun beating ardently down upon him, he had thrown off jacket and waistcoat, and with the least possible accoutrement, endured the hot assault of the day and awaited his fortunes. There was not a sail to be seen; his assistants were still in their bunks below—he let them sleep; and cast and trolled his blue-fish line, if haply any fighting fellow should come across the bait. None did—the solitude seemed infectious—desert above the waters, desert below. The sea began to darken and ripple in one place, the ripple crept his way, brushed along by a deceitful little waft of warm wind. "We'll leave these parts," said Captain Jesse; and he put his helm to larboard that he might go and trim the mainsail. He thought he put his helm to larboard—it was a little mistake he made—he had put it precisely the other way, he bent to loosen a rope, the boat came up in the wind, the sail slapped over, and the heavy boom brushed him like a feather from its course, and tossed him far out into the sea as lightly as a flake of foam.

When Captain Jesse came to the surface after his sudden plunge, rose, struck out, and shook the water from his eyes, the pilot-boat, her sails filled with the deceitful breeze only to be forsaken by it presently, had swept far forward on her way and was almost beyond hearing. He hailed her, hailed her again and again, but there was nobody to answer; in vain, putting forth all his powers as a swimmer, he tried to reach her, she fled before him; and the distance grew, stretching itself like a thread of infinity. The little breeze fled with her, left the sea all calm and still behind, but darkly ruffled the way before and blew her on in its sport. He had endeavored, with the energy of despair, to keep in her wake, that even if he might not overreach her he might be observed by the sluggards should they ever come on deck; but now, at last, he saw that it was of no use for him to expend the remnant of his strength in idle efforts to compete with the winged thing; he must be content to float about till he could be picked up, must be content perhaps to drown. He lifted himself up, treading water, and searched the whole horizon—it was empty as a last year's nest—and he lay back with his hands clasped behind him, his mouth just higher than the surface, and the whole ocean seething in his ears. By times, as he lay there and the laggard instants crawled by on the ripple of the tide, the fatigue, the suspense, the fear grew insupportable; he trod water and looked around him again with an eye that scrutinized each distant crest and foam-bell, or else summoned his forces and his will to the rescue and swam wildly and vaguely about he knew not whither. His brain was becoming so bewildered that he could not direct himself, and in which direction to make that he might soonest reach some shore he found himself unable to decide. But what a crazy dream! there was no shore in sight. The sense then that he must wait for others, and could do nothing for himself, waxed into positive suffering. His limbs got languid too in the warm and pleasant water; the sun playing on his bare head made his brain light and giddy; a strange pulse was going like a little trip-hammer upon his temple, and bright and beautiful colors shot their woven beams before his burning eyes with every other breath. "This is it," thought Captain Jesse. "Drowning is only slow apoplexy, the doctor said. I am drowning." A few seconds afterward he wondered why he did not recall his sins, as he had heard that people in his condition were apt to do, and then he began to remember with a vengeance.

He had always been a somewhat eccentric man; though perhaps a profanity, only to be equaled by an expert, could hardly be called eccentricity. Volleys of terrible oaths that had been safety-valves to more terrible tempers rattled about his memory on the instant; now he remembered the oaths but he forgot the anger fits that caused them. The ghost that had visited him last year rose again like a white apparition here, vivid in the sunlight. "Captain Jesse Amazeen," the midnight ghost had said, "arise and come with me. Prepare to meet your end." And Captain Jesse Amazeen had cried: "Who the — are you, Sir? What are you in my chamber for? Go about your business, Sir!" Then he had thought it some of his comrades playing off their jokes upon him; he had never asked them nor spoken of it to them. But now—perhaps it was a ghost—who knew? Perhaps it warned him of this day; and he was not prepared. Then, in defiance of ghosts, and ends, and fate itself, he gave a score of stout strokes, leaped up and swept the sea again with his piercing glance, hailed some chance ear, and set his teeth and fell back to float once more, determined not to drown. He remembered that he had been in worse straits than this before to-day. One black night, the sea running sluices, he had gone off to bring a schooner into port, and his boat had swamped beneath her bows, the mast had broken and the sail had taken him over and under, wrapped about and about with its folds like a mummy, and the waves had sucked him into their huge, hungry hollows, a powerless atom. God knows how he got out again—he never did. Nor that only. The day when, after heavy drinking, he got the Heart's Delight among the breakers—having only one man on board—it was a pity if he had forgotten that. He had gone himself in the yawl to cast the kedge anchors and so work her off, and a big wave, seeking what it might devour, had suddenly snatched his oars and capsized him; and having just missed a watery death himself, he had clambered upon the bottom of his upturned boat, which the retreating tide and undertow were drawing out to sea again. Making a trumpet of his hands he had cried to the man still on board of the Heart's Delight—the man whose voice he knew the people at the light-house could hear—"Why don't you holler, Sir?" And, in response, "What shall I holler, Captain Amazeen?" the terrified creature had piped. "Hell and damnation, Sir!" had answered Captain Amazeen, and in that pious frame of mind gone drifting out to sea. Night had come down then, and broad, gray twilight stretched over the wide waters, swelling and sighing to themselves. There were various craft dimly looming here and there, but not one among them all had discerned the man floating on the bottom of the capsized yawl, in spite of signal or shout. Captain Coffin had been out all day fishing; making in, he had seen the Heart's Delight in her plight, ran up as near as he dared, and had been then told the condition of Captain Amazeen; upon which, with no more words, he had put about and to the rescue. His wife was with him; she was the first to discover the speck on all the waste; then they bore down upon him. Politics ran high in those times; between these two skippers there were old standing feuds of election and town-meeting days; but they had never before been deemed, by one of the parties at least, as matters of life and death. "Boat ahoy!" cried Captain Coffin, putting himself alongside with the little wreck. "What you doing here, Captain Amazeen?" And Captain Amazeen had greeted him as he had done the ghost, adding, moreover, in reply, "Minding my own business, Sir! and 'ud advise you to do the same! What you here for, Sir?" To whom Captain Coffin: "You'll be in blazes at this gait before morning, Captain Amazeen. I came out to save your life." "Enough water to put them out, if I was," replied the wreck. "Who asked you, Sir? I'll be in blazes, and be blest to 'em, before I'll be saved by any damned Locofoco!" And he would have kept his word had not Captain Coffin fairly lassoed him on board of his whale-boat, and saved him in spite of himself. All this, and all of a hundred other incidents, crowded now over Captain Amazeen's memory—if the truth must be told though—rather pleasantly than otherwise; he liked the grit of them, he would have said; he had rather drown now than be picked up by Captain Coffin, or any of that old Jackson and Jefferson tribe. It became him to be cautious who saw his head bobbing round there in the water; there was one comfort, the Coffins and Cluneys were a stupid set; and, if they saw it, ten to one they would take it for a buoy, unless the fancy struck them that it was a seal, and they fired a shot at it; but no matter for that, they never hit a mark yet. Meantime, contemptuously defying supposititious bullets, he was precious near to drowning.

As he lay there in the placid, softly singing sea, there came a fine sweet sound of distant bells. Afternoon bells ringing at once from the belfries of all the schools in the great town, or else gay wedding bells, or maybe alarms of fire. The mingled tones stole out to him like half-lost chimes, with a wild music in their cadences; he began to fashion them into tunes, the tune perhaps his wife was singing with one foot upon the cradle at this moment. He saw the children trooping into school by the music, his own pretty Carrot-top among them, swinging her Shaker and dancing on while the sun beat out every thread of her yellow hair to gold, and little Nick lagging along and throwing handfuls of the street-dust over the urchin lagging with him—a trick for which the imp had had many a good shaking: he only wished it were in his power to give him a good shaking now! Then the bell-notes came slower, and slower, and yet more slowly; they were tolling—tolling for him—or was he fainting? Perhaps so—it might have been—had not just then some indistinguishable object shot swiftly by him in the dark slippery depth, some fish or monster of the deep—and with that came the thought of sharks. This was the weather; these were the waters—Good Heaven! Coffin, or Cluney, or any body—help! No man-eaters about these shores? Why, he knew better! He had seen them to his cost. And young Ben Eaton had to the cost of his life itself. What course would there be for him to take?—the exertions that terrified and drove off the nibbling shoals might be the very thing to attract the large and more cunning cruel creature. There was indeed but one way to face him—just so long as he looked at a shark, as he turned and turned and kept him eye to eye, just so long the cowardly wretch would delay attack; behooved him to be wary then, to keep his senses in condition, to be ready to fight his foe should he come to hand! He sprang forward in the water with new energy, and again and again searched the sea with swift, eager glances. It was all as empty as the sky itself—empty of every thing save color and light—an azure and pitiless hollow, out of which lanced golden arrows at the hollow as vast and as pitiless below; for the great sea lifted its jeweled walls like the rim of a cup, and all its smooth and level splendor slanted up from where he lay, an idle speck at the centre and bottom of the cup.

Gradually now the element, which had been so soothing and delightful to the frame, felt chilly and chillier to poor Captain Jesse. He feebly wondered if its temperature had changed, and then thought of complaining to some one that his feet were cold; afterward he remembered himself, with an effort, and began to swim afresh. A wave came running over another and dashed in his face, a second followed it, a third lifted him and rocked him to and fro; there were fine and tiny caps of foam every where ribbing the expanse; the tide was falling, and a gentle wind had begun to blow on, just enough to roughen the water and make a ridge and trough, in which a stout, fresh swimmer would have had ado to keep his headway. His mouth and throat kept filling with the brine; the salt sea spume broke remorselessly over him; it was of no use to swim; fold his hands behind his back—there was nothing now but drowning.

Drowning while his wife chatted with the neighbor who stood outside, and leaned both elbows on the sill within, and flattered the white floor and shining shelves, while the waking baby crowded for the sunbeams glinting and glancing there in the bright wave—drowning while Nick, asking to go out, was down sailing boats in the pond hard by the school-house, and Carrot-top was sound asleep, with her little head fallen on the desk among her books—drowning while the sun shone, while those he loved were quiet and unconscious, laughing, forgetful, gay! And drowning all alone out there in open sea with only half his life lived out, with health and strength in hand—hope and defiance together battled despair and an ocean—unevenhanded contest; he, a mere mote, fighting an element: it was a contest only to abandon. Captain Jesse was a brave man naturally; he had looked on great danger and never quailed, but that was because expectation and will were then his allies. Now, tossed about in the tide, his mind had weakened as his energies exhausted; and cold and numb as he had grown, his heart was colder yet within him. Drowning out there alone!—the thought made him ache with horror. The awful part of it, perhaps, was the drowning all alone. If there had been but some one with him, other castaways, a hand to take hold and go down with him, a receding step, voices from the shore! And then the entrance all alone into eternity, that great unknown, that vaster, vaguer deep! All alone—while the horror was still upon him, the ringing in Captain Jesse's ears, the hollow sounding of the sea, resolved into a kind of solemn music, yet a music full of glad, harmonious tumults. He heard the very words as in his young days he had himself many a time sung them in the choir, and as he had scarcely thought of them since:

"A gentler stream with gladness still
The city of our Lord shall fill,
The royal seat of God most high:
God dwells in Sion, whose fair towers
Shall mock th' assaults of earthly powers
While his almighty aid is nigh."

He looked idly up, and a shining thing hung before him in the heavens, rank upon rank of snowy-pointed wings joining over the heads of angels and archangels; and behind them and above them, rising in a golden gleam, the likeness of a cloud-built city shone with domes, and minarets, and spires. "And the twelve gates were twelve pearls, every several gate was of one pearl, and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass." And then, in Captain Jesse Amazeen's disordered fancy, a hand touched his indeed, but a hand as if to lead him up and on; a face bent over him, a face like a white star, that glowed with a deep, deep smile, and warmed his chill and fainting soul. Sweet voices murmured all about him; one said, "And there was no more sea." Ah! if this were drowning—this delicious death—

A film faded away from Captain Amazeen's vision, as a mist strips slowly off from a morning meadow; he was plunging and rocking with a very different motion from that afforded to one cradled in angels' arms; something was trickling down his throat, something familiar—good old smoky Scotch whisky by the taste. If that were a seraph squeezing his cold fingers between a pair of hard, warm palms, it was in the guise of an Oldenport fishwife. These must be solid planks under him, not downy clouds. And Captain Coffin himself, and no other, was rubbing him up and down with woolen gloves in a way that might strike sparks. Captain Jesse beamed mildly on them all out of his opening eyes, gurgled a word or two in his throat, and placidly went to sleep.

When the pilot-boat, having been floated off by the night tide, came up the river in the bright moonlight, in which you could see to read, the man and boy full of terror at the ordeal before them in which Captain Amazeen's fate must be broken to his family, the worthy couple in silence furled their sails and threw a cable to the first man among the group upon the wharf's end who could catch it. As the lucky one stepped out of the shadow into the clearer ray their teeth chattered in their heads, not so much that Captain Jesse, in his stout, ruddy flesh and blood, now quite himself again, seemed to be an apparition as that they doubted if they were not ghosts themselves.

"Pretty fellows you be!" cried Captain Jesse.

"God bless you, Captain Amazeen! Then you're alive!" they answered in one breath.

"Wa'al—jest—jest alive!" replied the Captain, pulling the boat round with an arm like an iron lever, and making her fast to the wharf. "Tell ye what. You fellers don't sail in this craft no more. Me an' Cap'n Coffin's struck han's, an' we'll do all the piloting we want for these here waters ourselves." With which announcement the two Captains struck hands again, and shook the said hands so long that it seemed doubtful if they had not fairly grown together, and their owners were not endeavoring by these gyrations to get them apart. And indeed they had—they had grown together—those hands of theirs; for though Captain Jesse could not abandon the principles for which he had fought at the polls these twenty years, he made a greater sacrifice by far than that—he attained a pitch of magnanimity to which few men in his circumstances may ever dare aspire; he remembered who and what the man was, and for his great presumption and offense in saving his life he forgave Captain Coffin! Could any one do more?

FORTY-TWO.

SAD middle-age! from thy cold heights
 Mine eyes, anointed by the truth,
 Turn wistfully and seek the lights
 That lit the happy vales of youth.
 Not often thus the hunted soul
 Dare pause before the hounds of fate;
 But where the inevitable goal
 Is death, what harm to wait?

Alas! alas! their search is vain.
 The lights have vanished with the hours;
 Those vales I shall not see again;
 Flown are the birds and dead the flowers.
 The joys that once so real seemed
 This disenchanting air has shown
 The most unreal dreams e'er dreamed;
 Their memory lives, alone.

Friendship, and Hope, and Love, and Faith!
 I see your ghosts amid the gloom
 Still hovering o'er my dreary path
 Where rose your temple and your tomb.
 Friendships all withered to the root;
 Hopes—only shadows, fancy born;
 Loves ever bearing bitter fruit;
 And Faith repaid by Scorn.

Again I gather up my load;
 I turn my back on what has been;
 I seek once more the onward road;
 I challenge boldly the Unseen.
 Farewell, O perished, fateful Past!
 I look but where the Future lies,
 Clouded, impenetrable, vast,
 And seeming filled with sighs.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"WHEN the young May moon is beaming, love," it is not only sweet to rove in Mor-na's grove, but it is delightful to repair with a judicious friend to the pretty little private theatre in a neighboring city, where there are the most charming performances, and always for the benefit of some good purpose. The company was first organized, we believe, to help the Sanitary work of the war; but taste and talent did not end with hostilities, nor, indeed, the necessity of charity, so the curtain still rises, and the treasury of the little theatre is still emptied into needy hands and coffers.

It was a small chapel, disused probably, or certainly not very necessary in the neighborhood, which was converted—if the word may be used upon such an occasion—into a brightly decorated play-house, with a spacious parquette and one balcony. The house holds some three or four hundred, and as the tickets are privately sold the audience is secure from any unpleasant intrusion. On this May evening it was a gay but not boisterous throng, brilliant with the light Spring toilets of the fair; with those indescribable bonnets, like fairy basket-covers escaping with flowers and fondly caught and pinioned by invisible forces to the hanging gardens, and lofty terraces, and flanking curtains, sweeps, rolls, puffs, elaborate fortifications, and bold salients of hair, foreign and domestic, which now adorn the female head. An elderly spectator like the Easy Chair is lost in wonder and utterly bewildered in these magnificent mazes of hair. How they toil for us, these bright and beautiful ones! Would we men wear each other's scalps to win the admiration of the sex? Would we devote innumerable hours of the week to the laying out of our exterior heads in marvelous triumphs of landscape gardening? Flowers, feathers, ribbons, laces, beads, pearls, bangles, diamonds, gold dust, silver sand, pins, tortoise-shell, powder, horse-hair, wigs, scratches, ox-marrow, bandoline, rubbed, scrubbed, smeared, brushed, braided, flounced, stuck, patched, hung, showered, thrust, bowed, puffed, tied, strained, squeezed—would we do it? Yet that is the treatment of the top of the head only! Such is the fond and pathetic devotion of the better sex!

The orchestra has entered—a dozen pieces—and away they go into a waltz. Some of the wonderful heads faintly beat time. Some of the sweet young faces grow calm and rapt, as if gazing inward upon remembered joys—a perfect polka at Cape May—dreamy deux-temps at Newport. The roses and lilies of these cheeks are ruffled by no sharper memories. Was that an evanescent cloud-shadow of pain? It was only a remembered glove-button that snapped off at the Cape. It was the luckless Roman punch that dropped a little stain at the otherwise spotless sea-side hop. But before the rapt face the green curtain is drawing up, and here is the fairy prelude.

For the play was the Cricket on the Hearth, and a prettier play more admirably acted is not often seen. The stage appointments were complete and admirable, and all things worked harmoniously. The fluttering, glittering little fairies of the prelude spoke their measured lines in clear, childish silver treble. The pictures in the air promptly shone and faded. The self-possessed queen fairy waved her wand, and, presto! the forest turned inside out, things rose and slid and fell and flapped, and here is John Peerybingle's cottage, and there is the spacious chimney, and the contemplative cat, and—soft you, now—the fair Dot; and presently Tilly and the baby, and then John shaking off the snow, and Edward, and Caleb, and Tackleton, and May, and by-and-by Bertha and Mrs. Fielding.

The charm of the acting was its freshness and uniformity. There was no stale "gag," no traditional hack-work, no star to which all other light was sacrificed, but each part was so happily conceived and rendered that the mirror was held up to nature with a general success that, upon the whole, we have never seen surpassed. There are very pathetic, almost tragic touches in the story, and they were very truly and tenderly expressed—not in the least overdone, but with a really powerful simplicity. The humor was not caricatured, and even Tilly was no more extravagant than was set down by Dickens. The audience was not demonstrative. It was natural, for the play was too well done for boisterous applause. There were no "points," which generally excite a vehement noise in the audience and ruin the play, but the exquisite spirit of the story pervaded the whole performance.

Then the green curtain came down and all was over. "These our actors" suddenly became names only and memories to a musing Easy Chair. But could all these gentle spectators step up on the stage and play as well as their friends who have just vanished from our view? Under all these hairy palaces and towers and bead-capped pinnacles lurks such a pleasant talent? So he asked as he slowly rolled along, and humbly sought not to plant a castor upon a single silken train. If this be so, if all these lilies and pinks and roses are but embroidered napkins hiding a talent, we are curiously unfair to each other. Think what a hermit may live at the bottom of the garden moving out in front of you! Why not? The Tyrian dye was first fished up in the Murex. The pearl comes in the oyster-shell. And under the flowers, feathers, wigs, scratches, horse-hair, which compose this truly superb work of the barber's art, there may be a relic of nature as sweet and tender as any we have just seen.

In speaking last month of the pleasant Shakespeare dinner at the Century, which we understand was mainly due to the happy thought and energy of Mr. William T. Blodgett and Mr. James Lorimer Graham, Jun., gentlemen well known to artists and authors, we mentioned the interesting statement of Mr. Richard Grant White that, after long and faithful search through the plays and sonnets and poems, the only passage in praise of women that he could find was that which he had selected as the motto of the toast to Woman—

"From women's eyes this doctrine I derive:
They sparkle still the right Promethean fire;
They are the books, the arts, the academes
That show, contain, and nourish all the world."

We are glad to know that the accomplished commentator proposes to follow the trail, and we may therefore look for a valuable monograph upon the subject. A writer in the Round Table, however, takes Mr. White to task, and quotes the speech of the Duke in the Twelfth Night, Act II., Scene 4:

"For boy, however we may praise ourselves,
Our fancies are more giddy and infirm,
More longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn Than women's are."

He insinuates that still other passages may be found. But of this Mr. White will undoubtedly advise us.

During the dinner the Rev. Dr. Vinton, in a clerically humorous vein, criticised the speech in response to the toast of "Woman," as if the speaker had asserted a moral perfection for Shakespeare's women. The ingenious divine showed that even the men of the Bible were not perfect, and asked, by implication, how then could the women of Shakespeare be so? It might be enough to reply by stating that the men of the Bible are historical personages, and the women of Shakespeare are creations of the imagination. But the answer would be unnecessary, for the learned Doctor's speech proceeded upon a curious misapprehension. The perfection to which the previous speaker alluded was not moral completeness but artistic symmetry. In this view Lady Macbeth is as perfect as Virgilia or Isabella—just as Titian's portrait of a naughty Venetian lady would be as perfect as his picture of the Madonna. There is, indeed, in Shakespeare's plays such a fair society of truly noble women that to speak of them in general is to imply the highest graces and charms of womanly character; but when they are spoken of as perfect it is as individual portraits.

The speaker to whom the Doctor replied was clearly of opinion that the condition of women has been always the test of civilization, as the quality of a man's regard for women is the true test of his manhood. And it is in this that modern Christian manhood is superior to the Greek or Roman. In Greece, where Sappho sang and Corinna five times bore away the lyric palm from Pindar, the Greece of Plato, of Eschylus, of Praxiteles, whose chief tradition was a war of nations for a woman's hand, wives were considered necessary evils, and women were treated like blood mares. Mohammed, founding a new civilization, provides a Paradise well peopled with lovely houris for faithful men in the next world, but he leaves faithful women quite out in the dark and cold. But as Mohammed bought one of his nine wives for a hand-mill, a water jar, and a pillow, he probably held the Chinese theory, of which Huc tells us, that women have no souls, or if they have, so exceedingly small as not to be worth saving. Chivalry, on the other hand, swore by God and its lady; but while it worshiped her as an idol it treated her like a courtesan.

The genial Dick Steele, whom Dr. Johnson would have called the most clubbable of men, the gay husband who reckoned his absence from his wife by wine-measure, writing to her from the tavern that he will be with her "within a pint of wine," but whose bright and restless mind was faithful to womanly worth, said of Lady Elizabeth Hastings: "To behold her is an immediate check to loose behavior. And to love her is a liberal education." But if to know one such woman is to go to school, surely the speaker to the toast of Woman at the Century dinner was of opinion, that to be familiar with the splendid society of Shakespeare's women is to graduate at the University with all the honors. Being upon familiar terms with him, the Easy Chair has asked him to write down what he did say; and he has done so, explaining that in his copy he retains two or three passages which were in his mind but not in his mouth, and which he omitted because he found that his remarks, as Dr. Lieber, who sat near, might say in his native tongue, were drawing themselves out. Our friend assures us that he has preserved as nearly as possible the precise form of what he said, and he assures us of his hearty regret that we are not able to relieve his remarks by the others; a service which we believe will be done elsewhere.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN:

Mr. Carlyle, at his late inauguration at Edinburgh, spoke for an hour and a half to prove that silence is the eternal duty of a man. I confess that at this moment I am wholly of his opinion. In a choice company of men met to celebrate the genius of the man who, by the most faithful portraiture, has most highly honored woman, I feel that the most fitting voice to reply to this sentiment would be of a softer tone and gentler sex than mine. Some sweet young Doctor Portia, from Belmont and Padua, who charmed the bearded court of Venice with the eloquence of justice, or some fair Rosalind, whom the feeding deer of Arden did not affright, and who would therefore probably not shrink from the milder perils of a stag dinner at the Century—these, and such as they, should be our orators; these, with wit and song and cadenced phrase, should gild the fine gold and paint the lily of our festival. It is an old scandal that a woman's tongue is her best friend; and if there are any of the sex who can speak for themselves, they are surely Shakespeare's women. For it is the consummation of his genius that his women are not less various and perfect than his men. Authors generally draw their men with their right hands and their women with their left, but Shakespeare is even-handed. Like a master musician who strikes the melody from the ringing strings and with the same power, whether with one hand or with both, so from human nature, the harp of a thousand strings, the master poet sweeps with equal skill his infinite variations of men and women. He criticises all other poets, all other literature in this respect as Mont Blanc criticises the rest of the Alps, by rising higher and nearer heaven. And so universal is this impression of exquisite completeness, so natural the feeling that like roses and stars these creations of the poet need no superlatives or explanations, that Shelley, when he would perfectly express a woman without describing her, says simply,

"She was like one of Shakespeare's women."

Indeed in his late little book quaintly called "Sesame and Lilies," Mr. Ruskin says that Shakespeare has no heroes, he has only heroines; and he adds with his usual insight, and richly illustrates his assertion, that the catastrophe of every play is caused always by the folly of a man, and the redemption, if there be any, by the wisdom and virtue of a woman. That is undoubtedly true, and it is but another proof of the fact that he held the mirror up to universal nature. For I am afraid we must confess, gentlemen, here where we shall not be overheard by the other sex, that the devil is always masculine. We hear of the father of lies, but of no mother. The woman must be put out of a man before the devil can come in; yes, and out of a woman, too. When Duncan's coming is announced to the pleasant-seated castle of Macbeth, Lady Macbeth instantly exclaims, as if to express the paramount necessity of the hour,

"Come you spirits
That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here,
And fill me from the crown to the toe, top-full Of direst cruelty."

And when she unveils her deadly purpose to Macbeth, all sense of the woman in his wife dies in his mind, and, appalled by the more terrible man in her, he cries,

"Bring forth men children only;
For thy undaunted mettle should compose Nothing but males."

But while the spirit of evil in human affairs is thus typified as masculine, the great saving cardinal virtues, as well as the Graces and Muses, are symbolized by women. "Why," says the old rhyme,

"Why are the Graces, every one,
If not to show that they in grace
Do more excel than we,
Why are the virtues, every one,
Pictured as women be,
If not to show our hearts them know
More virtuous than we."

Is it not from the same instinct that the artists have always given the benignant aspect of him whom Christendom reveres as the incarnation of saving grace for mankind, a pensive, feminine beauty?

Perhaps it is natural that other nations should bear us a little grudge because Shakespeare wrote in our language. They are fond of smiling at the English-speaking people for deifying Shakespeare very much as we Americans are bantered for making Washington a demi-god. Louis Blanc says that, at a dinner at Douglas Jerrold's, he exasperated the whole British company of wits by declaring that Shakespeare was subject to criticism like all other poets. "I added, jestingly," says he, "that my devotion for Shakespeare was all the more meritorious that there was nothing superstitious in it." But he adds that he found he had uttered a blasphemy, and therefore explained, with humility, that he meant only that even in presence of the grand image of Shakespeare—and he knew none more grand—criticism preserves its privileges.

But the nimble-witted Frenchman would not deny that, until Shakespeare, there had been no satisfactory portraits of actual women in literature. Michael Angelo once came into a palace in Rome, which Raphael and his pupils were decorating, and he saw that the heads of the figures were too small. He found no fault, but taking a crayon he drew one huge head proportioned to the room, and left it. And there it remains tranquilly true and superior. So came Shakespeare into literature. He found plenty of noble figures of men, but the ethereal essence of woman was distorted and dwarfed into goddesses and mistresses and slaves. But nature and his own heart were good enough for him. He dipped his pencil in a sunbeam, and with its radiant point drew woman as the universal heart of man knows and loves and honors her. He rescued her from the exaggerating rainbow mists of adulation and the degrading mire of passion, and placed her upon the solid ground of truth as God placed Eve in the garden—not a houri or a slave, but an ennobling companion—

"A creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food,
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles."

* * * * *

A perfect woman nobly planned
To warn, to comfort, and command.
But yet a spirit still, and bright
With something of angelic light.

We do not read, Sir, that Shakespeare was a politician; but he carried his great bill of the equal humanity of woman by the unanimous vote of the Upper and the Lower House—the head and the heart—and the Supreme Court of the civilized conscience of mankind has confirmed its entire constitutionality.

But it is not merely the faithful general appreciation of womanly nature, revealing a heart profoundly alive to the divine force of the feminine element, but it is the fidelity of the individual portraiture which is Shakespearian. Our friend and fellow-guest, who, among Shakespeare's scholars, has written his name with a long White* letter, remarks, in his delightful Life of Shakespeare, that the women of the earlier plays, when the memory of Anne Hathaway was freshest, are unlovable and the reverse of gentle; and the German Commentator, Gervinus, agrees with him that the high society of London cured the poet of his Stratford ill-humor with the sex, and revealed to him a womanly character of which he had no previous experience. But whatever the essential quality of the woman he draws may be, whether Catharine, Julia, or Lavinia, Portia or Juliet or Helena, Ophelia, Imogen, Desdemona, Virgilia, Isabella, or Cordelia, each is complete, each image of a woman rises in the firmament of Shakespeare's mind, pure, separate, perfect, like a planet into the sky.

Sir and Gentlemen, as we sit here this evening in this pleasant club—our Mermaid if you choose—and recall of heroes in clusters, of poets in constellations—the shining era of which Shakespeare is the central figure—let us not forget that it was essentially the same world in which we live, the same human nature that surrounds us. One steady thought scatters the glamour of poetry and history, and shows us that we do not live in the lees of time and the world's decrepitude. Does Sir Philip Sidney in that enriching distance seem to us the flower of heroism? Yet it is only the brave and beloved Sidneys of these last years who truly reveal the Philip of three hundred years ago; and it is the unsung heroines whom we know all around us who interpret Shakespeare's women and prove the poet's truth. They are not fabulous fairies and impossible sirens that he drew when his hand was happiest and his vision most clear; for his imagination could not transcend nature, and "hundred-handed" though it was, it drew only what we know. Therefore they are Shakespeare's women who for four years rested the stricken nation upon their hearts. They are Shakespeare's women who every where in the land by the coast, on the prairie, among the hills, along the rivers, worked patiently day and night to soothe the suffering soldier. They are Shakespeare's women who trod undismayed in the bloody tracks of battle to bind up ghastly wounds and wipe the brow of agony. They are Shakespeare's women, because Nature whispered the choicest secrets of her daughters to her dearest son, who went softly by night to hospitals and camps, and tenderly taking the dying hand when hope was vain, held it fast and breathed a prayer, and sent the brave soul comforted to heaven. Of such women who are in all our hearts and homes he sang under other names. Therefore it is that he is of all times and of all lives. His genius is the magic bough whose immortal peel awakens every echo of human experience. The heights and the depths of our natures respond. Those strains fill the world of our imagination with familiar but mysterious music—the echoes of our own souls—

"The spacious times of great Elizabeth,"

"O Love! they die in you rich sky,
They fall on hill or field or stream,
Four echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever—
Flow, begin, blow! set the wild echoes flying,
And answer echoes answer—flying, flying, flying!"

Since then they are not portraits of the dead but of the living, may we live worthy of the women of Shakespeare!

Speculating in the May Number upon novel-writing in this country we suggested various explanations of our poverty in that respect, but none that seemed to us satisfactory. We agree with a friend who has a right to speak upon the subject that it is not enough to say that we are raw; that we are not yet artistic, and that we are too fond of money-getting. But we can not wholly agree with him that the adequate explanation is the old one, that "poor pay is poor preach." Poor pay explains a great deal of suffering among authors, but it does not explain the absence of genius. Nor is it satisfactory to say that the genius seeks a sphere elsewhere. For we doubt if genius is a general power. It is not proved that Grant can write a good novel. It is very clear that Hawthorne could not have taken Richmond.

"A man," says our friend, "can not lay up money, he can not even live in America, by writing novels. Consequently, unless the idea so possesses him that he can do nothing else, he writes one promising book and then turns to something which will feed him in bread and butter." Our friend thinks the insuperable difficulty is that every man in America who offers a novel to a publisher discovers that the publisher can have the works of Dickens, or Bulwer, or Miss Evans, or Trollope, or Charles Reade for a trifle, or for nothing, and naturally will not pay a high price for the novel of an unknown author, whose chances of becoming known are thereby extinguished.

Of course there can be no question that in the absence of an international copyright law the rights of authors upon both sides of the sea are sacrificed. There is no reason why the property which is produced by the brain in the form of literature should not be as perfectly respected as that produced in the form of bank-stock or real estate; and so long as it is not, literature, as a profession, must needs languish.

Yet the power that creates a literature does not wholly depend for its assertion upon the condition suggested by our friend. Fourteen years ago novel-writers in this country encountered the same hard competition that they do now. Yet at that time the London Times began a review of Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance" in this strain: "We must look out. America is going ahead, and threatens to outstrip us in a direction altogether unexpected. It has taken the energetic people of the United States not quite thirty years to convince the world of their unapproachable skill in the art of material development. Another half-century may enable them to prove their superiority over contemporary nations in labors purely intellectual. We have long depended for our cottons on America. We are now beginning to import our novels." The competition could not suppress the genius of Hawthorne nor divert it from its natural tendency.

At about the same time Mrs. Stowe had received more than ten thousand dollars for three months' copyright of "Uncle Tom's Cabin;" and the novel has now reached a sale of more than three hundred and fourteen thousand. There are other instances of large sums paid and offered for novels, showing that the want of quality as well as of encouragement is a cardinal element of the explanation we are seeking.

If it be said that the two cases mentioned are exceptional, and that we interpret the statement too liberally, then it is reduced to the assertion that the English competition nips our novels of the second class in the bud; that if it were abolished we should have our Trollopes and Reades and Miss Mallocks and Thomases and Howdells. Our friend would say that he is speaking of literature as a profession, and not of the phenomenal results, which are independent of all rules. He does not chide the publisher who makes his bargain according to the existing condition. It is very unwise to expect one class of traders to pay for an inferior article when they can have the superior for nothing. Only, he insists, by such a system you destroy the possibility of ever having any better. "Until the American author sees a chance he will not show. Suppose that it was impossible for an American lawyer to earn more than $1500 or $1800 a year, how many good lawyers should we have? The legal-brained youth of the land would turn to mechanics or trade. Poor pay, poor preach." So far as the profession of literature is concerned our friend is unquestionably correct.

THE great question of conduct in travelling can be argued, it appears, quite as subtly and skillfully by one sex as by the other. But we observe that most of the arguments are mainly statements of individual experience. The root of the difficulty, we are inclined to believe, lies in the parsimony of the companies. If they would provide more accommodation we should certainly have less complaint. But that would reduce the opportunity of politeness; so that, if we are bent upon universal courtesy, we must cultivate the spirit of the martyrs, and refuse all alleviations. To have plenty of room in the cars would be to hell the pews in our churches. What conceivable glory would there be in a pilgrimage with vegetable pads for the feet? The question is to be tried perfectly only in crowded cars. Then and there we shall see who prefers the comfort of the other sex to his own enjoyment.

There is a great deal of nice observation revealed in this little note. It suggests how much of the ostrich there is in man, for who of us has not thought himself hidden because his head was concealed, or who has not been guilty of the transparent absurdity of the simulated nap which this bright-eyed critic exposes?

"I am not a woman at all, but only a young girl; not very wise upon any subject, and certainly I don't know much about travelling, because my experience has been confined almost altogether to one railroad; but I should like to tell you what I think about it, if I may. That one railroad is the Morris and Essex, and the greater part of the passengers are gentlemen who live in Orange, but are in business in New York, and so the trains in the morning, and in the evening more especially, are often overcrowded, and ladies are left sometimes without seats. Now, Mr. Easy Chair, I don't blame those gentlemen in the least for looking out of the window, and burying themselves in their newspapers; because it is not as if it were something that happened only once in a while. The gentleman always comes home in that same train, and he can't be expected to give up his seat every day; and, besides, he has been busy at work ever since morning, while the ladies (not always, but very often) have only 'run down to the city' for an afternoon's shopping, or to make a few calls, or for exercise and change of air, perhaps. To be sure they often walk a great deal more than they need in their shopping expeditions, but then that is their own fault, says my gentleman (he is pretending to be asleep all this while, you know!) to himself, and he ends his cogitations with a mental growl of, 'Why can't they stand as well as I can? They've got feet!' And since he has come to such a laudable decision he opens his eyes, and perhaps sees me standing alone (when he shut them there were two or three ladies, and that made a great deal of difference, because he couldn't supply seats for them all!), and so he looks around once, to be sure there is no vacant seat in the car, and then once more, to see if no one else is going to offer me one. And then he rises abruptly, and, without looking at me, says something that I suppose means, 'Will you take my seat, Madam (sometimes he says nothing at all)? and in three seconds more has walked off to the end of the car, or at least turned his back toward me. And now, Mr. Easy Chair, I am coming to my point (it is almost time, you will say). I want you to ask that gentleman how he expects me to thank him. Of course I don't want him to sit still and offer me his seat. I should know then that he meant me to refuse it. But he seems to take it for granted that I have not seen all the preliminary motions, and have no suspicion of his reluctance (such innocently unobserving creatures ladies are!); and so he thinks I should be glad of the seat, and that the matter is ended as soon as he turns away. And that is all very well, so far, but I don't think he need shrug his shoulders then, and complain of ladies' ingratitude. What can I do? I am left standing by the seat that I would very much rather leave unoccupied, only that a railroad car is too public a place for a lady to show a spirit of independence. I don't bestow 'my sweetest smile and most fascinating glance' on the back of the gentleman's head, but conscientiously say thank you to something or any thing, and meekly seat myself. What else can I do? Does the gentleman expect me to pull his coat-sleeve, or to raise my voice to a high enough pitch to be heard above the noise and bustle, or to rush after him to the end of the car, or what am I to do, pray? If I could only catch his eye for a second there would be no difficulty. Surely it would be very easy for him to pay me the delicate compliment of letting me suppose that he gave up his seat for my own individual sake, and not just because I wear a bonnet (though I believe gentlemen will not allow that ladies wear bonnets of late years—but at least they wear veils, or carry parasols, or have some distinguishing mark!). He may possibly have eyes in the back of his head, or sounding-boards connected in some way with his ears, but how am I to know that my 'Thank you' is not wasted on the desert air (or the car air, which amounts to the same thing)? Now, Mr. Easy Chair, the gentleman has been telling you that the grateful acknowledgment is the exception, and not the rule, but don't you believe him! To tell the truth, he was just the least bit cross because his conscience would not let him sit comfortably in his seat! As I said before, I don't blame him for not liking to give it up, or for being out of humor about it; but I don't think it is at all fair in him to forget that part of it afterward, and try to make you believe that all ladies are rude and impolite in the cars. It must have been he that told you—because, of course, an Easy Chair, being self-provided, can have no personal experience of the kind. And next time he comes to make such complaints to you, ask him how he knows that the lady did not thank him?"

On the evening of the 21st of May Halevy's opera of La Juive was performed at the great Opera-house in New York known as the Academy of Music; and before most of the audience were in bed that night the building was virtually destroyed by fire. It was the forty-fourth theatre burned in the United States since 1798, making one theatre destroyed in about every eighteen months. The night was unusually cold for the season, and there was a violent gale which swept the flames furiously against the neighboring buildings, so that the University Medical College, a large piano-forte factory, a restaurant, and several stores were also destroyed, and a church, a lumber yard, and various buildings were seriously injured. The fire was first discovered among some packing-boxes under the stage, but its origin is unknown.

Our friends out of the city have reason to regret this fire, for they were especially interested in a building which had been the scene of such various and pleasant amusement; and the city itself has lost one of its ornaments, for not only was the Academy a very large building, but it was graceful and imposing, and was well situated upon one of the most spacious streets. Mr. Alexander Saeltzler was the architect, and although it was easy to find fault with many of the details of the interior, it was undoubtedly the most festal and elegant hall in the country. The heavy caryatides and the elaborate ornamentation provoked some sharp criticism; but the effect of the massive white and gold structure was very brilliant, and a gay and luxurious architectural taste is readily pardoned in an opera-house.

But the associations of the building will make it long and regretfully remembered. There is a narrow, dark, and dirty street behind Park Row, and reaching only from Ann to Beekman streets, called Theatre Alley. There is no present justification of such a name, for only the iron-shuttered backs of huge warehouses look upon the little street, and there is no sign of a theatre. But the back doors of the old Park Theatre opened upon it, and some of the most famous personages in theatrical history have driven in here, and alighted and passed in to their intoxicating and evanescent triumphs. Malibran's carriage has rumbled in here, and Fanny Ellsler's; Edmund Kean and Tyrone Power and Ellen Tree knew this dingy alley; and the better pavement and the new houses can not obliterate the remembrance nor the association. The history of the late Academy is more modern, but it has the same charm; and whether it is replaced by another, or whether dwelling-houses or stores succeed it, the Easy Chairs of the next generation will pause at the corner of Irving Place, and remember that on the night of the 2d of October, 1854, the spacious and beautiful Opera-house was opened, and that Grisi and Mario were the first singers heard in it.

The house on that first evening was not well filled. There was no enthusiasm. There was even disappointment, for the remembrance of Jenny Lind was still fresh and joyous. She was in the prime of her power, and there was something in the popular estimation of her character which peculiarly appealed to American sympathy and awakened universal enthusiasm. She did not seem to the public a singer merely. Her goodness was magnetic. It was the woman that was admired as much as the artist; and the Puritan heart forgave the public singing to the private goodness. But Grisi was an artist only, and a singer past her prime. The heart and conscience which had approved the fair-haired, benevolent Jenny Lind were untouched by the superb pride of the Italian Prima Donna. The vast theatre, half empty, chilled her, and she chilled it.

It was often cold, too, upon the great stage, and she stood proudly wrapped in ermine with her magnificent shoulders set in splendid defiance of the Yankee barbarians, who gazed curiously and coldly at the queen who had seen the adoring capitals of Europe prostrate at her feet. Occasionally, but very seldom, she seemed stung to a determination to conquer; and summoning all the passion and the exquisite art which for years had given her undisputed supremacy, she sang and played with the full force of the power that had ranked her with Pasta and Catalani, but in vain. The public was exhausted or insensible. Her performance became merely mechanical. It was the mere ghost of Grisi, and she glided off the stage and out of the country unregretted.

Stefanone, a rich, unctuous nature, a singer with a full, sweet, magnetic voice, and true lyrical fire, made a deeper and more permanent impression. Then came for two or three seasons the elegant La Grange: conscientious, accomplished, "a lady," as the habitués were fond of calling her, always prompt, and exact, and satisfactory, and upon the whole the best and most trusty of the Academy prime donne. Piccolomini then, neither a great singer nor a good actress, but bright and buxom, and mainly interesting from the long tradition of her name. Here, too, Adelina Patti began, a sweet young girl with a well-trained voice, fresh and flexible, warbling like a lark, and prevailing by a bird-like charm and bloom of youth, not conquering with true lyrical passion; and here the unnamed singers of the chorus, the rank and file, essential to the effect, and if unknown not always unhonored.

These are a few of the conspicuous associations of the Academy; but the history of the boxes is more interesting than that of the stage. It can not be told, but it will be remembered. How often, as any old Easy Chair sits in the theatre and pretends to be following the play, he is furtively glancing at the romance around him—not always a comedy—so that he quite forgets the stage before him. He sees the eyes that, like his, are wandering. He recalls the Emersonian line, "Read the language of those wandering eye-beams. The heart knoweth."

A day or two after the fire we stood looking at the ruins of the Academy. There were four high brick walls and a mass of mortar, bricks, and a few charred beams upon the ground. A fireman was directing a hose toward a still smoking heap of rubbish, and as we stood gazing upon the spectral blank of the vast interior a slight young girl alighted from a carriage in Fourteenth Street, and hastened to the doorway in which we stood. Her hair was wonderful; her bonnet was inconceivable. She stopped, looked earnestly upon the ruin, and sighed. We also continued to gaze, not without an erring of the eyes toward the soft young neighbor. She was evidently recalling evenings and scenes and words exclusively associated with the Academy, and which were now without a visible monument. Again she sighed, and to the profound embarrassment of the Easy Chair his wandering eyebeams suddenly encountered hers stealthily issuing forth upon a mission of inquiry.

"I see," she said, "you are a sympathetic soul. May I tell you my story?"

It was certainly sudden, this very plain question very distinctly asked.

"My dear young lady," was the instant and spontaneous reply, "if you could trust a stranger, I am sure—"

"No, no," she said, and as she confronted him the Easy Chair remembered Bosio as Zerlina; "I do not feel that you are a stranger. I shall tell you. Well, you see, I am—"

"Jane, Jane!" came a voice calling from the carriage. "Come, we must go."

"Yes, dear mamma," answered Zerlina; and reluctantly delaying and turning to me she said, with the air of Alboni in La Gazza Ladra, "I am so sorry. Next time. Good-morning!"

The next time has not yet come. The Easy Chair has stood in the doorway many times, but in vain. He has an association now not only with the Academy but with its ruins.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 1st of June. Of actual events there is little to note. Congress has been mainly busy in speech-making, and endeavoring to fix upon some course of policy.

THE PLAN OF THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

The Joint Resolutions reported by the Committee of Fifteen, given in full in our last Record, came up in the House, May 10, for final action. There was a considerable majority of the Republican party who wished to amend the proposition by striking out the third section, disfranchising until 1870 all who had supported secession; but the previous question being demanded by Mr. Stevens, cutting off all amendments, the majority of the Democrats voted in its favor, in order to insure that the plan should be presented in a shape which would insure its veto by the President in case it should pass both Houses of Congress. The vote on the previous question was 90 ayes to 59 nays. The main question was then ordered, by 84 to 79; and the resolutions were put on their passage. The vote was 128 to 37 in favor of the resolutions, the Republicans voting unanimously in their favor, the "Conservative" minority apparently being assured that in its present form it would not pass the Senate. Having thus more than the requisite two-thirds majority the plan was thus passed by the House. It thereupon came up before the Senate, where it became the subject of protracted debate. On the 29th of May the third section was stricken out by a unanimous vote, and in place of it was proposed the following:

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or Elector of President or Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; but Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."

Several amendments were proposed to this substitute, the general object of all being to relieve from disability those who had resigned offices under the United States previously to assuming posts under the Confederacy. These were all rejected by a vote of about three to one.

MR. STEVENS'S NEW PROPOSITION.

On the 28th of May, Mr. Stevens, foreseeing that the plan of the Committee would fail, introduced the following "Bill to enable the States lately in rebellion to regain their privileges in the Union," which was read twice and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union:

Whereas, The eleven States which lately formed the Government of the so-called Confederate States of America have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution, and can be reinstated in the same only through the action of Congress; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that the eleven States lately in rebellion may form valid State Governments in the following manner:

Sec. 2. The State Governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and though, in many instances, the Constitutions were adopted under duress and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be treated as such.

Sec. 3. Whenever the Legislatures of said States shall enact that Conventions shall be called to form legitimate State Governments, by the formation and adoption of State Constitutions, the Governor or Chief Executive officer shall direct an election to be held on a day certain, to choose delegates to a Convention, who shall meet at the time fixed by the Legislature, and form a State Constitution, which shall be submitted to a vote of the people, and if ratified by a majority of the loyal voters, shall be declared the Constitution of the State.

Sec. 4. The persons who shall be entitled to vote at both of said elections shall be as follows: All male citizens, above the age of twenty-one years, who have resided one year in said State or ten days within the election district.

Sec. 5. The word "citizens," as used in this act, shall be considered to mean all persons except Indians not taxed, born in the United States or duly naturalized. Any male citizen above the age of twenty-one years shall be competent to be elected to act as a delegate to said Convention.

Sec. 6. All persons who held office, either civil or military, under the Government of the so-called Confederate States of America, or who swore allegiance to said Government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship, and to have renounced all allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise until five years after they have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States, and renounce allegiance to all other Governments or pretended Governments; the said application to be filed and oath taken in the same Courts that by law are authorized to naturalize foreigners.

Sec. 7. No Constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any rights, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial, without regard to race or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void, and said State shall lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Sec. 8. Whenever the foregoing conditions shall be complied with, the citizens of said State may present said Constitution to Congress, and if the same shall be approved by Congress, said State shall be declared entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities, and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State within the Union. No Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either House of Congress until Congress shall have declared the State entitled thereto.

VETO OF THE COLORADO BILL.

The bill, previously passed in the Senate, for the admission of Colorado as a State, was passed in the House, May 3, by a vote of 80 to 55. The bill was returned on the 16th by the President, without his approval. The reasons assigned are: (1.) That the establishment of a State Government is not at present necessary for the welfare of Colorado. The population is small—from 25,000 to 40,000, and many of these are not permanent inhabitants, but are ready to remove to other mining districts if circumstances render them more inviting. (2.) It is not certain that a majority of the people desire the establishment of a State Government. In 1864, out of a vote of 6192 there was a majority of 3152 against the change. In September, 1865, the question was again presented, without any legal authority, and out of 5905 votes there was a majority of only 155 in favor of a State organization. It is not safe to recognize the illegal election as setting aside the former legal one. (3.) It would be unjust to give to (say) 30,000 people of Colorado an equal weight in the Senate with the 4,000,000 of New York, and in the Electoral College three votes to the thirty-three of New York; that is, in the choice of President to allow one person in Colorado to have as much weight as one hundred in New York. It is desirable to have something like an equality in this respect among the several States. Though for various reasons great inequalities have been allowed, in no one is it so great as in this instance. The population of Colorado is, moreover, apparently decreasing, instead of increasing. Besides these reasons the President adds:

"The condition of the Union at the present moment is calculated to inspire caution in regard to the admission of new States. Eleven of the old States have been for some time and still remain unrepresented in Congress. It is a common interest of all the States, as well those represented as those unrepresented, that the integrity and harmony of the Union should be restored as completely as possible, so that all those who are expected to bear the burdens of the Federal Government should be consulted concerning the admission of new States; and that in the mean time no new State shall be prematurely and unnecessarily admitted to a participation in the political power which the Federal Government wields, not for the benefit of any individual State or section, but for the common safety, welfare, and happiness of the whole country."

VIEWS OF THE CABINET.

Most of the members of the Cabinet have taken occasion to enunciate their views on the present situation. On the 21st of May Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, made a formal speech at Auburn, his place of residence. He commenced by alluding to the unanimity with which the Democratic party and the people of the South had become the supporters of the measures advocated by the President. This sudden conversion seemed to many to be suspicious; he looked upon it as the inevitable result of the successful resistance to rebellion. "How," he asked, "could Democrats and rebels avoid being converted?" The work of reconciliation had outrun expectation; it had no parallel in human affairs. With less disturbance than often attends a popular election in a time of profound peace, the formerly disloyal people of the seceding States had framed Constitutions in conformity with that of the United States, had ratified the amendment abolishing slavery, and had chosen State and municipal officers. "Between the Federal Government and those restored and reorganized State Governments there exists now a more complete and practical harmony than has ever before prevailed between the Union and so many of its members since it was first established." And all this had been done with the absolute concurrence of the people, free from military control, and while the army of the United States had been reduced from a million and a half to sixty or eighty thousand men. Foreign nations had meanwhile desisted from intervention, and assumed an attitude of conciliation and friendship. The people of the lately disloyal States had chosen Senators and Representatives to Congress, and labor was reorganizing itself in those States. The main thing which now disturbed the public mind was the disagreement between the President and the representatives in Congress of the Union party. Mr. Seward then proceeded to argue that this disagreement, in fact, related only to things not essential. The one thing which all desired was—not reconstruction, for nothing had been really destroyed—but reconciliation. The plan supported by the President was not one devised by him, but one which had grown up from the circumstances which had arisen. Congress, while it had not accepted or rejected this, had proposed none which was immediately practicable. Mr. Seward passed in review the principal points of divergence between the President and the majority in Congress, justifying the action of the President. The main points of disagreement now were, whether loyal members from the lately disloyal States should now be admitted to Congress, or whether the people of those States should until 1870 be disfranchised, as was proposed by the third section of the plan proposed by the Reconstruction Committee. "The postponement of reconciliation," said Mr. Seward, "until 1870 is equivalent to a rejection, so far as these members of Congress are concerned, unless that, being enlightened by the autumnal elections, they shall conclude to review and reverse their action next winter. The question of reconciliation in Congress must soon come to this complexion: Either loyal representatives coming from States that stand in an attitude of loyalty to the Union must now be admitted, or we have no reconciliation except through an appeal to the people in future elections. Upon such a question we may patiently and hopefully await the final decision of Congress. No Congress, I think, could be inconsiderate enough to leave the question in that fearful state. A failure of reconciliation for an indefinite period would and could be nothing less than a practical abandonment of the nation to the rebellion. It would be disunion and revolution; it would be Mexican or French anarchy.... My conclusion," said Mr. Seward, in closing, "is that I am hopeful; hopeful of the President, hopeful of Congress, hopeful of the National Union Party, hopeful of the Democratic Party, hopeful of the represented States, hopeful of the unrepresented States, above all hopeful of the whole People, and hopeful of the continued favor of Almighty God."

On the 22d a serenade was given to the different members of the Cabinet at Washington in accordance with previous arrangements. The object clearly was to afford them an occasion to define their position. Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. Speed, Attorney-General, declined to speak; the former, in a note to the committee, referring to his course in Congress as an exponent of his opinions, and the latter on the ground of want of time for preparation. Mr. Welles, Secretary of the Navy, said, briefly: "This compliment is, I suppose, for the Administration and its policy, which we one and all approve. You are one and all for the Union, I suppose, and for the establishment of the rights of the States. These are my views."

Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, spoke at considerable length. The main points in his speech were that the measures of the President, embodied in his dispatches to the various Provisional Governors and other published declarations, had received the sanction of every member of the Cabinet. Mr. Stanton himself was originally in favor of so fixing the basis of representation as to secure the right of suffrage to such of the freedmen as were qualified to discharge it; but he had yielded to the adverse arguments based upon the practical difficulties in the way of carrying it into effect, and to the President's conviction that it was beyond the scope of his authority to prescribe the rule of suffrage. The general principles advanced in the President's Message met his cordial approbation. He had been in favor of the President's signing the Freedmen's Bureau Bill; but as he had not done so, and as it was not passed by the requisite two-thirds in Congress over the veto, it was no longer a living measure, nor a subject of debate or dissension. The Civil Rights Bill, having become a law, notwithstanding the President's veto, was also no longer a subject of debate. Mr. Stanton expressed no opinion upon this measure. He spoke in decided opposition to the plan submitted by the Reconstruction Committee, especially of that feature of it which excludes, until 1870, all persons who aided the rebellion from voting for members of Congress and Presidential Electors.

Mr. McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury, also spoke at considerable length, in terms of unreserved approval of the policy of the President. He said: "The general policy of the President in reference to the Southern States, and the people recently in arms against the Federal Government, has commended itself to my deliberate judgment; and although it has been violently, and in some cases vindictively assailed, I have an abiding conviction that it will be approved by the people when they shall be allowed to pass judgment upon it at the ballot-box.... His policy is straightforward, intelligible, practical. It is a pretty good evidence of the correctness of this policy that Congress, after having been in session nearly six long weary months, has been unable to present one which they can agree upon as a substitute.... I have desired and hoped for the continuation of this great Union Party, with which I have ever been identified; but if its leaders can present nothing better than the programme of the Reconstruction Committee, I am greatly apprehensive that its days are numbered. I trust that this will not be the case; that it will discard its hostility, and its attempt to continue alienation between the two sections of the country, and that it will embrace those principles which look to harmony, to restoration, and to peace. If it does not do this its days are numbered, and the epitaph that will be written over it will be: 'It knew how to prosecute the war with vigor, but it lacked the wisdom to avail itself of the benefits of victory.'"

Mr. Dennison, the Postmaster-General, spoke in a very similar strain. After setting forth what has already been accomplished toward reconciliation, Mr. Dennison continued: "But one thing remains to complete the work of restoration, and to clothe the Southern States with all their Constitutional privileges, and that is their representation in Congress. Upon this I deeply regret that there is any difference between the President and our friends in Congress.... But I do not think these differences are irreconcilable. If I am not greatly at fault, time and discussion are bringing the President and Congress rapidly together on the basis of a common platform of action.... The work of restoration calls for every concession authorized by the Constitution. I will not doubt that this concession will be made, and the results of the war by which the nation was preserved will be secured and perpetuated on the basis of peace and concord between the people of all sections of our country."

INDICTMENT OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The Grand Jury of the District of Virginia, sitting at Norfolk, have brought in a bill of indictment against Jefferson Davis for treason and conspiracy. The indictment contains but one specification, which, stripped of much legal technicality and repetition, is to the effect that, On the 15th of June, 1864, Jefferson Davis, late of the city of Richmond, yeoman, being an inhabitant of and residing within the United States of America, and owing allegiance to the said United States of America, did, with force and arms, levy and carry on war, insurrection, and rebellion against the United States, and "with a great multitude of persons whose names are to the jurors unknown, to the number of five hundred persons and upward, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner—that is to say, with cannon, muskets, pistols, swords, dirks, and other warlike weapons," arrayed themselves in a hostile manner against the United States of America, and did "traitorously ordain, prepare, levy, and carry on war against the said United States of America, contrary to the duty of allegiance and fidelity of the said Jefferson Davis, against the Constitution, government, peace, and dignity of the said United States of America, and against the form of the statutes of the said United States of America, in such case made and provided."—It is understood that the trial will take place in the autumn before the United States Supreme Court, Chief-Justice Chase presiding.—The health of Mr. Davis is considerably impaired.

DEATH OF WINFIELD SCOTT.

Winfield Scott died at West Point, on the 29th of May, at the age of eighty years, lacking a fortnight. He was born near Petersburg, Virginia, June 13, 1786. He was educated for a lawyer, and was admitted to the bar in 1806; but never fairly entered upon the practice of his profession, turning his attention to military affairs. In 1808 he became Captain of artillery in one of the new regiments then formed. In 1812, directly after war had been declared against Great Britain, he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel, and ordered to the Northern frontier. On the 13th of October he was made prisoner at the battle of Queenstown, but was soon exchanged and rejoined the army, where he served with brilliant success. In March, 1814, he was appointed Brigadier-General. In July he fought several brilliant actions, capturing Fort Erie on the 3d, winning the battle of Chippewa on the 5th, and that of Niagara or Lundy's Lane on the 25th. In this last action he was severely wounded. In the mean while he was raised to the rank of Major-General, being then twenty-eight years of age. During the years which followed he was actively engaged wherever his services were required both in a military and diplomatic capacity. In 1841, upon the death of General Macomb, he became General-in-Chief of the army. His services in the Mexican War, beginning with the capture of Vera Cruz, and ending with that of the City of Mexico, are too well-known to need recapitulation. In 1852 he was nominated by the Whig party for the Presidency, but was defeated by Franklin Pierce, Scott receiving nearly 1,400,000 votes to 1,600,000 cast for his opponent. In 1855 he was appointed Lieutenant-General by brevet, to date from March 29, 1847, the date of the capture of Vera Cruz. On the 31st of October, 1861, he asked to be placed on the list of officers retired from active service, on the ground of the infirm state of his health. The request was granted "without reduction in his current pay, subsistence, or allowances," the President expressing the "nation's sympathy in his personal affliction, and their profound sense of the important public services rendered by him to the country during his long and brilliant career, among which will ever be gratefully distinguished his faithful devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag, when assailed by a parricidal rebellion." Although his strength had been declining for many months the close of his life was sudden and unexpected. No man in our history has left behind him the record of a more pure and honorable career in the public service than that of Winfield Scott.

THE FENIANS.

The Fenian scheme appears to have wholly collapsed. Early in April some scores or hundreds of Fenians made their appearance at Eastport in Maine. They belonged to the O'Mahony faction, and were supposed to be commanded by one Killian, who bore the title of General; and their purpose was said to be to invade the British province of New Brunswick. It was reported also that they had an iron-clad steamer, which was to sweep away the British fleets. Whatever may have been the hopes of the adventurers, they attempted nothing, and in a few days they all disappeared from the borders. Meanwhile James Stephens, C. O. I. R., "Chief Organizer of the Irish Republic," arrived in New York, and endeavored to harmonize the rival factions of O'Mahony and Roberts. He condemned the project of an invasion of the Canadas, and induced O'Mahony to resign; with Roberts he was unsuccessful. He brought no encouraging news from Europe. Of the vast sums said to have been collected in America only a few thousand dollars had ever reached Ireland. He indeed assured the Brotherhood that with a few hundred thousands of dollars he could before this have established the Irish Republic; and even now, with a few hundreds of thousands, he could establish it within a year.

SPANISH ATTACK UPON CALLAO.

Late in April the Spanish fleet which had been in the harbor of Valparaiso since the bombardment went away, and on the 25th appeared off Callao, the sea-port of Lima, in Peru. The fleet consisted of the iron-clad Numancia, 40 guns, the frigates Villa de Madrid, 56, Albatros, 52, Resolución, 42, Blanca, 38, Berenguela, 36, and five smaller vessels carrying 11 guns, mainly 32-pounders, though there were a few 68-pounders: in all 275 guns. The Admiral notified the shipping in the harbor to get away, as he should bombard the town in six days. The Peruvian batteries mounted about 45 guns; five of them 450-pounders, four 300-pounders, mounted upon iron turrets, the remainder being 32-pounders. The attack was opened by the Spanish fleet a little after noon, on the 2d of May, and the firing on both sides soon grew hot. A shot soon struck the Villa de Madrid, piercing the steam-chest, and she was towed out of the fight; the Berenguela was struck by a ball which went sheer through both sides. The Numancia does not appear to have been injured. The vessels withdrew a little before sunset, having apparently exhausted their ammunition. The Spanish loss was considerable; it is said amounting to 500, but this is probably too large. Admiral Nunez was severely wounded. The Peruvian loss was about 80 killed and wounded. A shell exploded in one of the turrets, setting fire to the powder, disabling the guns, and killing Señor Galvez, the Minister of War and Marine. The batteries were little injured, and were as efficient the next morning as before.

EUROPE.

The question of war and peace in Europe hangs now in an almost even scale. It is still further complicated by the action of Italy, which has suddenly placed its forces upon a war-footing and recalled all furloughs and leaves of absence, and manifests a determination to make war upon Austria for the sake of wresting from her the province of Venetia. It is impossible to present any thing like a full and intelligible abstract of the negotiations and claims and counter-claims. The essential point, however, is that Prussia insists that Austria shall disarm; Austria declares that she can not do so while Italy maintains her present threatening attitude; and in the mean while both nations are making vigorous preparations for war. The position of France has been apparently undecided. At length, on the 3d of May, M. Rouher, in the Corps Legislatif, said officially that the efforts made by France toward the maintenance of peace had been limited by a firm resolve not to contract any obligation, and to maintain liberty of action in questions which did not, after all, affect her dignity and her interests; but he continued, "Particular duties are imposed upon us in regard to Italy. Italy may believe herself called upon to interfere actively in the Austro-Prussian conflict. Every nation is the best judge of its own interests. We do not claim to exercise any guardianship over Italy. She knows that we should highly disapprove Austria making any attack upon her; so, also, we are thoroughly determined to throw upon her all the perils and risks of any attack she may make upon Austria. The policy of the Government is a pacific policy, an honest neutrality, and complete liberty of action." M. Thiers, in reply, said that the balance of power in Europe required that Italy and Germany should be composed of separate and feeble States. This was the intention of the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, and this was the intention of the treaty of 1815. The policy of Prussia was hostile to this intention. It would found a great empire in Central Europe, which would threaten France. France should therefore protest against the course of Prussia, and should warn Italy that if she attacked the statu quo by seizing upon Venetia, France would not lift a finger to save her from Austrian vengeance.—On the 6th the Emperor Napoleon made a visit to the little city of Auxerre, in the Department of Yonne, and in replying to the congratulations of the authorities said a few words, almost casually, as it appeared, which, however, like his famous New-Year's speech in 1859 to the Austrian Minister, which foreshadowed the Italian war, were meant to have a significance. He said: "I see with pleasure that the memory of the First Empire has not been effaced from your memory. I have a debt of gratitude to discharge toward Yonne. This Department was the first to give me its suffrages in 1848, because it knew that its interests were my interests, and that I detested equally with them those treaties of 1815, which it is now sought to make the sole basis of our foreign policy." These last five-and-twenty words have great significance, when it is borne in mind that this treaty of 1815 is the basis upon which rests the present territorial distribution of Europe, which took from France a considerable portion of her former possessions. In the mean while efforts are now making to convene a Congress of the European Powers to arrange the disputed questions.

The Emperor's speech at Auxerre occasioned a financial panic throughout Europe. It was especially severe in England. The Bank of England raised its rate of interest to 10 per cent.; a great number of failures took place, prominent among which was that of the old banking house of Overend and Gurney, and the suspension of Peto and Brassy, the great railway contractors. For a fortnight the pressure upon the money market was greater than had been known for a generation.—In Parliament the main subject of debate has been upon the Reform Bill; after protracted discussion the Commons, by a vote of 318 to 313, agreed to consider the bill. The majority for Government being only 5 on an important measure, the ministry under ordinary circumstances would have either resigned or have "thrown themselves on the country," by dissolving Parliament, and ordering a new election; but they decided to go on with the measure, perfecting it in points of detail.

The financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was on the whole satisfactory. The purport of all was that the revenue of the past year was £67,812,000, the expenditures £65,914,000, leaving a surplus of about £1,800,000. Of the expenditures, £26,233,000 was for interest on the public debt; £24,829,000 for the army and navy; £10,250,000 for the civil service; £4,602,000 for the collection of the revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer furnishes the following approximate statement of the public debt of the principal nations of Europe:

Great Britain.....	£799,000,000	$3,925,000,000
France.....	400,000,000	2,000,000,000
Austria.....	316,000,000	1,580,000,000
Russia.....	179,000,000	1,395,000,000
Italy.....	57,000,000	760,000,000
Spain.....	145,000,000	725,000,000
Holland.....	85,000,000	425,000,000
Turkey.....	51,000,000	255,000,000
Prussia.....	43,000,000	215,000,000
Portugal.....	33,000,000	165,000,000

Of these debts a large proportion, say £1,500,000,000 or $7,500,000,000, according to Mr. Gladstone, "has accumulated during a time of peace, and has not been thrown upon the several countries during a struggle for life." And even during peace the debt of the various nations keeps on increasing at the rate of about £60,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year. So that should peace prevail in Europe for the rest of the century, at the present rate of increase the debt of the nations enumerated would amount to nearly £4,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000. "These," said the Chancellor, "are portentous circumstances." Referring to the American debt Mr. Gladstone said, that "looking to the vigor and energy of the people, he did not think it would long remain a burden upon the people." Our principle in applying as much of the revenue as possible to the reduction of the national debt "was an example to Europe, where borrowing was the growing vice of the governments in all the states."

Editor's Drawer.

DURING the years '59, '60, and '61 there was in F—— the wildest class of students, both in law and physic, that ever studied in that elegant little place. With the assistance of two young editors they managed to keep the town on the qui vive constantly. These students organized a club among themselves. In this club no opportunity for a joke was ever allowed to pass unimproved. The war scattered its members. Some fought nobly against the rebellion, and some laid down their lives for their country. One of the survivors sends some of these club stories to the Drawer.

TOM P——, one of the most brilliant of the club, and who, poor fellow! subsequently lost his life in the service of his country, had strong indications of baldness. One day, lamenting the prospect of having his appearance marred thereby, he was consoled by Jim H—— with the following: "Never mind, Tom; an empty barn needs no thatch!" Tom said but little after that about his head.

ONE evening the subject of noses and their characteristics was under consideration, and the discussion assumed an earnest aspect. In the midst of it Will P——, whose nose was not exactly Roman in structure, said, "I wonder what makes my nose so flat at its end?" Sticking it in other folk's business!" promptly replied Charley T——. The discussion closed for that evening.

On the stove in the office of Lawyer B——, now Judge of the Supreme Court, was a bowl which, by long use, had a deposit of sediment at the bottom. When full of water, by an optical illusion it appeared as if a large cake of ice was floating in it. One day Charley M—— came in to see Will H——, then a student in the office. It was a cold day, and a fierce fire was burning in the stove, and the water in the bowl was consequently boiling hot. Charley, seeing as he supposed the ice in the bowl, very naturally put his fingers in it. Drawing them out very hurriedly, he exclaimed, most emphatically, "By thunder, Bill, that ice is hot!"

A GOOD fellow generally was Dr. Van C——, and one who never missed his joke. The Rev. Mr. M'L—— was the pastor of the church to which the Doctor belonged. The arduous labors of the pastorate injured the health of the minister, and he called on the Doctor for advice. Van examined him carefully; asked the usual number of questions; and then, with the most serious countenance imaginable, exclaimed, "Go gunning, dominie! go gunning! It will help you, and it won't hurt the birds!" It is not recorded that the "dominie" tried the experiment, but he certainly got better after the prescription was given.

THE following has appeared in print before, but those who have seen it can afford to laugh over it again, and the hundreds who have not seen it ought not to miss it:

About ten years since a young man of very good character hired a horse from a livery-stable, to ride out to a little town about twenty miles' distant. Unfortunately, about half-way out the horse was taken sick and died. The livery man sued him for the value of the horse, representing that the horse had been killed by fast riding. One of the young man's witnesses (rather green, or supposed to be, and who had a peculiar way of talking very slow) was called to the stand, and questioned thus by the prosecutor:

"Are you acquainted with the prisoner at the bar?"

"Y-a-a-s" (very slowly drawled out).

"How long have you been acquainted with him?"

"About two years."

"Well, Sir, please state to the Court what kind of a reputation he bears as regards fast or slow riding on horseback."

"W-a-a-l, I suppose if he was a riding with a company of persons who rode very fast, and he did not want to be left behind, he would ride fast too. And if he was riding with a company that rode very slow, and he did not want to go ahead alone, I suppose he would ride slow too."

JUDGE (very much enraged). "You seem very much inclined to evade answering questions properly. Now, Sir, you have stated how the gentleman rides when he is in fast company, and how he rides when he rides in slow company. Now, Sir, I wish you to state to the Court how the gentleman rides when he rides alone."

"W-a-a-l, having never had the pleasure of riding with him when he was alone, I don't think I can tell!"

IN a thriving Quaker town in Ohio, a little slip of the tongue occurred that deserves record. Little Janey C——, in speaking of the bride at an aristocratic wedding that was to take place that evening, said: "Oh, ma! she is going to have a trail to her dress three yards long, and four pall-bearers to carry it!"

THE following good one we find hid away in the columns of the San Antonio Herald. It is too good to be buried there. The story is told by Colonel Jack Baylor, who, though a great rebel, occasionally gets off a good joke. The scene is laid in Burleson County, Texas, about seventy miles below the beautiful and flourishing town of Waco, and within ten miles of the present residence of that celebrated character in Texas, "The Notch-cutter of the Yeg-uas:

Mr. Felix Taylor, familiarly known as Uncle Felix, Colonel Baylor, and two others, were out hunting, when they accidentally fell in with a small party of the Wacoos returning from the settlements, encumbered with plunder, and pursued by those whom they had robbed.

Uncle Felix, Baylor, and party attacked the retreating Indians, and pursued them so warmly as to cause one of the hindmost of their party to cut loose a large piece of beef which was tied to his saddle, in order to facilitate his escape. This was done in full view of the pursuers, just before entering the timber bordering on the Yegua, about sixty miles below Waco, in what is now Burleson County. Further pursuit was abandoned; and the three young men, being very hungry, struck fire and immediately went to cooking and eating the captured meat.

They had not proceeded far in appeasing their voracious appetites when Uncle Felix rode up to them. As the old man alighted from his horse he exclaimed, with earnestness: "Great God! how can I dig your graves with nothing but a hunting-knife? That meat's poisoned, and you'll all be dead in fifteen minutes! Run down to the river and stay there—drink just as much water as you can. Good Heavens! what fools you were to eat that poisoned meat!"

The three young men, terrified with the prospect of almost certain death, dashed off to the water, drank most bountifully, and calmly awaited their fate; but after a while their fears gave way, and they returned to the fire just as Uncle Felix was swallowing the last piece of meat. Wiping his mouth as they approached, by way of sympathy for their verdancy, the old man smilingly remarked: "Well, boys, I couldn't desert you; if the meat's poisoned we'll all die together!" They didn't die, yet they never forgot how slick Uncle Felix tricked them out of their meat.

A FEW Sabbaths since Eda was, at her own request, allowed to go to Sabbath-school for the first time, and there she learned the startling intelligence that she was made of dust!

Little Eda's mind was fully impressed with the importance of the great truth, as was evinced by her frequent reference to the subject in the shape of questions answerable and unanswerable.

This morning, however, she propounded a stunner which "brought down the house." Intently watching her mother sweeping, as if to learn the art she must finally practice, saying not a word, her eyes rested upon the little pile of dirt accumulated by the mother's broom. Just as the dirt was to be swept into the street the little philosopher burst forth with: "Ma! ma! why don't you save the dust to make some more little girls?"

A WESTERN friend writes:

I send you the following concerning our worthy friend John B——, who was the whilom Mayor of our goodly city:

John, though possessing an unbounded amount of genuine good sense, has the misfortune of having gone on the other side of the street from the school-house, so that in his speeches he very often says, "We are sure of being successful if we do not get into any divulgence of opinion," and equally outrageous words; the right word often troubles him. On the occasion of his taking the Mayor's chair John was too full for speech. He had reached the acme of his ambition, and he was sure no inaugural could add a line to his lustre—so he contented himself with stating "that this was the first time he had ever had the honor of presiding over such a distinguished body of men as the Common Council of this great city." He said he lacked experience in such matters, and he hoped the Council, at this their first meeting, would act only on business of the present and of importance—or, to quote his own words: "Gentlemen, to conclude, you will defer upon me a great favor if at this meeting you will confine your doings to the present, and not go back into futurity at all!" It is needless to say they abstained, and did not go into the futurity business.

A CALIFORNIA lawyer sends us the two following:

Some years ago, when Justices of the Peace had jurisdiction over cases where the amount involved did not exceed two hundred dollars, there lived a Squire in the coast range. A sued B before him on a note for four hundred dollars. B posted up to the next town and consulted a "limb of the law," S——. "We'll go down and throw him out of court on 'no jurisdiction,'" said S——. The day for trial came, and B and his attorney were on hand. Just to see how far he would go, S—— let him enter judgment against him, and then called his attention to the fact of "no jurisdiction." "Ah, yes," said his Honor, "Mr. S——, the Court has thought of that, and discovered a remedy. The Court enters judgment against your client for four hundred dollars, and issues two executions for two hundred dollars each!" And he did it.

THERE was a very irascible old gentleman who formerly held the position of Justice of the Peace in one of our cities. Going down the main street one day one of the boys spoke to him without coming up to his Honor's idea of deference. "Young man, I fine you five dollars for contempt of Court." "Why, Judge," said the offender, "you are not in session." "This Court," responded the Judge, thoroughly irritated, "is always in session, and consequently always an object of contempt!" There was disorder in court as his Honor passed on.

A CORRESPONDENT in a Western State sends the following "mite." A pretty considerable mite it is for the size of the Drawer:

Some time since I was in the "post-orifice business," not a thousand miles from the capital of the "Sucker State." While in the "bizness" I received from a postmaster in the classic southern part of the State the following letter relative to differences of opinion as to the proper mode of transmitting a registered letter. I came across the letter the other day, while overhauling a batch of old papers, and give it verbatim et literatim et spellatim:

The schoolmaster has been in "Egypt" since this letter was written, and things are no doubt much improved there.

ILLINOIS has some crops of wit as well as wheat, as the following "good one" from that thriving State bears witness:

An old farmer and his wife came to town to do some trading. The old man is given to taking a little beer, and was full at the time. The wife went to the dry-goods store to get some flannel-cloth, and complained to the clerk about the width, saying that it was too narrow. At this time the husband came in, about half tight, and heard her. Coming up, he took hold of the cloth, unrolled it, and said: "Betty, it is narrow; but, my eyes, look at the length!"

THE Drawer is happy to receive the following from the "Athens of America." It is encouraging to Boston's literary rivals to think that such an incident could take place there:

Having occasion a few days since to make a memorandum of the weight of some bar steel, I gave pencil and paper to a workman, and requested him to weigh the steel and put down the size, whether round, square, or flat. This he did, and handed me the paper. On looking over it, I found a kind of steel put down which I could not decipher, and after puzzling over it for some minutes I finally called the man, and pointing out to him the difficult place, asked him to explain it. "That! why that's plain enough," said he, in evident surprise at my ignorance; "Esq. (Square) Steel!" "Oh! yes," said I, after a pause, a new light breaking in on my mind; "that's so—I didn't notice the E!" and thereupon sloped, fully convinced that he was ahead of my time, and a man of genius to boot; for surely no ordinary mortal could have so happily and concisely bestowed upon steel an honor so well merited by its great usefulness to man.

FROM an advertisement in the Virginia (California) Union, which has been standing in its columns for some months, unaltered, we learn that passengers may perform a feat of double railroad and stage riding that bids fair to eclipse any thing heretofore exhibited in a Hippotheatron, or even the celebrated Zampillaerostation. The following is extracted from that advertisement after the mention of the usual heading:

PASSENGERS leaving San Francisco by Boat at 4 P.M. will take the Cars at Sacramento, on both roads, at 6.30 A.M. For the Lake Bigler Route will change to Stages at Shingle Springs. For Donner Lake Route, at Colfax Station. Arriving in Virginia, by both lines, in 36 hours from San Francisco—

CROSSING THE MOUNTAINS BY DAYLIGHT.

We would like to see some of those passengers after they arrived on both roads!

THERE is a grim humor about the following, which comes all the way from Fort Scott, that is well worth preserving:

A rebel prisoner was about to die in one of our hospitals. The surgeon in charge thought that, in order to ease him up a little, he would put a mustard-plaster on his breast. The old fellow turned over, gave a groan, and wanted to know "if a man couldn't die in this country without having a Revenue Stamp on him?" He gave another groan and passed away.

Now and then a good thing comes to the Drawer from across the water:

A gentleman with an invalid wife went to one of the prominent London hotels. He ordered breakfast in his sitting-room, and then asked for a small waiter, that breakfast might be carried in to his wife in her bedroom. The servant was absent some time, but at length returned, saying: "There are no small waiters in the house, Sir, but they've sent up a chamber-maid!" Great relief was experienced when it was understood that the waiter wanted was in the form of a tea-tray.

THE two following come from San Francisco:

In our mining regions, when persons discover a mineral vein, it is the duty of the mining district recorder, at request, to proceed upon the spot and record the notice of the claim. Some of these noatises will compare favorably with any which have ever adorned the Drawer. The recorder of one of these mining districts having occasion to absent himself lately, left, as he thought, a competent deputy in his stead—charging him particularly, in recording any "claim," to mention its distance from some other object for future reference and identification. Judge of his surprise, on his return, to find the deputy had only recorded one claim, and that was "located about 300 yards north of an old broken wheel-barrow!"

WOOD in Reese River is wood—worth $16 to $20 a cord in gold, and not much of a cord at that. Last winter certain parties were wont to forage on their more fortunate neighbors who were provided. Near by one of these private suffering wood-piles was a mill, with a large supply on hand for mill purposes. A sufferer one night detected the petit larcener in the act of shouldering a couple of back logs, when the former approached the latter, and gently laying his hand upon his shoulder, said, encouragingly: "My friend, the mill men can stand this better than I can; go there the next time." The thief dropped the logs, and walking off, said, meekly: "I never thought of that—I will!"

"OUR Army" had been at Memphis, Tennessee, over a year, and it became absolutely necessary to in a measure reorganize the General Hospital Department. One thing thought requisite by the competent and respected Superintendent, Surgeon B. J. D. Irwin, U. S. A., was the appointment of a number of hospital stewards of the regular army (a class of men, by-the-way, who do more work and get less pay than any in the army). They must stand a strict examination before a board of surgeons. One young man from the Western States came before a board of which a pompous German officer was President. The first question by the President was, "Vel, my young man, you can make shicken soup?" "Yes, Sir" (with a smile). Vel, now, young man, vil you pe so kint as you vil del me de first ting you tos ven you make shicken soup?" "I would catch the chicken!" promptly replied the young man. The Doctor looked a moment, and then, amidst the roars of laughter which followed, broke out: "Young mans, you'll too. I bass you!" And in due time he was appointed.

EVERY body has been in either the army or navy, so every body knows that whoever wishes to enter the service of his country must strip and be examined by the medical officer.

Fleet-Surgeon L——d, of our ship, found at San Francisco, California, just the man to fill the recent vacancy of surgeon's steward, and, after the usual examination, took the certificate "that A. B. was physically qualified to perform the duties of surgeon's steward" to the Commodore for approval. While the ink was drying the Commodore asked the Fleet-Surgeon "if the man knew much about medicine?" "No," said Fleet, "nor do I wish one who knows much about it, for he would then be too often left by the assistants in a very responsible position." The old Commodore flushed up, and asked, in a voice that betokened his rage: "What for did you certify that he was physically qualified then?"

ONE day, when we were at sea, the two young "pills" were arguing some case, and Passed Assistant-Surgeon P——, whose quotations were often more forcible than literal, astonished the ward-room mess with: "Oh, H——, you are straining at a gant and swallowing a camel!" H——, who was posted in Scripture, looked so funny about the eyes that P—— saw he had quoted wrong, and immediately rectified his mistake with: "I mean 'straining again and swallowing a camel!'" H—— advised him not to "strain again," or he might break that camel's back.

DURING the war, when stationed in St. Simon's Sound, Georgia, Joe B——, our Paymaster, used to furnish the mess with an enormous amount of fun, which was often at his own expense. Joe was born at Charlestown, Massachusetts, but went to Philadelphia a few years before he entered the navy, and was never tired of decrying the city of his birth and its neighbor, Boston, and landing the "City of Brotherly Love" to the skies.

One day Joe was convincing the mess that there was a good deal of humbug in the generosity found in Boston. "Talk," said he, "of the benevolence of Boston! Why, in Philadelphia we have no less than five societies for indignant females, and I don't believe there is one in all Boston!"

HERE is Young America at the wheel:

A well-known clergyman was crossing Lake Erie, many years ago, upon one of the Lake steamers, and seeing a small lad at the wheel, steering the boat, accosted him as follows:

CLERGYMAN. "My son, you appear to be a small boy to steer so large a boat."

Boy. "Yes, Sir, but you see that I can do it, though."

CLERGYMAN. "Do you think you understand your business, my son?"

Boy. "Yes, Sir, I think I do."

CLERGYMAN. "Can you box the compass?"

Boy. "Yes, Sir."

CLERGYMAN. "Let me hear you box it."

Boy boxes the compass.

CLERGYMAN. "Well, really, you can do it! Let me hear you box it backward."

Boy boxes it backward.

CLERGYMAN. "I declare, my son, you do seem to understand your business."

The boy now took his turn question-asking.

Boy. "Pray, Sir, what might be your business?"

CLERGYMAN. "I am a minister of the Gospel."

Boy. "Do you understand your business?"

CLERGYMAN. "I think I do, my son."

Boy. "Can you say the Lord's Prayer?"

CLERGYMAN. "Yes."

Boy. "Say it."

Clergyman repeats the Lord's Prayer.

Boy. "Well, really, you do know it! Now say it backward."

Clergyman says he can not do it.

Boy. "You can't do it, eh? Now you see that I understand my business a great deal better than you do yours!"

Clergyman acknowledged himself beat, and retired.

WHEN General Fremont was trying to capture Stonewall Jackson in the Valley of Virginia, the latter, to prevent further pursuit, destroyed the bridge across the Shenandoah at Mount Jackson.

The pontoon-train was hurried forward, and while that was being put down the wagon-train filed out into a large field near by. Most of the teams were composed of green mules, and were a great annoyance to their drivers, who gave vent to their feelings by volleys of oaths, swearing only as army teamsters can.

Just then General Fremont came riding by, and on hearing the swearing of the men, he ordered the wagon-master to instruct all the men of his command that "hereafter there will be no swearing allowed to any of the drivers except to those who drive oxen!"

A CANADIAN boy, too young to fully comprehend the doctrine of total depravity, but old enough to have at least a vague idea of the hereditary principle of mankind, was recently detected by his paternal ancestor in falsehood, and punished therefor by solitary confinement. The punishment over, the youngster accosted his father with the question:

"Pa, did you tell lies when you were little?"

The father, perhaps conscience-smitten, evaded an answer, but the child, persistent, again asked:

"Did you tell lies when you were little?"

"No," said the father; "but why do you ask?"

"Did ma tell lies when she was little?"

"I don't know, my son. You must ask her."

"Well," retorted the hopeful, "one of you must have told lies, or you could not have a boy who would!"

This is a veritable record of an occurrence in the quiet town of St. Catharines.

IN the town of S——, in Vermont, lived Justice T——, one of the Sons of Temperance, very zealous to prosecute all violations of the prohibitory law against rum-sellers. T—— had a neighbor by the name of H——, who was in the habit of imbibing too much, and a great opposer of the prohibitory law—taking away our liberties—and was sometimes hard up on account of T——'s vigilance in prosecuting the violators of the act against rum-sellers. T—— sent to New York for ten gallons of old Holland gin, and, in order to keep the matter secret, had it directed to his neighbor H——, expecting to take it from the dépôt. It so happened that H—— was at the dépôt when the gin arrived, and took the keg, as it was directed to him. On his way home he met T—— going to the dépôt, and told him some of his friends had sent him ten gallons of old Holland gin, and he could get along for some time in spite of his prosecutions. T—— saw how he was caught, and did not like to lose all the gin, so he told H—— that he sent for it, and asked him to divide, and let him have a part, and say nothing about it. H—— said: "I know how you feel; I have been in the same situation a good many times on account of your prosecutions, so that I could not get a drop. Should be glad to let you have a part, but the law prohibits giving away as well as selling, and if I let you have a part some of your friends will prosecute me for giving away!" The story was too good for H—— to keep. He would call in his friends and have many a good time drinking T——'s gin.

LITTLE JENNIE is a four-year-old, with a decided repugnance to keeping still or donning the "airs" of the prim young ladies by acting "proper" on all occasions. Her mother was about making a visit to an absent sister, and designed having Miss Jennie accompany her. So she says:

"Now, Jennie, when we get to Aunt Clara's I want you to be a good little girl, and not act so rude as you do at home."

"Ma," says Jennie, in sober earnest, "how long are you going to stay at aunt's?"

"About a week, I think," says her mother.

"Well," says Miss Jennie, very decidedly, "if I have got to behave myself a whole week I sha'n't go!"

And, sure enough, she did not go. The sacrifice was evidently too great.

At La Crosse, Wisconsin, I visited, last Sabbath afternoon, a Sunday-school. At the close of the exercises the well-known chant commencing—

"My head is anointed with oil, and my cup is full," was given out. The school rose and commenced singing. Near me sat a tall fellow with a voice loud and deep, but certainly not very melodious, who astonished me by roaring out, in a manner to drown all the efforts of the children around him:

"My head is anointed with oil, and my cap is full!"

A TOLEDO friend says: I was told a good joke on Chicago recently, which I think deserving a place in the Drawer: Mr. and Mrs. L——, with their little daughter, four or five years of age, were to take the early train for Chicago. The previous night the good little child brought her prayers to a close as follows: "Good-by, God! good-by, Lord Jesus! I am going to Chicago in the morning!"

In traveling through an intelligent county in the southern part of Ohio I came across the following inscription on the tombstone of a little child:

"Oh! you silly little fly,
There's a spider drawing nigh;
Buzzing without heed or care,
You will soon be in his snare."

The following incident actually happened, and is only one of the many sharp repartees made by our gallant fighting boys in blue:

On the day before the surrender of Fort Donelson, about 3 o'clock P.M., the Second Iowa Infantry led a charge on the enemy's works, on our left, under the command of the lamented General C. F. Smith. Just as the boys were crossing the ditch a rebel soldier was heard to exclaim: "For mercy's sake, help me out of this, where I can get some air into me!" Charley H—— shook his head as he replied: "Haven't time now; we want to let the air out of some fellows up here first!"

"How did you feel when the ball struck you?" I asked a comrade, after our wounds had been attended to, and we were speaking of a late fight. He had been wounded through both thighs, and his reply, as usual, commenced by a question: "Did you ever cut a chicken's head off?" "Yes," I said. "Well," said W——, "I felt just like the chicken felt!"

JENNY A——, a charming little friend of mine, who is noted for her bright, queer sayings, as well as for her generous heart, was a few weeks since having a romp in the house with a little playmate about her own age named Alice B——, when she (Jennie) had the misfortune to fall on a needle which was sticking in the carpet. It went so far into her knee it could not be reached, and a surgeon was sent for. Her friends were striving to soothe her pain, and her little friend Alice was crying bitterly, when Jennie exclaimed, "Oh, dear! I wish I was Alice! but I'm real glad Alice isn't me!"

A GOOD story is told of Rev. Peter Janeson, while attending camp-meeting near Pontiac, at a time when the Territory of Michigan was comprised of two circuits. The Reverend, possessing quite as much zeal as physical strength, late at night sought in vain in the preacher's tent for a place to lay his mortal remains to rest. Slightly piqued that no place had been reserved for him, having borne the burden and heat of the day, the Reverend had recourse to a stratagem. Retiring to the woods a convenient distance for effect, mounting a large log, he poured forth upon the night air one of those magnificent strains of music for which the early Methodist tunes were so justly celebrated. The effect was electrical. The sleepers, half-wakened by the music, rushing out pursued the sound to the woods. Having collected a crowd, Janeson called upon a brother to pray, slid off the log, and returning to the vacant tent, appropriated the best place and most blankets, and quietly resigned himself to silence and meditation.

In the city of Cleveland, Ohio, reside two brothers by the name of Little, who regularly attend the same church, and happened a few Sabbaths since to be late, having arrived just as the minister arose to give out his text. Their seats happen to be situated on opposite sides of the church, and well up toward the pulpit, each going up a broad aisle on either side. Starting from the vestibule at the same time, what was their astonishment, on arriving nearly at their seats, to hear the minister announce as his text, with a flourish of the hand, "Here a little, and there a little!"

THE following racy examination of a candidate for admission to the bar is taken from the Western Law Journal. The examination commences with:

"Do you smoke, Sir?"

"I do, Sir."

"Have you a spare cigar?"

"Yes, Sir." (Extending a short six.)

"Now, Sir, what is the first duty of a lawyer?"

"To collect fees."

"Right. What is the second?"

"To increase the number of his clients."

"When does your position toward your client change?"

"When making a bill of costs."

"Explain."

"We then occupy the antagonistic position. I assume the character of plaintiff, and he becomes the defendant."

"A suit decided, how do you stand with the lawyer conducting the other side?"

"Cheek by jowl."

"Enough, Sir, you promise to become an ornament to your profession, and I wish you success. Now, are you aware of the duty you owe me?"

"Perfectly."

"Describe it."

"It is to invite you to drink."

"But suppose I decline?"

(Candidate scratches his head.)

"There is no instance of the kind on record in the books. I can not answer that question."

"You are right; the confidence with which you make the assertion shows that you have read the law attentively. Let's take a drink, and I will sign your certificate."

Up in Connecticut there resided some years ago a young limb of the law who was "courting" a lady in the city of N——, distant some eight miles. Jackson, as we will call him, was "rather close;" yet, as it was known that he had not succeeded in making a fortune out of the law, a neighboring farmer did not hesitate when, one Saturday, Jackson applied to him for a horse and buggy to drive to N—— to spend Sunday, but at once furnished the horse. So Saturday noon Jackson drove off in style, spent the evening and the Sabbath in N—— with his lady-love, and drove back to town Monday. Upon returning the horse to his owner, he said, "How much is it?" "Oh, nothing; you're welcome to the use you've made of him," was the reply. "All right!" said Jackson; "then you owe me a dollar and a half," producing a bill which he had paid for the keeping of the horse in N——, which he had actually the "cheek" to present for payment. The farmer paid the bill, but Jackson never borrowed any more horses of him.

ONE of the club from whom the Drawer has had a number of good things adds another contribution:

During a very cold "spell of weather" one of "our crowd" was away on business. On his return the subject of the extreme cold was being talked over in the "club." Will H——, who fictionized somewhat at times, drew on his imagination, and related the following: "On that coldest night you remember, boys, I went to bed leaving the gas burning. I awoke some time toward morning, and found the room in complete darkness. I thought it strange, but, overcome by drowsiness, fell asleep. In the morning I made an investigation, and found the gas hard—in fact, so hard that I procured a pair of scissors and cut it off!" L—— had been listening attentively until Will concluded, when he jumped from his chair, exclaiming, "What! you don't mean the flame froze up?" The peals of laughter which followed brought him to a realizing sense of his condition, and he seated himself, remarking, "I was thinking of the hydrant!"

ONE who has probably been called upon, like

Mrs. Sigourney, to write a good many obituaries, sends us one that he did not write, with this note:

DEAR EDITOR,—The inclosed obituary is a remarkable specimen of that kind of literature, and will doubtless interest the readers of the Drawer:

"J. Q. Ford departed this life March 2, at his residence in P——, aged 79 years, 5 months, and 12 days.

"There is a period when the apple-tree blossoms with its fellows of the wood and field: how fair a time it is! All nature is woosome and winning. The material world celebrates its vegetable loves; and the flower-bells, touched by the winds of spring, usher in the universal marriage of nature. Beast, bird, insect, reptile, fish, plant, with their prophetic colors spread, all float forward on the tide of new life. Then comes the summer.

"Many a blossom falls fruitless to the ground, littering the earth with beauty, never to be used. Thick leaves hide the process of creation, which first blushed public in the flowers, and now unseen goes on. For so life's most deep and fruitful hours are hid in mystery. Apples are growing on every tree; all summer long they grow; and in early autumn, at length, the fruit is fully formed. The leaves begin to fall, letting the sun approach more nearly; the apple hangs there yet, not to grow, only to ripen. Weeks long it clings to the tree; it gains nothing in size and weight. Externally there is increase of beauty: having finished the form from within, nature brings out the added grace of color. It is not a tricky fashion painted on, but an expression which of itself comes out, a fragrance and loveliness of the amplest innermost. Within, at the same time, the component elements are changing; the apple grows mild and pleasant; it softens, sweetens, and in one word it mellows. Some night or day the vital force of the tree gets drowsy, and the autumn, with gentle breath, just shakes the bow; the expectant fruit lets go its hold, full grown, full ripe, full colored too, and with plump and happy sound the apple falls into the autumn lap. Just so Brother Ford fell, all ripe and ready for the garner."

THE soldiers, who read the Drawer in camp and hospital, are its good friends, now that peace has come. One of them sends us the following:

During the progress of the Muskingum River Slackwater Improvement in 1838 quite a number of men were employed at Duncan's Falls in digging the canal around the falls. Among them was a son of the Emerald Isle named Andy. Nev. T—— was the boss of the gang. Andy got a fever and died, but requested on his death-bed that Father M—— should be sent for to perform the last sad rites over his mortal remains, which was done.

Nev. T——, as manager of the funeral, took the head of the procession, in a buggy, accompanied by the reverend father. On the way to the grave the horse drawing the hearse took fright and ran off, passing T—— and the priest, frightened their horse, and away he went after the hearse.

"Why, Mr. T——," says Father M——, "is it usual to drive so fast at funerals in this neighborhood?"

"Well, no," replied Nev., "but it is usual to keep up with the corpse."

ANOTHER one writes:

In the fall of 1864 I enlisted as substitute at W——, and was sent with a lot more to Davenport. We were a jolly set, but when we got there we had our ardor somewhat dampened by being locked up in what the boys called the "bull-pen."

This was an inclosure of perhaps an acre of ground, fenced with an upright pine-board fence, with a great many knot-holes. Here the boys used to gather (subs and bounty-jumpers on the inside, and recruits and enlisted men on the outside) to have a chat; but some youngsters on the outside had a disagreeable habit of bellowing at us through the knot-holes like a herd of bulls. This so exasperated a little Irishman we had that he put his wits to work to retaliate in some manner. He made a pair of wooden pinchers, and stationed himself at one of the largest knot-holes just after roll-call—the worst time for the bellowing. In a few moments it commenced, and there came along a strapping big fellow, stuck his nose and mouth through Billy's hole, and gave a great bowoo, when snap went Billy's pinchers, and he had him by the nose. Then there was bellowing in earnest. Such roars of laughter I think I never heard. We did the bellowing on our side after that.

THERE is wit as well as wisdom in this pithy story:

There is a German porter in one of the largest banking and brokerage houses in Wall Street who has been there in that capacity for nearly twenty years, and has saved about forty thousand dollars, which he has on deposit with that firm in their safe in government bonds. When asked by a bevy of juvenile clerks how he managed to be so rich, he replied: "You see, when I got a shillin' in my pocket, and I wants a glass of lager, und I tinks I can't do widout it, I don't get 'um."

My little nephew Johnny, a three-year-old, has a baby sister, whose mother is sometimes under the necessity of administering to her the usual infantile remedies to preserve due quiet in the family. Johnny was visiting a neighbor one day, not long since, who inquired of him how baby was. He replied:

"She is pretty well. Mother has to give her 'Mrs. Winslow,' though."

"Mrs. Winslow," said the questioner, "who is she?"

"Shê!" said he, most earnestly; "she ain't a woman at all: she is soothing sirup!"

OUR little Kitty went into the country the other day, and, greatly delighted with all she saw, found the culminating point of interest in watching, with hushed breath and dilated eyes, the mysterious process of milking. The darling was standing in alarming proximity to the cow's heels, but so rapt was she that her mother's remonstrances were unheard; repeated by the milker they at length attracted her attention. "Why," said Kitty, with innocent surprise, casting a glance over her shoulder at the cow, "this ain't the end that bites!"

COLONEL TAMBLYN, commanding Fort Fletcher, Kansas, had an Irishman for orderly. On the 20th of January last two men, employés of Butterfield's Overland Dispatch Company, were killed near the fort by Indians. The day following the Colonel said to his orderly, "Give my compliments to the company commanders, and tell them to notify their companies that those two men who were killed by Indians yesterday will be buried this afternoon at two o'clock, and I would like to have as many as can make it convenient attend their funeral." The orderly accidentally found the company commanders together, and, touching his hat, delivered his message as follows: "The Colonel sends his compliments, and directs you to notify those two men that were killed by Indians that they will be buried this afternoon at two o'clock, and he would like to have as many as can make it convenient attend their funeral!" This naturally provoked a laugh from the officers; and the orderly, perceiving something to be wrong, again touched his hat, and said: "There may be a joke about it; but if there is, it is on the Colonel, for he told me so!"

THE writer of this has reached Cleveland, Ohio:

In my travels, a short time since, I left New York at evening on board the sleeping-car for the West. The car was well filled with a genteel-looking set of people, when there entered one of those hatchet-faced, round-shouldered, hooked-nosed, cadaverous, unwashed Jews, with an old leather bag in his hand, and taking his seat, immediately opened said bag and took out a very stale mixture of bread, sausage, etc., and commenced eating, much to the annoyance of the delicate noses of the other occupants.

Upon the appearance of the Conductor (an Irishman) the passengers entered a complaint against such proceedings, and were assured that the obnoxious individual should soon be disposed of. The Conductor accosted the Jew demanding his berth fare. "Vell, how much you charge?" "Three dollars," was the answer. "Oh, dat is too much! 'Tis not wort so much. I tot it was von dollar and a half. I vill not give so much!" "Well," says the Conductor, "we have raised the price in order to keep out the low class, whose patronage we do not wish." "Oh yes, yes, yes! Vell, I see—dat ish all right! Here ish your monish" (at the same time handing him three dollars). "It keeps out de dirty Irish!"

The Conductor was obliged to acknowledge himself beat, and the Jew went on quietly eating his meal, while the passengers were bursting with laughter.

By consulting the map of California, you will find on the northern border the county of Siskiyou, the county town of which is Yreka. This town boasts of a bakery (as what town does not?), the sign of of which "institution" bears the legend:

YREKA BAKERY.

Now spell the above from right to left, or, as most persons hereabout commence Harper, viz., at the "back end," and show me a more wonderful combination of letters from the English alphabet.

A CORRESPONDENT WRITES:

To show the intelligent manner in which the right of suffrage is executed by our adopted citizens from the "Gem of the Sea," I send you two little "notes" which came under my observation: At an election for city officials, one "Greek" was just leaving the polls when he was stopped by another with the question, "Moike, have yez woted?" "Fhat de ye say?—is it woted? Shure, me wote is far away toward Washington long before this!"

At one of our State elections the Democratic ticket was ornamented with a huge spread eagle. Seeing an Irishman whom I used to employ, I asked him what ticket he voted, by saying, "Pat, who do you vote for?" "Faith, I dono, your Honor; but I wote the aigle burrd ticket!"

AMOS K—, a thriving hardware dealer in a certain village, known as a self-sharpener, who, whether in Wall Street among the brokers, in the oil regions, or elsewhere, holds his own—and all else he can honestly get hold of—had some costs in our county-clerk's office waiting his call. H. C. G——, an attorney, and T. P. W——, cashier, both inveterate wags, in some way found out the cost item, receipted for it to the clerk, and adjourned to a place where the inner man could be comforted. After a round they sent for Amos K——, and invited him to participate, which he did. After a little fun the attorney and cashier called on refreshments for two only, gravely informing K—— that the little interview was at his expense, and that they regretted the fact that the unexpended balance was too small to admit of a third person, except in the capacity of a looker-on!"

In the fall of 1865 Marcus L. Ward was one of the candidates for Governor of New Jersey. B—— was a juvenile "freedman," brought from Virginia by a returned soldier. He returned from school one day saying he had learned something he did not know before—he had learned who discovered America. "Who was it?" he was asked. The reply was, "Marcus L. Ward!" Marcus L. was elected.

FLATTERY is always dangerous; and as an illustration of that sober remark, the Drawer appends the following from Michigan:

A gentleman in our neighborhood called on a very fine young lady, who was engaged at the time in making soap, but when she saw the gentleman coming left to make her toilet. In the mean time the young lady was inquired after. Her mother excused her, and told what she had been doing. In a few moments the young lady came into the room, nicely dressed, and ready to entertain her company. As she came in her mother said, "I have told Mr. G—— that you had been making soap, and would be in soon." The gentleman looked at her, and, wishing to compliment her on her beauty, said: "Soap! why you look as if you had never seen any soap!"

CALIFORNIA is noted for its gold mines, good wines, and contributions to Harper's Drawer, among which are the following:

Four or five years ago Timbuctoo, in Yuba County, was one of the most flourishing mining towns in the State, though it is now sadly on the decline. As is always the case in such places, a great number of the gallant sons of Erin were congregated, for the purpose of working the mines. One pair, in particular, were peculiarly given to dram-drinking, which sometimes before it was through would end in a rough-and-tumble fight. At length the loving Bridget concluded to have her darling Pat fined. Accordingly suit was commenced before Justice P——. In testifying Bridget said she did not "sthrike" her devoted spouse at all. This was more than the impulsive Pat could bear—so, regardless of judge, jury, and every thing else, he cried out: "Yes! an' didn't you kake me with a gridiron?" The effect can be better conceived than described.

SEVERAL years ago, in Nevada County, a murder case, which happened at the celebrated Allison Ranch mine, was on trial, in which the evidence was entirely circumstantial. During the trial, in accordance with an act of the Legislature, passed a short time before, a negro was called to the stand to testify. Among other things, he said he saw the prisoner at a certain cabin at nine o'clock. He was asked how he knew it was nine; and replied that he looked at the clock. The door was in the side of the house, and it had been shown that the door was locked at that hour. As the clock was behind the door, it was difficult to understand how he could see it through the keyhole. The counsel for the prosecution therefore asked him how he could see it. Closing one eye, giving a very knowing wink with the other, and bending his finger at an angle, he said, with the utmost positiveness, "I look trankular at it!"

UNCLE SAM receives some queer notes. Among them we quote a report made by a postmaster of F——, Illinois:

In the quiet country village of L—— lived young Tom Burton. He had an insufferable amount of vanity, and was continually prating about his adventures with men, beasts, and creeping things. To hear his own story he was the hero of a thousand bloody encounters. Jack Hood determined to put his courage to the test. Coming to him one afternoon, greatly agitated, Hood said, "Burton, a person has threatened to shoot me to-day, and I want to know whether I can rely on you for assistance." "Oh, certainly," pompously responded he. "I will not see a hair of your head injured!" Proceeding down the street, arm in arm, according to the arrangement some one suddenly stepped from behind a building and commenced firing rapid shots at Hood. Burton thought it would be his turn next, and seeing his companion in arms fall, took "leg bail," and was soon out of all danger.

As soon as he was fairly out of sight Hood coolly arose and concealed himself, to watch further developments. In the course of several hours Burton returned to town, and seeking the hotel bar-room with woeful countenance, inquired when poor Hood was going to be buried! The roar of laughter that followed was perfectly stunning, and effectually cured him of his habit of boasting.

In December, 1864, when Gregg's cavalry division and the Fifth Corps were returning from the raid on the Weldon Railroad, the enemy were following them up pretty close. Lieutenant Dennison's battery of light artillery were placed in position, and began to play upon the rebels with case-shot. Their store of that kind of ammunition running short, mounted orderlies were dispatched to the ammunition-wagons for a supply. An Irish artilleryman, when returning with one of those case-shot in his hand, was met by the provost marshal of the division, and asked what was that he was carrying. To which he replied: "Hard tack for the rebels, by iabers, Sir."

THE WATER SPIDER.

MORE CURIOUS HOMES.

IN the tropical regions insect life flourishes as luxuriantly as the vegetation. There are insects that bite and insects that suck, insects that scratch and insects that sting, and many that are remarkable for giving out a most horrible odor. Some of them are cased in armor as hard as crab-shells, and will endure almost any amount of violence; while some are as round, as plump, as thin-skinned, and as juicy as over-ripe gooseberries, and collapse almost with a touch. There are great flying insects which always make for the light, and unless it is defended by glass will either put it out, or will singe their wings and spin about on the table in a manner that is by no means agreeable. The smaller insects get into the inkstand and fill it with their tiny carcasses, while others run over the paper and smear every letter as it is made. There are great centipedes, which are legitimate cause of dread, being armed with poison fangs scarcely less venomous than those of the viper. There are always plenty of scorpions; while the chief army is composed of cockroaches, of dimensions, appetite, and odor such as we can hardly conceive in this favored land. As to the lizards, snakes, and other reptiles, they are so common as almost to escape attention. For a time these usurpers reign supreme. Now and then a few dozen are destroyed in a raid, or a person of sanguine temperament out of the house, carrying its spoils in triumph. The raid is most complete, and when the inhabitants return to the house they find every intruder gone, and to their great comfort are enabled to move about without treading on some unpleasant creature, and to put on their shoes without previously knocking them against the floor for the purpose of shaking out the scorpions and similar visitors. In the illustration a column of Foraging Ants is seen winding its way through a wood. Every one who is accustomed to the country takes particular care not to cross one of these columns. The Foraging Ants are tetchy creatures, and not having the least notion of amuses his leisure hours, and improves his marksmanship by picking off the more prominent intruders with a saloon pistol; but the vacancies are soon filled up, and no permanent benefit is obtained. But there is one insect which, although often annoying, is also exceedingly useful; and its approach is welcomed by the inhabitants of tropical America, where it abounds. This is the Foraging Ant, which, though not more skillful than many other insects in constructing its home, is worthy of special notice. These ants sally forth in vast columns, at least a hundred yards in length, though not of very great width. When they make their appearance nothing withstands their assault; the inhabitants throw open every box and drawer in the house so as to allow the ants access into every crevice, and then retire from the premises. Presently the van-guard of the column approaches, a few scouts precede the general body, and seem to inspect the premises and ascertain whether they are worth a search. The long column then pours in and is soon dispersed over the house. The scene that then ensues is described as most singular. The ants penetrate into the corners, peer into each crevice, and speedily haul out any unfortunate creature that is lurking therein. Great cockroaches are dragged unwillingly away, being pulled in front by four or five ants, and pushed from behind by as many more. The rats and mice speedily succumb to the onslaught of their myriad foes, the snakes and lizards fare no better, and even the formidable weapons of the scorpion and centipede are overcome by their pertinacious foes. In a wonderfully short time the Foraging Ants have completed their work, the scene of turmoil gradually ceases, the scattered parties again form into line, and the procession moves fear, are terrible enemies even to human beings. If a man should happen to cross a column the ants immediately dash at him, running up his legs, biting fiercely with their powerful jaws, and injecting poison into the wound. The only plan of action in such a case is to run away at top speed until the main body are too far off to renew the attack, and then to destroy the ants that are already in action. This is no easy task, for the fierce little insects drive their hooked mandibles so deeply into the flesh that they are generally removed piecemeal, the head retaining its hold after the body has been pulled away, and the mandibles clasped so tightly that they must be pinched from the head and detached separately. There seems to be scarcely a creature which these insects will not attack, and they will even go out of their way to fall upon the nests of the large and formidable wasps of that country. For the thousand stings the ants care not a jot, but tear away the substance of their nest with their powerful jaws, penetrate into the interior, break down the cells, and drag out the helpless young. Should they meet an adult wasp they fall upon it and cut it to pieces in a moment.

The African Termite erects nests of vast size and stone-like solidity. The history of this insect is complicated and full of incident, so that many pages might be occupied in giving an account of them, and yet the subject be not exhausted. The illustration, however, will afford some idea of the form and size of their habitations. A full-sized nest of the African Termite is a wonderful structure. Although made merely of clay, the walls are nearly as hard as stone, and hunters are accustomed to mount upon them for the purpose of looking out for game, and the wild buffalo has a similar habit, the structure being strong enough even to support the weight of so large an animal. The form of the nest is essentially conical, a large cone occupying the centre, and smaller cones being grouped round it like pinnacles round a Gothic spire. It is stated that nests have been seen that were full twenty feet in height, and that had a circumference of one hundred feet.

The accompanying illustration represents a most singular structure, which very little resembles an insect's nest. It might very well be taken for a sponge, looks much like a fungus, and has the appearance of an overgrown and partially decayed puff-ball. The real material, however, of which the nest is made, is formed of the short cottony fibres which fill the seed pods of the cotton tree. The fibre is so short that it is incapable of being woven into fabrics. The Fungus Ants, however, find it useful for their work, and contrive to weave it so dextrously that the individuality of the fibres is lost, and they are all made into a compact and uniform mass. The size of the nests varies, but is sometimes very considerable, a full-sized one, being often as large as a man's head. The ant itself is rather a curious little creature, dark in color, covered with many angular protuberances, and being remarkable for a couple of long, sharp spines that project from the thorax, one on either side.

On the right hand of the next illustration may be seen a large moth flying downward, and just above it are a couple of oval objects attached to a slender bough. This moth is that magnificent insect the Atlas Moth, and the oval objects are the cocoons which are spun by its larva. The Atlas Moth is a truly splendid insect. Creamy white, soft yellow, and pale brown are the chief tints it wears; but they are so beautifully blended, the plumage is of so downy a softness, and the expanse of wing is so great that the Atlas holds its own high rank even among the more vividly colored insects of its own country. There are many members of this genus scattered over the different parts of the earth, the finest and largest specimens being found between the tropics. In all the species the antennæ of the males are remarkable for their beauty, being deeply feathered, and shaped something like a spear-head with a triangular blade, and in many examples there is a loose membranous tale-like spot in the middle of the wing. The cocoons of the Atlas Moth are made of silken thread, much like that of the common silk-worm, the cocoon being large in proportion to the size of the moth, and the quantity of silk is necessarily very great. Although the thread is not so fine or glossy as that of the ordinary silk-worm, it is strong, smooth, and serviceable, and capable of being woven into useful fabrics.

The House-builder Moth is an insect which is common in many parts of the West Indies, in several places being so plentiful that the sight of its long pendent domiciles is any thing but pleasant to the proprietor of a garden. The reader will observe that in the illustration the nest is shown as depending from the caterpillar, part of which protrudes from its mouth and the other part is hidden. This attitude is given because it is that in which the insect is generally seen. Scraps of wood mixed with fragments of leaves are the materials which are used, and they are bound together very firmly by the silken threads with which so many caterpillars are endowed. There is a tolerable degree of elasticity about it, especially at the entrance, which is slightly expanded so as to assume an irregular funnel-like shape, and can be drawn together at will by means of the silken threads attached to its circumference. The caterpillar has thus two means of guarding itself from attacks. If it is still clinging to a branch, it can retreat into the house and press the mouth so firmly against the branch that it is closed effectively, just as a limpet shelters its soft body by pressing the top of the shell against the rock. Or, if detached, it can pull the lips together, and thus shut itself up in its strange house as completely as a box tortoise in its shell. The Oriental idea that feminine delicacy is only to be maintained by concealing the face, seems to have been borrowed from the House-builder Moth, which is a perfect model of female excellence, according to Oriental notions, always staying at home, always hiding her face, and always producing enormous families. Perhaps the male may be attracted to the female by some peculiar instinct, for the eyes can have little to do with the discovery, she being so closely shut up in her house, and never leaving it till the day of her death.

The Tufted Spider of the West Indies spins a large, oval, cocoon-like nest. This creature derives its name from the remarkable tufts of stiff, bristle-like hairs which decorate the limbs.

Of the curious Spherical Spider nests, with their black cross bars, nothing is known except the mere fact of their existence.

There is a species of spider which constructs a remarkable pensile nest, as seen in the illustration. The spider takes several concave seed-pods, and fastens them firmly together with the silken thread of which webs are made, and in the interior the eggs are placed. In the lower part of the illustration is a leaf upon which are piled a number of fragments of leaves, so as to form a rude conical heap. This is also the work of a spider, and is made with great ingenuity, for the structure has been regularly built up of a great number of pieces, each being aranged methodically upon the other. The labor must have been considerable, even if the spider had nothing to do but to arrange and fasten together pieces of leaves which had already been selected.

The Water Spider is a most curious and interesting creature, because it affords an example of an animal which breathes atmospheric air constructing a home beneath the water, and filling it with the air needful for respiration. The sub-aquatic cell of the Water Spider may be found in many rivers and ditches, where the water does not run very swiftly. It is made of silk, as is the case with all spiders' nests, and is generally egg-shaped, having an opening below. This cell is filled with air; and if the spider be kept in a glass vessel, it may be seen reposing in the cell, with its head downward, after the manner of its tribe. The Water Spider places her eggs in this cell, spinning a saucer-shaped cocoon, and fixing it against the inner side of the cell and near the top. In this cocoon are about a hundred eggs, of a spherical shape, and very small. The cell is a true home for the spider, which passes its earliest days under the water, and when it is strong enough to construct a sub-aquatic home for itself, brings its prey to the cell before eating it.

There is another spider which frequents the water, but which only makes a temporary and movable residence. This is the Raft Spider, which is represented in the illustration of its natural size. Not content with chasing insects on land, it follows them in the water, on the surface of which it can run freely. It needs, however, a resting-place, and forms one by getting together a quantity of dry leaves and similar substances, which it gathers into a rough ball, and fastens with silken threads. On this ball the spider sits, and allows itself to be blown about the water by the wind. Apparently it has no means of directing its course, but suffers its raft to traverse the surface as the wind or current may carry it. The spider does not merely sit upon the raft, and there capture any prey that may happen to come within reach, but when it sees an insect upon the surface, it leaves the raft, runs swiftly over the water, secures its prey, and brings it back to the raft. It can even descend below the surface of the water, and will often crawl several inches in depth. This feat it does not perform by diving, as is the case with the water spider, but by means of the aquatic plants, down whose stems it crawls. Its capability of existing for some time beneath the surface of the water is often the means of saving its life; for, when it sees an enemy approaching, it quietly slips under the raft, and there lies in perfect security until the danger has passed away.

THE RAFT SPIDER.

As a rule, fishes display but little architectural genius, their anatomical construction debarring them from raising any but the simplest edifice. A fish has but one tool, its mouth, and even this instrument is of very limited capacity. Still, although the nest which a fish can make is necessarily of a slight and rude character, there are some members of that class which construct houses which deserve the name. The best examples of architecture among fishes are those which are produced by the Stickle-backs, those well-known little beings whose spiny bodies, brilliant colors, and dashing courage make them such favorites with all who study nature. These fishes make their nests of the delicate vegetation that is found in fresh water, and will carry materials from some little distance in order to complete the home. The materials of which the nest is made are extremely variable, but they are always constructed so as to harmonize with the surrounding objects, and thus to escape ordinary observation. Sometimes it is made of bits of grass which have been blown into the river, sometimes of straws, and sometimes of growing plants. The object of the nest is evident enough, when the habits of the Stickle-back are considered. As is the case with many other fish, there are no more determined destroyers of Stickle-back eggs than the Stickle-backs themselves, and the nests are evidently constructed for the purpose of affording a resting-place for the eggs until they are hatched. If a few of these nests be removed from the water in a net, and the eggs thrown into the stream, the Stickle-backs rush at them from all sides, and fight for them like boys scrambling for half-pence. The eggs are very small, barely the size of dust-shot, and are yellow when first placed in the nest, but deepen in color as they approach maturity.

There is a well-known marine species of this group, called the Fifteen-Spined Stickle-back, a long-bodied, long-snouted fish, with a slightly projecting lower jaw, and a row of fifteen short and sharp spines along the back. This creature makes its nest of the smaller algæ, and the delicate green and purple seaweeds which fringe our coasts. Sometimes, indeed, it becomes rather eccentric in its architecture, and builds in very curious situations. A case is on record where a pair of Stickle-backs had made their nest in the loose end of a rope, from which the separated strands hung out about a yard from the surface, over a depth of four or five fathoms, and to which the materials could only have been brought, of course, in the mouth of the fish, from the distance of about thirty feet. They were formed of the usual aggregation of the finer sorts of green and red seaweed, but they were so matted together in the hollow formed by the untwisted strands of the rope that the mass constituted an oblong ball of nearly the size of the fist, in which had been deposited the scattered assemblage of spawn, and which was bound into shape with a thread of animal substance, which was passed through and through in various directions, while the rope itself formed an outside covering to the whole.

The wonderful creatures which are classed together under the general term of Corals, are familiar to us either in a manufactured state or as ornaments for the drawing-room. How vast are their submarine labors is evident from the enormous "coral-reefs" which they raise, and which form great islands whereon an army can live, and inlets wherein a fleet can ride securely at anchor. The young Coral animal passes through various changes, gradually developing new and remarkable powers, until it arrives at its perfection. The precise connection which exists between the animal and its coral habitation may not be generally understood. If the reader will take up a branch of the ordinary coral of commerce, he will see that it is slightly grooved or fluted throughout its extent, and that its surface is studded with little projections having star-like discs. Now, if this piece of coral could be again clothed with the living creature by which it was deposited, we should see a beautiful and a wonderful sight. Next to the stony core lie a series of longitudinal vessels, each vessel corresponding with a groove, and above them lies a confused mass of irregular vessels communicating with each other. At intervals there arise the lovely flowerets of the Coral, the bodies being bright rose-color, and their arms pure white. These arms or tentacles are in ceaseless motion, and the aspect of a large and healthy branch of coral is imposingly beautiful. The animal has the power of depositing certain minute calcareous particles, commonly called spicules, which are always of remarkable forms, and are different in the various species of coral. In the common red coral they are nearly cylindrical, and armed with projecting knobs covered with angular spikes. These spicules are then bound together by a red cement, and thus the coral is formed, the fluted branches being deposited under the longitudinal vessels, and the raised projections under the flowerets of the polype. To see the coral in full vigor it is necessary to visit the spots where it grows, as it dies almost immediately after being taken out of the water, and even if transferred with great care to a vessel is sure to die in a very short time. Several of the more curious species of Corals and Madre-pores are to be seen in illustration on page 282, which represents a portion of sea-bed beset with these beautiful zoophytes. To a few of these only we can allude in this article. Toward the centre of the illustration, and on the right-hand side, may be seen a remarkable tree-like object, covered with long, tendril-like appendages, each tipped with a radiating beard. This zoophyte is known by the title of Xenia elongata, and on account of its singular form is a very conspicuous species. Examples of this genus are spread over many of the hotter parts of the world, some being found in the Red Sea, and all notable for the remarkable form of the animal and its submarine home. The present species has been chosen more for the singularity of its form than the beauty of its colors, which can not be expressed in the simple black and white of a wood-cut. Some species of this genus have the star-like tentacles colored with blue of various shades, some with rose, and some with lilac; and as in many cases the expanded tentacles are an inch in diameter, the effect of a large mass of these animals in full health is very fine. In the left-hand lower corner of the illustration is a curious globular object, covered with circular and radiated marks, and having a number of flower-headed projections upon the top. This is the Green Astrea, one of the finest examples of a singular and beautiful group of zoophytes. The color of this species is simple and pleasing. The body of the animal is pale gray-blue, and the tentacles are bright green, so that when a number of the animals are simultaneously protruding themselves the general effect is very striking. These zoophytes are able to retract themselves almost wholly within their houses, so that nothing is visible except that round the mouth there is a small green circle, which is formed by the projecting tips of the tentacles. In the left centre of the illustration is seen a group of that most beautiful zoophyte which is known as the Red

Organ-pipe Coral. This handsome zoophyte is found chiefly off Carteret, in New Ireland, and is grouped together in masses that are often many yards in diameter. It is usually found in about two or three feet of water, but is sometimes placed so high that at very low tides it is laid bare by the receding waters. The animal which forms this wonderful tubing is cylindrical, and the tentacles are pinkish, not possessing the brilliant red of the tubes, and in its native state the animals envelop so completely the upper part of the general mass that the bright red head is not perceptible. The coral masses are very fragile, and will not bear the pressure of the human foot, crumbling beneath the tread as if they were made of sugar. The tubes are beautifully cylindrical, and do not adhere to each other, being kept asunder by partitions, which precisely resemble the boards through which the pipes of an organ are passed.

Passing from these minute creatures, we can not forbear giving one or two additional illustrations of curious homes among the Mammalia. The Beavers afford an excellent example of animals, not only social by dwelling near each other, but by joining in a work which is for the benefit of the community. Water is as needful for the Beaver as for the miller, and it is a very curious fact that long before millers ever invented dams, or before men ever learned to grind corn, the Beaver knew how to make a dam and insure itself a constant supply of water. That the Beaver does make a dam is a fact that has long been familiar, but how it sets to work is not so well known. Engravings representing the Beavers and their habitations are common enough, but they are generally untrustworthy, not having been drawn from the natural object but from the imagination of the artist. In order to comprehend the mode of its structure we must watch the Beaver at work. When the animal has fixed upon a tree which it believes to be suitable for its purpose it begins by sitting upright, and with its chisel-like teeth cutting a bold groove completely round the trunk. It then widens the groove, and always makes it wide in exact proportion to its depth, so that when the tree is nearly cut through it looks something like the contracted portion of an hour-glass. When this stage has been reached the Beaver looks anxiously at the tree, and views it on every side, as if desirous of measuring the direction in which it is to fall. Having settled this question it goes to the opposite side of the tree, and with two or three powerful bites cuts away the wood, so that the tree becomes overbalanced and falls to the ground. This point having been reached, the animal proceeds to cut up the fallen trunk into lengths, usually a yard or so in length, employing a similar method of severing the wood. In consequence of this mode of gnawing the timber both ends of the logs are rounded and rather pointed, as may be seen by reference to the illustration. The dam is by no means placed at random in the stream, just where a few logs may have happened to lodge, but is set exactly where it is wanted, and is made so as to suit the force of the current. In those places where the stream runs slowly the dam is carried straight across the river, but in those where the water has much power the barrier is made in a convex shape, so as to resist the force of the rushing water. The power of the stream can, therefore, always be inferred from the shape of the dam which the Beavers have built across it. Some of these structures are of very great size, measuring two or three hundred yards in length, and ten or twelve feet in thickness, and their form exactly corresponds with the force of the stream. The Beaver makes its houses close to the water, and communicates with it by means of subterranean passages, one entrance of which passes into the house or "lodge," as it is technically named, and the other into the water, so far below the surface that it can not be closed by ice. It is, therefore, always possible for the Beaver to gain access to the provision stores, and to return to its house, without being seen from the land. The lodges are nearly circular in form, and much resemble the well-known snow-houses of the Esquimaux, being domed, and about half as high as they are wide, the average height being three feet and the diameter six or seven feet. These are the interior dimensions, the exterior measurement being much greater, on account of the great thickness of the walls, which are continually strengthened with mud and branches, so that during the severe frosts they are nearly as hard as solid stone. Each lodge will accommodate several individuals, whose beds are arranged around the walls. Generally, the Beavers desert their huts in the summer time, although one or two of the houses may be occupied by a mother and her young offspring. All the old Beavers who have no domestic ties to chain them at home take to the water, and swim up and down the stream at liberty, until the month of August, when they return to their homes.

The Elk, or Moose, inhabits the northern parts of America and Europe, and is, consequently, an animal which is formed to endure severe cold. Although a very large and powerful animal, measuring sometimes seven feet in height at the shoulders—a height which is very little less than that of an average elephant—it has many foes, and is much persecuted both by man and beast. In summer time it is tolerably safe, but in the winter it is beset by many perils. During the sharp frosts, also, the Elk runs but little risk, because it can traverse the hard, frozen surface of the snow with considerable speed, although with a strange, awkward gait. But when the milder weather begins to set in it is in constant danger. The warm sun falling on the snow produces a rather curious effect. The frozen surface only partially melts, and the water, mixing with the snow beneath, causes it to sink away from the icy surface, leaving a considerable space between them. The "crust," as the frozen surface is technically named, is quite strong enough to bear the weight of comparatively small animals, such as wolves, especially when they run swiftly over it; but it yields to the enormous weight of the Elk, which plunges to its belly at every step. The wolves have now the Elk at an advantage. They can overtake it without the least difficulty; and if they can bring it to bay in the snow its fate is sealed. They care little for the branching horns, but leap boldly at the throat of the hampered animal, whose terrible fore-feet are now powerless, and, by dint of numbers, soon worry it to death. Man, too, takes advantage of this state of the snow, equips himself with snow-shoes, and skims over the slight and brittle crust with perfect security. An Elk, therefore, whenever abroad in the snow, is liable to many dangers, and, in order to avoid them, it makes the curious temporary habitation called the Elk yard, and which is represented in the illustration. This winter home is very simple in construction, consisting of a large space of ground on which the snow is trampled down by continually treading it so as to form both a hard surface on which the animal can walk, and a kind of fortress in which it can dwell securely. The whole of the space is not trodden down to one uniform level, but consists of a net-work of roads or passages through which the animal can pass at ease. So confident is the Elk in the security of the "yard" that it can scarcely ever be induced to leave its snowy fortification and pass into the open ground. This habit renders it quite secure from the attacks of wolves, which prowl about the outside of the yard, but dare not venture within; but, unfortunately for the Elk, the very means which preserve it from one danger only lead it into another. If the hunter can come upon one of these Elk-yards he is sure of his quarry; for the animal will seldom leave the precincts of the snowy inclosure, and the rifle-ball soon lays low the helpless victims.

The Elk is not the only animal that makes these curious fortifications, for a herd of Wapiti deer will frequently unite in forming a common home. One of these "yards" has been known to measure between four and five miles in diameter, and to be a perfect net-work of paths sunk in the snow. So deep, indeed, is the snow when untrodden, that when the deer traverse the paths, their backs can not be seen above the level of the white surface which conceals the yard.

We have now, in a series of articles, given accounts of a few of the Homes constructed by different classes of the animal creation. The illustrations and a considerable portion of the descriptions have been derived from the "Homes without Hands" of the Rev. J. G. Wood. We have by no means exhausted the material contained in that admirable volume, which we earnestly commend to the attention of those who wish to know more of this interesting subject.

THE ELK.

W. & A. MOENS

THREE MONTHS WITH ITALIAN BOGNAITS*

MR. MOENS is an Englishman of humane and, as it appears, an immense photographic. Early in 1861 he set out, accompanied by his wife, upon an Italian tour, going first to Sicily, and making the port of "round" of that island, which was a few years ago so gloriously described by Ross Browne in his famous "Yucca." Mr. Moens had moreover the special design to photograph the eruption of Etna, which was then going on. His description of this is very interesting; but we must pass it over in order to give, as far as we may, some account of his subsequent experiences when a captive among the brigands on the mainland.

Crossing over to Naples early in May he set out for a trip to the ruins of the famous temples of Paestum, which stand in solitary grandeur, in a mountain wilderness, with no traces of the people by whom the stupendous edifices were reared. The party consisted of Mr. Moens, Mr. Arndley, an English clergyman, and their wives. From Naples a railway runs past the considerable town of Salerno, somewhat more than twenty miles from Paestum. It was indeed a little suspicious that the landlord of the "Hotel Victoria" at Salerno thought it necessary to post up in various languages a notice to "express the desire of visiting the temples of Paestum that the road is now perfectly safe between Salerno and Paestum, owing to the vigilance of General Armand, the Military Commander of the district, who has stationed patrols along the road at Battipaglia, Bursano, and Paestum." After a three hours drive they reached the temples a little before noon, a squad of soldiers accompanying them. Mr. Moens set his camera in order and photographed the ruins. Toward evening they set out on their return: not a little surprised that their military protectors were nowhere visible. The truth was, as they afterward learned, the soldiers had been withdrawn so that negotiations could be carried on with a gang of bandits for the release of a couple of Italian gentlemen whom they had gobbled up only a few days before on this very safe road. For these the brigands demanded a ransom of 171,000 francs; but finally compromised for 51,000.

They had almost reached Battipaglia, and supposed that they had passed the dangerous places, when a little before dusk they perceived a number of fellows creeping out of the corn-fields. Some of the brigands aimed their guns, others turned the horses' heads across the road. They started up from all sorts of hiding-places, and in a few minutes thirty or more were gathered around the carriage. The travelers were politely desired to "descend." "Don't be afraid, Madame, don't be afraid," they said to Mrs. Moens. The coachman was ordered to stay where he was for a quarter of an hour, and then to drive off with the ladies, the two gentlemen being hurried off over fields and through thickets.

The bandits were wonderfully polite—the leader, whom Mr. Moens came to know quite well as Captain Manzo, always addressing them as Signorè "Gentlemen," with a strong accent on the last syllable. "What do you want with us?" inquired the captives. Donaro—non temete ("The Shiners—don't be scared") was the reply. "How far are we to walk?" "A good way, a good way enough." When they came to a stream the brigands carried their captives across on their shoulders. On they went through swamps, over ditches, and across cultivated fields, marching in Indian file, until midnight. By the way they stopped at a house and bought a little bread, and a while after came upon a patch of cabbage and onions, of which they made short work, pocketing what they could not eat: wisely, as Mr. Moens found out before long.

Toward daybreak they halted on the banks of a stream and hid among the osiers. The brigands now began to inquire into the value of their prize. It was quite impossible to convince them that the Englishmen were not great lords, notwithstanding the hands of Mr. Moens were stained by his photographic chemicals. "His hands are black," said one, "and his trousers are like what prisoners wear, and are all worn out, poor fellow!" "Wait, we'll see," replied the Captain. At length a bit of the hard sausage, called supersato, was offered to the prisoners, who declared that "it would not agree with their stomachs." It seemed to strike the captors as a good joke that any man should object to supersato. "They'll like it better by-and-by," said he, which proved true enough; for Mr. Moens found before long that poor food and little of it was the normal condition of brigands and their prisoners.

Besides the Englishmen the brigands had picked up a couple of Italian gentlemen; and as soon as they got to a tolerably safe spot the Captain began "business"—that is, fixing the ransom. That of one Italian was put down at 12,000 ducats, the others at 8000 (a ducat is about 85 cents). The two Englishmen were lumped together at 100,000 ducats. They declared that such a sum was out of the question; the brigands insisted that it was quite moderate for two such great lords, who were worth at least two millions apiece. Finally, they came down to 50,000, and no abatement. How to get at the cash was now the problem. The Englishmen declared that their wives had not the money, and, being strangers and ignorant of the language, could not get it in Naples. It was finally arranged that one of them—to be decided by lot—should go and the other should stay. Mr. Moens drew the short stick and had to remain, while Mr. Aynsley was hurried off by two men, who also bore letters from the Italian prisoners to their friends, asking for the money for their ransom.

Hardly were they away when the brigands saw a company of 100 soldiers marching along the road below—a sharp skirmish took place; but the gang, all save two, managed to get off with their captives. During the night the band was again surprised by the soldiers, and there was more firing. In the excitement the Italian prisoners managed to escape. The brigands did not look out very sharply for these small Italian fry; but they took good care of their big fish, the great "English Lord." They were now far up the mountain side, and all next day Mr. Moens could see the soldiers passing and repassing in the valley below, looking like mites in the distance. At first he meditated trying to escape, but quickly discovered that the attempt would be madness.

"The brigands," he says, "ran down the mountain like goats, while I had to be careful to pick my way at every step. Accustomed to the mountains from their earliest youth, they were as sure-footed as the goats, and had eyes like cats; darkness and light, daytime or night, made not the slightest difference to them. Their hearing, too, was most acute. This sense they had cultivated to such a pitch that, like the red Indians, the slightest rustle of the leaves, the faintest sound, never escaped their notice. Men miles distant working in the fields, or mowing the grass, they could distinguish with the greatest ease. They knew generally who they were, young and old, and to what village they belonged. When I, perhaps, could barely distinguish living beings, they could describe all their motions."

From Mr. Moens's Diary (written, we infer, mainly from memory, aided by brief jottings in a little memorandum-book, which he managed to conceal) we excerpt some passages which portray the aspects of life among the brigands:

"May 18.—I slept till eight or nine o'clock, and on awaking and looking round, I found we were just above the dry bed of a stream that in winter ran down the mountain-side. We were facing the west, and at about half a mile off ran a stream like a delicate little silver serpent, twisting in and out of the bushes and green banks; on the other side of it was a bridle path. We saw several bodies of troops pass during the day, who were always watched with the greatest interest; and the merits of the different sorts of soldiers were freely discussed. I tried to get as far away from my guardians as I could, and then began to think of some plan of escaping. I propped up my straw-hat on a peg, so that the men, who were all below me, might think I was sleeping; and then tried to edge off, and to be ready for a run when more soldiers came; but one who was very wary, and who turned out to be one of the four brigandesses, changed her position so as to see the place where I was.

"I was dreadfully hungry, and found in my pocket a piece of the Indian corn-bread as large as a walnut; this soon went, and I turned out all my pockets, and discovered to my joy the little cabbage I had put away on the 15th. I ate that raw, and thought it any thing but disgusting. I now found two roots of garlic: one satisfied me, the flavor being rather strong (how soon I was cured of all daintiness! Before I was with the brigands the smell of garlic alone was nauseous, let alone the taste); the other I put into my pocket. We had some water to drink during the night, and with that I was obliged to be satisfied till the evening. A village was near, for we heard the bells of the church chiming the hours. I fancied we were near Castellamara; but on asking one of the brigands if it were so, he replied 'Yes;' and I knew at once that it could not be; for it is always the brigands' principle to deceive their captives as to where they are.

"At dusk we started again; and, as yesterday, diverged over mountains and through woods for four on I kept eating it. The brigands lay down on the ground, and lapped up the water that had thawed and was running among the decayed leaves. I thought of fever, and preferred the snow."

They soon came upon the main body of the band, from whom they had been separated for a few days. They were in a lovely glade, surrounded by large beeches, with goats and sheep tethered near; the brigands, lying around clad in their picturesque costumes, making a picture worthy of Salvator Rosa. "But," comments Mr. Moens, "I do not believe that Salvator Rosa, or any other man, ever voluntarily paid a second visit to the brigands, however great his love of the picturesque might be; for no one would willingly endure brigand life after one experience of it." Here is a picture of brigands in gala attire:

"The smaller band had four women with them, attired like the men, with their hair cut short; at first I took them for boys; and all these displayed a greater love for jewelry than the members of Manzo's band. They were decked out to do me honor, and one of them wore no less than twenty-four gold rings, of various sizes and stones, on her hands, at the same moment; others twenty, sixteen, ten, according to their wealth. To have but one gold chain attached to a watch was considered paltry and mean. Cerino and Manzo had bunches as thick as an arm suspended across the breasts of their waistcoats, with gorgeous brooches at each fastening; little bunches of 'charms' were also attached in conspicuous positions.

"Manzo's band had long jackets of stout brown cloth, the color of withered leaves, with large pockets of a circular shape on the two sides, and others on the breasts outside, and a slit on each side gave entrance to a large pocket that could hold any thing in the back of the garment. I have seen a pair of trousers, two shirts, three or four pounds of bread, a bit of dirty bacon, cheese, etc., pulled out one after another when searching for some article that was missing. The waistcoats buttoned at the side, but had gilt buttons down the centre, for show or or-or five hours, till having reached an open part at the summit of a mountain covered with grass, there was a halt, and we lay down to sleep. The night was very cold, wet, and foggy; in fact, we were actually in the clouds."

"May 19.—We woke up an hour before daybreak, stiff from cold. I could not move till I had rubbed my knees for ten minutes. We started down hill, and then along a path up another mountain. As the sun got up we grew very thirsty, for we had dared to stop only half a minute for a drink the evening before, on account of the roads being dangerous; and we had passed no streams during the night. After some time a search was made for snow, and at last, in a most unlikely place, some was found. It was most delicious, and as we walked nament: the larger ones were stamped with dogs' heads, birds, etc. There were two large circular pockets at the lower part of the waistcoats, in which were kept spare cartridges, balls, gunpowder, knives, etc.: and in the two smaller ones, higher up, the watch on the one side and percussion-caps in the other. This garment was of dark blue cloth, like the trousers, which were cut in the ordinary way.

"When the jackets were new they had all attached to the collars, by buttons, capotes, or heads, which are drawn over the head at night, or when the weather is very cold, but most of them had been lost in the woods. A belt about three inches deep, divided by two partitions, to hold about fifty cartridges, completed the dress, which when new was very neat-looking and serviceable. Some of the cartridges were murderous missiles. Tin was soldered around the ball so as to hold the powder, which was kept in place by a plug of tow. When used the tow was taken out, and after the powder was poured down the barrel the case was reversed, and a lot of slugs being added, was rammed down, with the tow on top. These must be very destructive at close quarters; but they generally blaze at the soldiers, and the result, at such a distance that little harm is done, from the uncertain aim taken. Most of them had revolvers, kept either in belts or the left-hand pocket of their jackets. They were secured by a silk cord around their necks, and fastened to a ring in the butt of the pistol. Some few had stilettoes, only used for human victims. Many had ostrich-feathers, with turned up wide-awakes, which gave their wearers a theatrical and absurd appearance. Gay silk handkerchiefs round their necks and collars on their cotton shirts made them look quite dandies when these were clean, which was but seldom."

The band were in unusual spirits, for besides Mr. Moens they had just captured Signor Francesco Visconti, son of a landed proprietor of Giffoni, a small village near by, and his cousin Tomasini, a lad of twelve, who turned out to be a regular imp of mischief. For these a ransom of 170,000 francs was fixed, and 109,250 actually paid by their friends soon after. So business was prospering: and moreover on this occasion they had enough to eat, for the about only time during the months in which Mr. Moens was with them. For in spite of an occasional rich prize the life of the bandits is one of constant privation, exposure, and terror. Mrs. Moens had an interview with Talarico, an ex-bandit chief who had left off business by arrangement with the Government, receiving pardon and a pension. "He was an extremely handsome man, with the smallest and most delicate hands," says Mrs. Moens. He interested himself considerably in endeavororing to effect the liberation of Mr. Moens, and even offered to accompany her, with the money, to the brigands, if Government would grant him permission. This, however, was refused. The lady asked him which he liked best, the life of a brigand, or that of an honest man?

"Oh, that of an honest man," he replied; "a brigand's life is this:" turning his head rapidly over one shoulder and then over the other, indicating by this gesture constant apprehension of an enemy.

There were properly two bands of these robbers with whom Mr. Moens and Signor Visconti had to do. Of one Gaetano Manzo was captain; of the other, Giardullo di Pesto, captured and shot soon after. These gangs together numbered 42 persons, of whom seven were runaway soldiers. Another, a lad of eighteen, used to carry milk about the streets. One day a friend tried to cheat him out of three or four dollars; whereupon the milk-boy stabbed him and took to the mountains. Nearly every member of the band was known to be a murderer. In fact, Manzo and one other, Mr. Moens thinks, were the only ones who had not been guilty of that crime. Whenever any money was received a small sum was set apart for common expenses, and the remainder divided among all the band, the captain getting only a single share. At every possible moment the whole gang would fall to gambling, and in a few days nearly all the money would find its way into the hands of four or five of the most lucky or skillful gamblers. Gambling was carried on in the most dangerous places, even when the soldiers were known to be near, and when the risk attending a quarrel among themselves might easily have been fatal to the brigands.

Mr. Moens thus describes the one feast-day which happened during his life with the brigands:

"At last, tired of watching the band, I lay down and fell asleep. I slept for some hours, during which a poor sheep was dragged into the inclosure, killed, cut up, cooked in the pot, and eaten. I must have slept until near sunset, for when I awoke another sheep was being brought forward, and I watched the process of killing and cutting up the poor beast. The sheep was taken in hand by two men, Generoso and Antonio generally acting as the butchers of the band. One doubled the fore legs of the sheep across the head; the other held the head back, inserting a knife into the throat, and cutting the windpipe and jugular vein. It was then thrown down and left to expire. When dead, a slit was made in one of the hind legs near the feet, and an iron ramrod taken and passed down the leg to the body of the animal; it was then withdrawn, and the mouth of one of the men placed to the slit in the leg, and the animal was inflated as much as possible, and then skinned. When the skin was separated from the legs and sides, the carcass was taken and suspended on a peg on a tree through the tendon of a hind leg; the skin was then drawn off the back (sometimes the head was skinned, but this rarely). The skin was now spread out on the ground to receive the meat, etc., when cut off the body; the inside was taken out, the entrails being drawn out carefully and cleaned; these were wound round the inside fat by two or three who were fond of this luxury—Sentonio, and Andrea the executioner, generally performing this operation. These delicacies, as they were considered, being made about four inches long and about one inch in diameter, are fried in fat or roasted on spits. It was some time before I could bring myself to eat these, but curiosity first, and hunger afterward, often caused me to eat my share, for I soon learned it was unwise to refuse any thing.

"While these two men were preparing the inside, the other two were cutting up the carcass. The breast was first cut off, and then the shoulders; the sheep was then cut in half with the axe, and then the bones were laid on a stump and cut through, so that it all could be cut in small pieces. One man would hold the meat, while another would take hold of a piece with his left hand and cut with his right. As it was cut up, the pieces would be put into a large cotton handkerchief, which was spread out on the ground; the liver and lungs were cut up in the same way; the fat was then put in the caldaja, and, when this was melted, the kidneys and heart (if the latter had not been appropriated by some one) were put in, cooked, and eaten, every one helping himself by dipping his fingers in the pot. The pieces of liver were considered the prizes. All the rest of the sheep was then put in the pot at once, and after a short time the pot was taken off the fire and jerked, so as to bring the under pieces to the top."

A few notes, taken almost at random, will give an idea of the ordinary way of life of the brigands and their captives:

"No fire was made to-day on account of the proximity of the soldiers, who disturbed the band last night. Bread in small quantities was divided among us, but there was no water." . . . "Some of the band arrived with two sheep. I rejoiced to see them, for we had not had any meat for five or six days. The sheep were soon killed, skinned, and in the great camp-kettle; but Visconti and I were horrified at finding we had to eat the meat without bread. I had secured a heart, which I roasted on a stick, and divided with Visconti, as I always did with any thing that I could secure apart from the general division. On searching in my pocket I found a little piece of bread, which I had put away and forgotten. This I ate as dessert, to take away the taste of the meat. We were told not to eat all, but to reserve some for the evening. An hour before sunset every thing was packed away, and we were informed that a long march was before us. I was very cold, and a biting wind was blowing, so that I was rather rejoiced than otherwise, for I dreaded sleeping in the open air in these damp cold nights. I always dreaded, too, waking up in the morning, on account of the piercing cold. It was a long up-hill walk through the forest. It was very dark, and I had the greatest difficulty in following. I found the best plan was to grasp with my left hand the shoulder or muzzle of the gun of the man before me. As we approached the summit of the mountain the force of the wind and the cold increased. Several of those in front went on, while we were halted and told to lie down, as the tops of the mountains are always considered dangerous, for the soldiers are often stationed there."

"In the middle of the day there was one of the usual alarms, which proved to be caused by four or five more of the band who had come to join us. With them was one of the women. She had been shot right through by the accidental discharge of one of their guns. The ball had broken the bone in two, and the arm was suspended and wrapped up in numerous pocket-handkerchiefs. No food was given to us all day, but, to my joy, I found in my pocket a morsel of bread that I had forgotten. I shared it with Don Francisco, and then turned out my pockets, and picking out the dirt, ate the crumbs which I found there. We heard from the newly-arrived brigands that the troops were all around us. Great caution was observed. In the evening two or three ascended the mountain to search for snow, and in about an hour returned with a great mass carried on a stick. We ate a quantity of this to assuage our thirst, not having any water for four-and-twenty hours. I found this want of water very trying at first, but soon had not only to get accustomed to it, but very often to fare still worse."

"We had to go two days without any thing to eat, so a foray was made into the country near and three sheep, alive, were brought back. When they were being cut up I was much disgusted at seeing Generoso and Antonio, who generally acted as butchers, tearing mouthfuls of raw meat with their teeth from the carcass just like wolves. I asked them why they did not wait for it to be cooked, and they said, 'Why should we, when we are dying of hunger?'"

Apart from privations, the brigands were in continual alarm that the soldiers might pounce upon them at any moment. At one time the captain went off on a scouting party, and was gone three days; during the interval those who remained with the prisoners had not a morsel of food. When the brigands returned it was clear that something had gone wrong:

"They were in a dreadful state, having been walking the last three days and nights incessantly, without having had any thing to eat, and they were, of course, grievously disappointed at our having no food for them, and they vented their feelings accordingly by abusing and threatening me. Their eyes were red and glistening from the feverish state in which they were from over-fatigue and want of food; their clothing too was very much torn, and covered with dirt and dust, and the majority of them were very foot-sore. For a long time I was afraid to ask them any questions, going on the principle of 'least said soonest mended,' especially as the question of cutting off my ears, etc., was again discussed. At last I learned that there were 4000 soldiers concentrated around Giffoni, and posts on all the mountains, so that the brigands were unable to remain near the town; and besides this the peasants would not provide any bread."

This talk about "cutting off ears, etc.," refers to an unpleasant habit that some of the brigands had of threatening to send the ears or nose of the captive to his friends, by way of spurring up their zeal in forwarding the ransom. Once they were apparently so nearly on the point of doing this that Mr. Moens made up his mind to cut off the top of an ear himself, in the hope of saving the remainder. He reasoned that a piece would probably answer the brigands' purpose as well as the whole; and if only the top was gone he could hide the mutilation by his hair. Once it was suggested to send his beard, "with a piece of the chin attached," for the same purpose. They had, moreover, when out of humor, a very disagreeable habit of discussing before him the best places to strike in order to kill a man, and of thrusting their long knives between his body and arms. He met all their threats very coolly, telling them that they might kill him as soon as they pleased. His coolness and pluck clearly won their admiration; and most likely their threats were never quite seriously meant, although it was clear that they would never have allowed him to be rescued alive. Whenever there was a skirmish—and there were several—some of the gang were always placed so as to be able to shoot the prisoner. For the rest, their treatment was not especially brutal. He fared in general about as well as the gang themselves, though that was hardly enough. In fact, they appeared to look upon their captives as lawful prisoners of war, to be duly "exchanged" for money. They would undoubtedly have killed them rather than allow them to escape or be rescued. It was every way for their interest to keep them alive; and when the sum agreed upon was received they showed no disposition to keep them longer.

Manzo kept very good discipline among his followers, and was in no way scrupulous as to the methods of enforcing it. Once Guange, one of the band, got into a noisy quarrel with a "companion." The captain ordered him to be quiet; and as the command was not at once obeyed he rushed upon him, knocked him down, and kept hitting him and rubbing his face on the stones until it was bruised to a jelly. It was not very easy to be merry under such circumstances; but once, when luck had given them a sheep, and they dared to make a fire to roast it, the gang made a very fair attempt at jollity, roaring out songs, and requesting one from their prisoner. They were greatly surprised to learn that singing was not one of his accomplishments. In Italy every man is presupposed to be able to sing as certainly as to talk.

So week after week passed away, Mrs. Moens all the while making strenuous exertions to raise and send the money for the ransom of her husband. There was no difficulty in getting the money. One gentleman, the Rajah Byjenath, of India, offered a draft for £10,000; another deposited in bank at Naples £8500, the amount demanded, to the credit of Mr. Moens. The difficulty was in getting the money to the brigands, for it is a grave crime for any one to hold any communication with them. Finally, by threats the brigands compelled Signor Visconti, a gentleman of Giffoni, a little town near the mountains, whose son had been their prisoner, to act as their agent; and he received verbal permission from the authorities to do so. Then it was not thought safe to send the sum at once, for fear that the brigands would pocket it and demand more. They often threatened to raise the price. One time a report became current among them that the Italian Government would pay the ransom; whereupon the captain said that he would not take less than a million francs. Again news came that Lord Palmerston had sent a dispatch relating to the affair; the brigands at once jumped to the conclusion that Mr. Moens must be a relative of the British Premier, and the value of their prize rose greatly in their estimation. On the other hand, it was an object with him to convince them that he was merely a poor photographer, in order to induce them to lower the sum. They compelled him at sundry times to write most plaintive letters to his wife, complaining of his hard fate, and imploring her to send on his ransom. Manzo dictated these, and would not allow him to add a word in English. Manzo himself wrote to Visconti:

"I can do nothing more because my hand require absolutely 50,000 ducats, otherwise they wish to take his life. Therefore then, with many tears of my mother, and many prayers of my mother and Fortunato Tedesco, they had compassion, they cried so much that they wanted to take him with them. I interceded with my hand, because they wished to take his life, thereupon they said they would have 30,000 ducats, with what I have already received, without deducting a centime—30,000 ducats, otherwise we shall take his life."

"I have received from Don Elia Vigento, in four payments, the sum of a hundred and twenty-four thousand four hundred and eighty liras, being three thousand and twenty liras for the ransom of the Brigand Manno."

LARRY WARD.

"Nottodromo, the 2nd August, 1853."

At length they agreed to take 20,000 ducats (something more than $25,000) in all. The last payment was made on the 20th of August, three months and five days after the capture, Manno giving a receipt for it in due form.

It was not a very easy thing to get the prisoner to a place of safety; but Manno had promised that he would do all he could to keep him from danger; and, says Mr. Manno, "I do believe that he thought himself bound by honor, as a brigand chief, to deliver the Apulian safe to his friends." The money was fairly divided among the gang. There had been originally thirty of them; but two had been shot by the troops the day after the capture, another had fallen over a precipice and broken his neck, the last had been captured, one had surrendered, another had been shot while hanging, and three had quarreled with the others, and were excluded from any share of the money; so that there were but seventeen left.

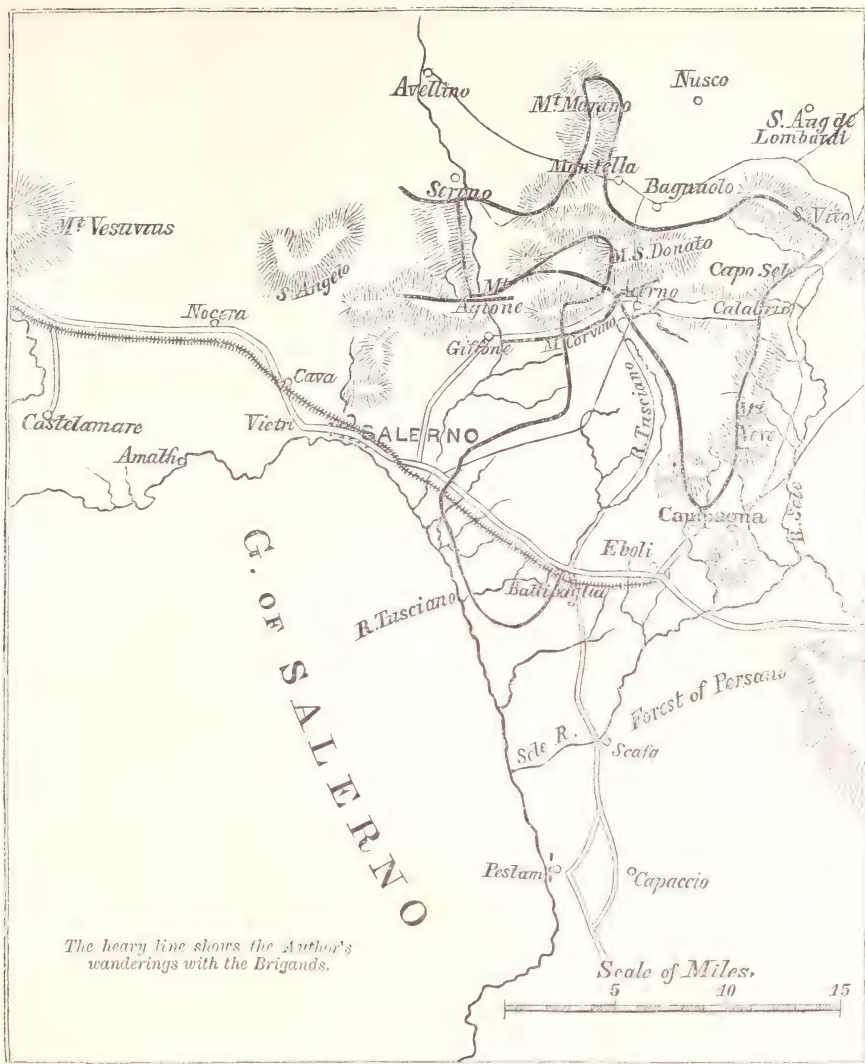

Captain and reserve paroled with all the families. Manno took of his hat and putting some Neapolitan in it went round making a salutation, so that, as he pleased it, Mr. Manno might "go to Naples like a gentleman." The head, most of whom were "cleansed out" by gunning, were not very liked; whereupon the captain took some money from the common bag, and made up the sum to seventeen and a half Neapolitan (about $70). Mr. Manno asked him for a heavy gold chain which he wore; Manno was just taking it off to give it to him when somebody called him away, and it was not received. Giovanni gave him a ring as a keepsake; and after some language exchanged for a pen-knife his own great knife, with which he had killed two men. Pasquale, who had been the most ferocious of the gang, and who was always boasting about cutting off ears, walked up and gave a couple of Neap-lesian, which, says Mr. Manno, "I accepted with thanks." Manno's mother brought a small loaf of white bread and a little olive-oil. Then came the final parting. Manno asked what Mr. Manno would say to the President when questioned about the band. Mr. Manno replied that he should say that this band of about 30 had been a match for an army of 15,000 men. The brigand captain was highly delighted, rubbed his hands with glee, and gave him two more rings; he then, called another, making five in all. Manno said he was quite satisfied with the amount which had been paid him; and Mr. Manno advised him to hurry to realize his intention to his two companions, since when a brigand was taken it got into all the newspapers, and the Government was obliged to send so many soldiers that the brigands had very little chance of escaping. The brigands promised to kiss him after the Italian method, but this Mr. Manno declined. "I, however," he says, "shook hands all around with them, they parting with me in the most friendly manner. The brigands wishing me a pleasant journey, waving their arms some while in sight." He had been a captive with them 120 days, during all of which time he had never entered a house.

When Mr. Manno at length made his entrance into Giffoni, his appearance was not very attractive. "My overalls," he says, "were all in tatters, and hanging in shreds at my feet. My coat was covered with the dirt and grease of the meat which I had to carry in the pocket; and all the lining of the shirt was torn to shreds. My wide-awake was dirty and torn. My shirt I had worn day and night since the 20th of June, more than two months; my boots were all broken, and many of the soles were missing. It is almost unnecessary to describe the state of my body. I was covered with sores from the effect of the venison, through the brigands having totally refused to allow me to remove my clothing for washing purposes, and never allowing me to stop at a stream, for fear of the troops coming upon us before I could rearrange my dress."

The subject of Bridgeland in Italy, practically possessed in the early work of Mr. Manno, is a very curious one. He was captured by a railroad—one of the few in Italy, and therefore in the midst of a dense population. For almost if a third of a year he was turned round from place to place among the mountains, never going more than forty or fifty miles from the great city of Naples. It is much as though one had been seized by a band of robbers within a couple of hours from New York, carried off to the Highlands, and kept there for three months and more, and only released upon the payment of $20,000 or $30,000. Nor was this a single case of seizure by this band. During that year fully a score of persons were in like manner taken by the same combined gang, for whom ransoms amounting in all to half a million dollars were demanded; and more than $100,000 was actually paid. The richest prize, in their estimation, was that of "Signor Wenner, son of Albert Wenner, calico printer of Salerno," captured by Manzo's band a month after the release of Mr. Moens. For him more than $200,000 was demanded, and an installment of $25,000 paid; but at the latest accounts he was still held, the brigands demanding the whole amount. These are only the great catches; besides them were many of smaller amounts. All this, it must be borne in mind, belongs only to a single province. As far as we can ascertain, a similar state of things exists in a considerable part of the dominions of Victor Emanuel. The consequence is, as stated by Mr. Moens, that the "proprietors," or indeed any person supposed to be wealthy, "dare not show their faces out of their houses, for they are carried off from the very villages, should they venture to go a step from their own doors." He found it so at Palermo, where "no one dare venture beyond the gates of the city for fear of the brigands."

The business of brigandage is carried on by the aid and information, and greatly to the profit of the peasantry, who seem to be one and all in league with the brigands. They furnish them with food and other necessities, for which they charge extravagant prices. Mr. Moens was allowed to inspect the accounts of Captain Manzo, and he affirms that five-sixths of the money received in the way of ransoms went to the peasants. For a loaf of bread, weighing 3½ pounds, costing in the towns from three-pence to sixpence, the brigands paid a ducat—three shillings and fourpence—and in like proportion for every thing. The peasants act the part of "fences," and, like other fences, get nearly all the gains of the actual perpetrators of a robbery. This profitable business is indeed a risky one; for Mr. Moens was informed that during the time he was with the brigands more than 1500 peasants were arrested and imprisoned on suspicion of complicity with the brigands in only two provinces, and he was in fear after his release that some of the relatives of these persons would assassinate him in revenge; for it seems that it was in consequence of the notoriety given to his seizure that the Government was stirred up to unwonted vigor.

Complicity with the brigands is, however, by no means confined to the peasants, for among those arrested on this charge we find three priests, a baron, two syndics, a doctor, and a score entitled to style themselves "Don" and "Signor." What hope is there for a people among whom brigandage and begging are the most notable institutions?

The measures deliberately recommended by Mr. Moens and others for the suppression of brigandage, may be studied with benefit by those Europeans whose delicate sensibilities were shocked by some of the stringent orders respecting "bridge-burners" and "guerrillas" put forth by us during the late rebellion. Thus, he would "levy the sum paid as ransom for any captive upon the district haunted by the band." And, "in addition to this, a court-martial held on the spot on any one found with more bread upon his person than a specified amount—say sufficient for his mid-day meal: and if, after a speedy trial, any one thus proved to have any dealings whatsoever with the brigands, were hanged, without allowing any person who may be reasoning one of them, away from the brigands' hands, it would cause a great state of fear among the peasants." And "when any of the inhabitants of the villages and the surrounding country were absent at night, they should be made to account for being abroad. This would speedily prevent all carrying of food during the night. In fact, a Curfew Act, such as that which existed not so very long ago in Ireland, would soon produce the desired effect."

IT is well known that at the commencement of the rebellion the rebels had no thought of a serious dismemberment of the nation. Their plan was, through secession, to effect a revolution which would nationalize slavery by giving it the support of the General Government, extending it through all the Territories, securing the privilege of holding slaves in the Northern States, and thus securing to the South the political pre-eminence which it had so long adroitly maintained. It was thought that there was a large party at the North in cordial sympathy with slavery, and that that party was sufficiently powerful to prevent the North from venturing upon a war. The South, by retiring temporarily from the General Government, could frame a Constitution in entire accordance with its views. The Northern States would then, they supposed, one after another join the new Confederacy, leaving, perhaps, New England, whose love of liberty could not be bribed, "out in the cold."

Hon. Jacob Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, under the National Government, was sent as commissioner from Mississippi to Maryland to urge that State to unite with the seceding States of the South. On the 19th of December, 1860, he addressed a large meeting in Baltimore, in which he is reported to have said:

"Secession is not intended to break up the present Government, but to perpetuate it. We do not propose to go out for fear of breaking up a Government the Union is our Fatherland. It is not our duty to go out for the purpose of securing further guarantees and security for our rights. Our plan is for the Southern States to withdraw from the Union for the present, to allow amendments to the Constitution to be made guaranteeing our just rights. The question of slavery must be settled not at once."

The majestic and unexpected rising of the North dispelled these illusions. The Southern leaders, having opened fire upon Sumter, had advanced too far to retreat. Nothing was then left for them but to plunge headlong into the desperate struggle for the establishment of a Southern Confederacy. It was essential to the success of this enterprise that the rebels should secure possession of the Mississippi River. Almost instantaneously their batteries rose upon every bluff from Cairo to the Balize.

The city of New Orleans, which McCulloch describes as the third in commercial importance and the fourth in population in the United States, is situated on the left bank of the Mississippi, about one hundred miles from its mouth. The importance of this city caused it to be defended by the rebels with the highest resources of modern military art. Its capture by the mortar fleet under Commodore Porter, and the gun-boat fleet under Commodore Faragut, may be safely pronounced as unparalleled in the annals of naval warfare. Sixty miles below the city there were two strong works, Fort Philip on the left and Fort Jackson on the right of the river. Their united armament consisted of one hundred and twenty-six guns, many of them of the largest calibre. The river here is seven hundred yards wide. A chain cable of massive links of iron was stretched across the river, supported by a raft of enormous logs, and eleven hulks securely moored.

Above the raft there were thirteen rebel gun-boats, including the iron-clad battery Louisiana, and the iron-clad ram Manassas. This formidable fleet was sheltered under cover of the guns of the forts. Between New Orleans and these forts, at various important points along the river, water batteries were constructed to sweep the channel. The city was held by a large and well-disciplined military force under General Lovell. Commodore G. N. Hollins commanded the naval armament.

The rebel authorities at Richmond professed, and probably honestly, not to feel the slightest solicitude in reference to the safety of New Orleans. English and French naval officers who had examined the defenses pronounced them impregnable. The citizens of New Orleans laughed to scorn the idea that any Yankee fleet could surmount the obstructions with which they had barred the approaches to the city. One of the New Orleans journals stated, on the 5th of April, 1862:

"Our only fear is that the Northern invaders may not appear. We have made such extensive preparations to receive them that it were vexatious if their invincible armada escapes the fate we have in store for it."

To reduce these defenses Commodore Farragut was provided with a gun-boat and mortar fleet of forty-six vessels, with an aggregate armament of about three hundred guns and mortars. There were no iron-clads in the fleet. Commander Porter had charge of the mortar fleet, which consisted of twenty vessels, each mounting one large mortar and two small guns. The bombardment of the two forts was opened on the 18th of April. For six days it was continued with almost unmitigated fury. The roar of this awful cannonade fell heavily upon the ear of the inhabitants of New Orleans by day and by night though sixty miles distant.

At 2 o'clock on the morning of the 24th of April signal was given for the gun-boat squadron to move up the river and endeavor to cut through the raft and chains and run by the forts, while the mortar fleet kept up the bombardment. In the darkness of the night of the 20th Commander Bell had ascended the river with two gun-boats, while the attention of the enemy was distracted by a terrific bombardment, with the hope of blowing up the boom by means of petards. Failing in this Lieutenant Caldwell boarded one of the hulks and contrived to slip the chain so as to make a sufficient opening for the steamers to pass through. Pollard, in his Southern History, apparently unwilling to give the patriots credit for so heroic a deed, says, "Unfortunately a violent storm had made a large chasm in the raft which could not be closed in time."

The boats ascended in two columns. Immediately upon passing through the chasm in the raft the right column was to attack Fort St. Philip, and the left Fort Jackson. The midnight conflict which ensued no description can portray. The gloom of night, the dark flow of the river, the flash of the guns, the incessant and deafening roar, the fierce blaze of the fire-rafts, swept down by the swift current, the signal-rockets piercing the black skies, neither pen nor pencil can adequately picture.

As soon as the gun-boats had passed through the barrier, and while exposed to the fire of both of the forts, the rebel squadron came rushing down the river and plunged desperately into the thickest of the fight. Within two hours this fleet was utterly destroyed. Flag-Officer Farragut, in his account of this fearful scene, says:

"Just as the scene appeared to be closing the ram Manassas was seen coming under full speed to attack us. I directed Captain Smith, in the Mississippi, to turn and run her down. The order was instantly obeyed by the Mississippi turning and going at her at full speed. Just as we expected to see the ram annihilated, when within fifty yards of each other, she put her helm hard a-port, dodged the Mississippi, and ran ashore. The Mississippi poured two broadsides into her, and sent her drifting down the river a total wreck."

Commander Porter's mortar flotilla was moored nearly a mile and a half down the river, throwing in majestic curves through the air their enormous shells into the fort. The rebel ram was swept down the stream by the rapid current till she came within sight of Porter's flotilla. Several guns immediately opened fire upon her. Commander Porter writes in his report:

"I soon discovered that the Manassas could harm no one again, and I ordered the vessels to save their shot. She was beginning to emit smoke from her ports or holes, and was discovered to be on fire and sinking. She had evidently been used up by the squadron as they passed along. I tried to save her as a curiosity, by getting a hawser around her and securing her to the bank, but just after doing so she faintly exploded. Her only gun went off, and emitting flames through her bow port, like some huge animal, she gave a plunge and disappeared under the water."

Twelve gun-boats had now passed the forts, and, casting anchor beyond the range of the guns, prepared for further operations. The appalling tidings had been flashed along the wires to New Orleans, creating there a scene of indescribable consternation.

The citizens of New Orleans were awakened from their dream of security by the tolling of the alarm bells announcing the approach of the foe. It was 9 o'clock on the morning of the 24th when the intelligence was received. The scene of tumult and consternation which ensued no pen can describe. The whole population, men, women, and children, rushed into the streets. As the tidings were repeated from lip to lip: "The Yankee fleet has passed the forts and is approaching the city!" the populace became almost frantic in the madness of their terror.

General Lovell, who was in command of the rebel troops stationed in New Orleans, had been down to the forts, which, as we have stated, were sixty miles below the city, to watch the movements there. Appalled by the unexpected achievement of the National fleet, he put spurs to his horse, and following along the levee at the utmost possible speed, reached the city at 2 o'clock P.M. Here, in a hurried conference with the city authorities, it was decided immediately to withdraw the military force that the city might be saved from bombardment. The troops were accordingly ordered to rendezvous at Camp Moore, about seventy miles above New Orleans, on the Jackson Railroad. Lovell's army, it is said, had been weakened to strengthen the rebel force at Corinth, and he had then under his command but about twenty-eight hundred men.

With ten vessels Flag-Officer Farragut was now steaming up the river toward the city. He had still apparently severe obstacles to encounter. At Chalmette, a few miles below the city, there were two very formidable water-batteries, mounting on one side of the river five 32-pounders, and on the other, nine guns of the same calibre. Could he, without delay, pass these obstructions, and send a frigate ten miles above New Orleans, he could effectually cut off the retreat of General Lovell and capture his whole army. The only retreat for the rebels was by the narrow strip of land between the river and the swamp. At a place called Kin-ner's plantation this strip was but one mile wide. Through this narrow neck, which a frigate could command, the railroad passed. The nervous excitement under which General Lovell pressed the evacuation of the city may consequently be imagined.

At half past 10 o'clock the next morning, the 25th, the fleet came in sight of the Chalmette batteries. The Hartford led, followed by the Brooklyn, the Richmond, the Pensacola, and six gun-boats. The Cayuga had been leading, and being quite in the advance, and not having noticed the signal for close order, Captain Bailey had sustained, for nearly twenty minutes, a cross-fire with the batteries, when the Hartford ranged ahead and opened so terrific a broadside of shells, shrapnel, and grape, that the rebels on the right bank of the river were driven from their guns. In quick succession the remaining vessels of the fleet came up, and in less than twenty minutes both batteries were silenced, and the rebels were seen scampering from their works in all directions.

There were now no further obstacles to be encountered save the fire rafts and burning vessels, with which the river seemed to be filled. The rebels in the wantonness of their frenzy applied the torch to every thing. All the cotton in the city was brought out and set on fire. The mob could scarcely be restrained from applying the torch to all the public buildings and even the private dwellings. Scarcely any scenes in the French Revolution could exceed the horrors of the spectacle now displayed in New Orleans. Flag-Officer Farragut, in his Report to the Secretary of the Navy, writes:

"I must say I never witnessed such Vandalism in my life, as the destruction of property; all the shipping, steamboats, etc., were set on fire and consumed."

The special artist of Harper's Weekly, who accompanied the squadron, thus graphically describes the scene, as it was presented to his eyes when the victorious fleet anchored in front of New Orleans:

"The view from our decks was one such as will never in all human probability be witnessed again. A large city lay at our mercy. Its levee was crowded by an excited mob. The smoke of the ruins of millions' worth of cotton and shipping at times half concealed the people. While men were hastening up the levee, firing ships and river craft as fast as possible, the people were rushing to and fro. Some of them cheered for the Union, when they were fired upon by the crowd. Men, women, and children were armed with pistols, knives, and all manner of weapons. Some cheered for Jeff Davis, Beauregard, etc., and used the most vile and obscene language toward us and the good old flag. Pandemonium was here a living picture. Order was with them a thing of the past, and forgotten, and the air was rent with yells of defiance."

After rather a protracted correspondence with Monroe, the Mayor of the city, New Orleans was surrendered to the National forces, and again the United States flag floated proudly over its towers. The two forts which had endured so terrific a bombardment, cut off from all communication with the rebel fleet or army, were compelled to capitulate; and thus the majestic Mississippi, from its mouth to New Orleans, was again restored to its rightful owner, the people of the United States.

But the armed rebels had fled up the river, and were again concentrating at various points upon its banks. They were to be pursued. It was the voice of the people that our great national river, the Mississippi, cost what it might, was to be cleared of every rebel obstruction from Cairo to the Gulf. General Butler's land-force, having disembarked on the shore of Lake Pontchartrain, took possession of the city, and Flag-Officer Farragut, leaving a few ships in the stream to overawe the rebellious populace, again commenced the ascent of the river. He learned that eight miles above the city, at Carrollton, there were two forts quite heavily armed, one on each side of the stream. But the rebels had no longer any heart to brave with their water batteries the broadsides of our fleet.

As the squadron with defiant flag pushed boldly up they found the guns spiked, the carriages in flames, and the garrison dispersed. One of the batteries contained twenty-nine guns, the other six. Having completed the destruction of these works, they continued their ascent against the swift current of the stream. About a mile farther up they encountered other earth-works, which had also been abandoned.

"We discovered here," writes Flag-Officer Farragut, "fastened to the right bank of the river, one of the most Herculean labors I have ever seen—a raft and chain to extend across the river to prevent Foote's gun-boats from descending. It is formed by placing three immense logs, of not less than three or four feet in diameter, and some thirty feet long. To the centre one a 2-inch chain is attached, running lengthwise the raft. The three logs and chain are then frapped together by chains from $\frac{1}{4}$ to 1 inch, three or four layers; and there are ninety-six of these lengths composing the raft. It is at least three-quarters of a mile long."

Seven vessels were now sent up the river under the command of Captain Craven to keep up the panic. Several of these, under Commander Lee, were ordered to proceed as far as Vicksburg. On the 7th of May the Iroquois, under Commander James S. Palmer, appeared off Baton Rouge, one hundred and twenty miles above New Orleans, and demanded the immediate surrender of the town with all the munitions of war which the rebels had collected there, and the raising of the United States flag over the arsenal. A small force was landed, under the guns of the boats, and took possession of the place without any conflict.*

Commander Palmer then, with the Iroquois and several gun-boats, ascended the river one hundred and seventy miles farther, and passing Port Hudson, where no batteries had then been erected, on the 12th of May anchored before Natchez. The city attempted no resistance to the National fleet, and as it had never been occupied as a military position by the rebels, it was not formally taken possession of.

The little squadron then pushed on to Vicksburg, four hundred miles above New Orleans. Here they found formidable batteries frowning upon the bluffs which lined the eastern banks of the river. Commander S. P. Lee, with the advance of the squadron, reached this point on the 18th of May. To his demand for the surrender of the place a defiant refusal was returned. Not deeming it expedient to commence a bombardment with the small force he had he delayed operations for a few days until the arrival of Flag-Officer Farragut, who brought with him a column of troops under General Williams.

The rebel batteries were so strongly posted and so well manned, that, before attempting to reduce them, it was found necessary to send for

* Commander Palmer, in his Report, writes: "Here is a capital of a State, with 7000 inhabitants, acknowledging itself defenseless, and yet assuming an arrogant tone, trusting to our forbearance. I was determined to submit to no such nonsense, and accordingly weighed anchor, and steamed up abreast the arsenal, barracks, and other public property of the United States, and hoisted over it our flag."

additional naval and military force. Commander Porter's mortar flotilla was also towed up to assist in shelling out the heights. It was not until the evening of the 27th of June that all things were ready for the bombardment.

At two o'clock on the morning of the 28th the fleet got under way, and each vessel steamed to its appointed position. At four o'clock the mortars opened fire. The range of rebel batteries extended along the river three miles in length. The Iroquois, Captain J. S. Palmer; the Oneida, Captain S. P. Lee; and the Richmond, Captain James Alden, took the lead. These were followed by the Wissahicon, Captain John De Camp; the Sciota, Captain Edward Donaldson; the Hartford, Captain R. Wainwright; the Winona, Captain E. T. Nichols; the Pinola, Captain Pierce Crosby; each one pouring in successively its tremendous fire. Commander Porter followed with the Octorora, Westfield, Clifton, Jackson, Harriet Lane, and Owaseo.

By the time the fleet came within range of the forts it was daylight, and a severe fire of solid shot was immediately opened upon the ships from the batteries. The guns appeared to be principally Columbiads, and the flag-ship was the object of their most deadly aim. All the rebel guns were protected, some by earth-works and others by solid rocks. The vessels were so near the banks that the gunners could be seen working the guns and waving their hats in defiance. When the fire of any of the ships was directed to any particular battery the rebels would abandon their guns, returning to them again as the ship passed on. Flag-Officer Farragut writes in his Report:

"The Hartford received but little injury from the batteries in or below the town; but several raking shots from the battery above the town did us considerable damage. They were 50-pounder rifle and 8-inch solid shot. The first passed through the shell-room and lodged in the hold, but did no other harm. The 8-inch passed through the cabin, but hurt no one. When we reached the upper battery we soon silenced it, and it was reported to me that its flag was struck. We therefore gave three cheers. But when we had passed about three-quarters of a mile above they reopened fire with two heavy guns. Although their shots were well directed they either had too much or too little elevation, and only cut our rigging to pieces without injuring any one seriously; which was strange, as the Iroquois, Winona, and Pinola were on our quarter. The department will perceive from this report that the forts can be passed, and we have done it, and can do it again as often as may be required of us. It will not, however, be an easy matter for us to do more than silence the batteries for a time as long as the enemy has a large force behind the hills to prevent our landing and holding the place."

The conflict in passing batteries so formidable with wooden vessels was very severe. The mortars took a position about twenty-five hundred yards from the main battery and hurled their enormous missiles upon the foe with fearful effect. As the Hartford and the gun-boats opened their batteries with grape, canister, and shrapnel, the air seemed to be filled with projectiles. Gradually the lower batteries which were within range of the mortars were silenced. But as the gun-boats came abreast of the upper batteries, which were beyond the range of the mortars, the fire upon them became very severe. Several of the mortar fleet were very roughly handled. The Jackson, Captain Woodworth, was struck by a shell which exploded in the wheel-house, disabling the steering apparatus, and cutting off a leg of the man at the wheel. The Clifton, Captain Baldwin, hastened to the assistance of the crippled boat, when a shot passed through the Clifton's boiler. The catastrophe was awful in its effects. The scalding steam enveloped the boat. It was a foe whom no energy could resist and no courage could brave. Six men were scalded to death; others were severely burned. Ten men leaped overboard, of whom one was drowned. The Jackson now in turn came to the help of the more severely wounded Clifton. In the midst of a murderous fire she attempted to rescue the scalded and drowning men. The Westfield hurried to the rescue, when she was struck by a heavy rifle-shot, which fortunately did not cause any serious injury. The Octorora now came and towed the Clifton to a place of safety. The Jackson also drifted out of range. Commander David R. Porter in his Report says:

"It is to be regretted that a combined attack of army and navy had not been made, by which something more substantial might have been accomplished. Such an attack, I think, would have resulted in the capture of the city. Ships and mortar-vessels can keep full possession of the river and places near the water's edge, but they can not crawl up hills three hundred feet high; and it is that part of Vicksburg which must be taken by an army. If it was intended merely to pass the batteries at Vicksburg and make a junction with the fleet of Flag-Officer Davis, the navy did it most gallantly and fearlessly. It was as handsome a thing as has been done during the war; for the batteries to be passed extended full three miles, with a three-knot current against ships that could not, at the best, make eight knots under the most favorable circumstances."*

The mortar-vessels were moved below Vicksburg, along the levee, amply protected, it was supposed, from land-attack, by an impassable swamp. The rebel general Van Dorn, who was in command, it is said, of eighteen thousand men, conceived the idea that he could work his way through the morass, and by a grand stroke seize the boats. He accordingly marched a brigade from his encampment through the dense woods and over the miry, quaking bog, until they came within about two hundred yards of the forest-fringed levee. Here our pickets were encountered. They precipitately retreated, firing as they ran from the overpowering force, which was struggling along, many of them waist deep in mire. But Commander Porter was not the man to be caught napping. Instantly all the guns of the mortar-vessels and flotilla-steamers opened a terrific fire upon the woods, of grape, shrapnel, canister, shell, and round shot. The mortars, with small charges, pitched into the midst of the invisible foe their massive thunder-bolts. Fifty guns, spread along the levee for about a mile, and which could throw their shells and shot back into the swamp, a distance of two miles, poured their deadly discharges into the forest. No mortal could withstand its fury. As no foe was visible, imagination only could paint the consternation into which the rebel troops were plunged, as struggling through the gloomy bog they were assailed by this storm of mutilation and death.

* The contradictory account which reach us of the details of these events is remarkable. General T. Williams, in his official Report, says: "Seven of Flag-Officer Farragut's vessels passed Vicksburg at eleven o'clock in the morning of the 28th without alarming the batteries of the town."

After continuing this thorough shelling of the woods for some time, pickets were cautiously sent in to ascertain the result. They found three rebel soldiers hopelessly stuck in the mud. These men were extricated and brought to the boats. They stated that two regiments, one from Tennessee, the other from Mississippi, endeavored to pass through the swamp to attack the boats. They found it almost impossible to struggle along through the thick mud which impeded every step, when suddenly our guns opened upon them their terrific fire. There was no escape for them but in instantaneous and frantic flight. They threw away guns, knapsacks, cartridge-boxes, every thing that would impede their progress. It must have been indeed a wild scene of terror, as stumbling over roots, dashing aside branches of trees, and plunging through the miry pools, they endeavored to escape from those shrieking messengers of death which were hurtled around them. Commander Porter writes, in his Report :

"In going over the ground afterward our men found evidences of a general stampede throughout the woods. Among other things they picked up from the mud the heavy boots of a general officer, with silver spurs on. There was evidence in the marks that the enemy had been completely bogged or sunk in the mud. Our prisoners informed us that had we gone into the woods at that moment with two hundred men we could have captured the two regiments, as they were at the time perfectly helpless, having thrown away their arms. It was upon this marsh I depended for safety when I placed the schooners in position; for without such a natural defense we should have been at the mercy of concealed riflemen."

This adventure was on the first of July. The next day some of the rebel riflemen crept into the woods, and succeeded in getting so near as to wound two of our pickets, and to throw a few balls upon the decks of the boats. Five field-pieces, which were placed near the edge of the woods, were turned upon the assailants. They were speedily put to flight, leaving behind them five dead bodies and other indications of the severity of the punishment which they had received.

To guard against further annoyances of this kind five howitzers were landed, earth-works were thrown up, and fifty marines were posted as pickets. A large bell was also slung in the woods, with lines leading to it from different points, so that the pickets might give immediate alarm. "After which," says Commander

Porter, "the mortar flotilla went to their repose with great confidence."

The importance which the rebels attached to the possession of Vicksburg may be inferred from the following extracts from a speech which Jefferson Davis addressed to the Legislature of Mississippi on the 26th of December, 1862 :

"There are now two prominent objects in the programme of the enemy. One is to get possession of the Mississippi River and open it to navigation to appease the clamors of the West, and to utilize the capture of New Orleans, which has thus far rendered them no service. Vicksburg and Port Hudson have been strengthened, and now we can concentrate at either of them a force sufficient for their protection. Vicksburg will stand, and Port Hudson will stand. But let every man who can be spared from other vocations hasten to defend them, and thus hold the Mississippi River, that great artery of the Confederacy, preserve our communications with the Trans-Mississippi Department, and thwart the enemy's scheme of forcing navigation through to New Orleans. By holding that section of the river between Port Hudson and Vicksburg the people of the West, cut off from New Orleans, will be driven to the East to seek a market for their products, and will be compelled to pay so much in the way of freights that those products will be rendered almost valueless."

While Flag-Officer Farragut had been forcing his way up the river from its mouth, sweeping away every obstacle before him, Commodore Foote's gun-boat fleet, under the command of Flag-Officer Davis, had descended the river from Cairo, a distance of nearly a thousand miles, winning astounding victories at Island No. 10, Memphis, and other points by the way. The two fleets had now met at Vicksburg; the one above the three miles of batteries which frowned along the bluffs, and the other below. Flag-Officer Farragut had, with his gun-boats, run these batteries and joined the fleet of Flag-Officer C. H. Davis. He was now separated by these three miles of batteries from his mortar fleet. The batteries were increasing in number and strength every day. There was no land-force with the squadron sufficient even to attempt to take them. Thus the rebels held the river.

There was a small division of infantry which accompanied the expedition under General T. Williams. His force consisted of the Thirtieth Massachusetts, the Ninth Connecticut, the Seventh Vermont, the Fourth Wisconsin, and Nims's Battery, with two sections of Everett's. The only strategical value of Vicksburg to the rebels was its power from its commanding bluffs to blockade the river. The idea was conceived of isolating Vicksburg by cutting a new channel for the river through a neck of land opposite the city, which would leave Vicksburg a town some six miles inland. This idea was considered quite feasible, since the channel of this most tortuous of rivers had been not unfrequently changed by merely running a plow across a neck of land, thus converting a peninsula into an island.

While the fleet bombarded the city the troops were embarked in this enterprise. On the 25th of June they commenced surveying the line, and ground was broken on the morning of the 29th. Nearly twelve hundred negroes, gathered from the adjoining plantations, engaged gleefully in the work, cutting down trees, grubbing up the roots, and excavating the soil. The two fleets awaited the result of this experiment with the deepest interest. The canal was not completed until the 22d of July, when the water of the river was too low to run through it. The plan was revived in the final siege of Vicksburg, but proved a failure.

CUTTING CANAL OPPOSITE VICKSBURG.

About twelve miles north of Vicksburg is the mouth of the Yazoo River. The river is three hundred feet wide at its mouth, and is navigable for boats for fifty miles at high stages of the water. Several miles up this river the rebels had established a navy-yard, where they were building a powerful iron-clad ram named the Arkansas. To prevent our squadron from passing up to disturb their operations they had reared powerful batteries upon a commanding elevation called Haines Bluff. The most of our fleet was now moored near the mouth of the Yazoo, while Porter's mortar fleet was nearly fifteen miles down the river. The Vicksburg batteries prevented any communication between the fleets except by running the fearful gauntlet of their guns, or by sending couriers down through the swamp on the western banks. Not a little solicitude was felt respecting this iron-clad monster, of whose speed, armament, and ponderous mail appalling stories were told.

Several of our vessels were performing picket duty as far up the Yazoo as the rebel batteries would permit them to go. About seven o'clock in the morning of the 15th of July, when General Williams's troops and the contrabands were hard at work upon the canal, and the fleet was impatiently awaiting its completion, heavy firing was heard up the Yazoo. Two deserters the evening before had come on board the Essex, and had reported that the Arkansas was ready to come down. The gun-boats Carondelet and Tyler, with the steam-ram Queen of the West, had accordingly been sent up the Yazoo to watch proceedings. The fleet was lying at anchor with fires banked but no steam on. As they had no means of replenishing their coal it was needful to practice the utmost economy in the use of their fuel.

The sound of the firing drew rapidly nearer. The whole fleet was on the stir. Soon two of our boats were seen rushing down the river at full speed, pursued by the monster ram. The retreating vessels were firing vigorously with their stern guns, and were as vigorously replied to by the bow guns of the invincible foe. The Carondelet had been driven ashore, and the Arkansas was now in a coat of mail which could laugh to scorn all ordinary shot, impetuously chasing and pelting the Tyler and the Queen of the West. The rebel ram was but about three hundred yards in the rear of the ships it was pursuing. It was an appalling hour.

As many of the boats as could bring their guns to bear upon the foe immediately opened their fire. All the boats were now striving hurriedly to get up steam, and a strange scene of commotion ensued. As the Arkansas rushed along the Essex discharged seven guns at her, striking her three times. One of the shot, it was thought, penetrated her armor. As she approached the Richmond the rebel received a terrible broadside from her guns. For a moment both vessels were enveloped in smoke. As the smoke lifted the iron-clad monster was seen still careering on her way unharmed. When passing the Hartford she received another broadside which she did not condescend to notice. An eye-witness on board the Hartford writes:

"A shot took effect in the boiler of the ram Lancaster, of Commodore Davis's fleet, and several persons were killed and wounded. It is not certain whether this shot came from one of our guns or from the Arkansas, as the vessels were much crowded and in no position for such an encounter. As the Arkansas got past the Hartford she fired two rifle-shots which passed harmlessly over our heads. The Benton had got under way by this time, and started out to meet her; but she did not seem to like the looks of her antagonist, and steamed rapidly down the river, firing her guns at intervals. The Benton followed her under the guns of the batteries on the bluffs, which opened on her, and she retired, leaving the Arkansas to run down to Vicksburg."

The Arkansas, which thus boldly ran through our whole fleet, was truly a formidable vessel. Her armored sides were at an angle of forty-five degrees, not running to a point like the Merrimac, but flat on the top with a single smoke-stack protruding. She was armed with heavy guns, and the thick iron plates which completely cased her sides seemed to resist nearly all the shots which were fired at her. The rebel general Van Dorn, in his official report of the action, says:

"Our loss was ten men killed and fifteen wounded. Captain Brown, her commander and hero, was slightly wounded in the head. The smoke-stack of the Arkansas was riddled. Otherwise she is not materially damaged and can soon be repaired."

The Union fleet below Vicksburg consisted of the Brooklyn, Kennebec, and Jackson, with the mortar vessels and a large number of transports.* Great apprehensions were felt for the mortar fleet, as it had no means of resisting a foe so formidable. And it was greatly feared that the Arkansas, having destroyed or captured the mortar fleet, would rush down the river to New Orleans, and by the destruction of the few ships left in guard there, capture our small land-force, and restore the city again to rebel rule. Mr. W. B. Renshaw, who was commanding Division of Mortar Flotilla, reports that, as soon as he received information that the Arkansas was endeavoring to pass the fleet and would probably succeed, he signaled to the schooners to get under way immediately, and at the same time slipped the cable of his steamer, the Westfield, that he might render such assistance as should be required. These measures were hardly adopted ere the Arkansas was seen gliding along under the bank at Vicksburg, perfectly sheltered by the batteries. One can hardly imagine the shout of triumph with which her advent was greeted by the rebels.

One of the mortar schooners, the Sydney C. Jones, had unfortunately grounded, and was lying in a defenseless condition. It seemed necessary immediately to blow her up, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. The remaining schooners dropped down below the Brooklyn, behind whose broadsides they sought protection. This movement being successfully accomplished, Commander Renshaw steamed cautiously up the river to provide for blowing up the crippled boat, and to reconnoitre the position of the ram. Upon the way he met General Williams and his staff riding along the western bank. He hailed the General and inquired if he wished to embark his command.

* "The lower bombarding fleet, under command of Commodores Farragut and Porter, consisted of eighteen gun and mortar boats, five sloops of war, and seventy transports. The upper fleet consisted of eleven gun-boats and rams and thirteen transports, under command of Commodore Davis."—Pollard's Second Year of the War, p. 79.

Being answered in the negative, he requested General Williams to send some artillery officers on board the stranded schooner, that the boat might be so scientifically blown up as to throw the mortar into deep water. He then approached within hailing distance of the schooner, and gave orders that all preparations should be made for blowing her up, but that the torch must not be applied until the signal was given, or the Arkansas was seen actually coming down.

The scene at this moment presented to the eye was one of wonderful beauty; the broad majestic flood of the Mississippi, smooth as a mirror, gliding silently beneath the rays of a July sun to its goal in the Gulf; the steamer Westfield, with Commander Renshaw upon the deck, breasting the current as he hailed the party on the shore; the brilliant cavalcade of General Williams and his staff on the levee; the rank and gloomy forest rising from the almost boundless and impenetrable swamp in the rear; up the river the spires of Vicksburg, the batteries belching forth their tremendous discharges; the Arkansas running to seek the protection of their guns; the pursuing fleet pelting the foe with shot and shell, while arrested in the chase by the batteries; the billowy volumes of smoke; the stranded mortar-schooner, and a short distance down the river the majestic Brooklyn, with the mortar-schooners huddled in her rear for protection—all this, with the accompanying thunder-peals from innumerable cannon of the heaviest calibre, must have presented a scene which it would have tasked the energies of a Horace Vernet to transfer to canvas.

Commander Renshaw then proceeded up the river somewhat further, and threw two rifle shots at the ram; then running below to communicate the result of his observations he received an order from Flag-Officer Farragut to bring his mortars immediately into position to bombard the rebel batteries, as Farragut was coming down with his fleet to attempt to destroy the ram. Commander Porter had gone down the river with most of the steamers of the flotilla towing twelve of the mortar-schooners. The schooners were expeditiously brought into position, but while the movement was being made, through some unfortunate misunderstanding of orders, the torch was applied to the magazine of the S. C. Jones, and the vessel was blown in fragments into the air.

At half past three o'clock in the afternoon Commander Renshaw had all his mortar-boats in position to open their fire. In consequence of the absence of so many of the steamers it took some time to tow the schooners to their appointed stations along the western banks of the river. The Vicksburg batteries immediately opened upon them a brisk cannonade. Three of the schooners were in position at half past one o'clock. The roar of battle was now opened in good earnest. The schooners were at a distance of about 4000 yards from the batteries.* General Williams brought up a field battery on the western banks opposite Vicksburg, and took efficient part in the fray. With a smothering storm of 8-inch grape a swarm of rebel riflemen on the Vicksburg side, who were concealed in the woods, annoying the mortars with their unerring aim, were speedily dispersed.

Hour after hour this thundering bombardment was continued. The firing from the mortars was rapid and accurate. The enormous shells could be seen falling within the batteries, perceptibly diminishing the regularity of their fire. In reference to this conflict Commander Renshaw says, in his Report :

"To the Report of Lieutenant-Commanding Breese, commanding the Second Division of mortar-schooners, I have the honor to refer you for particulars of the mortar practice and conduct of their officers and men. The services of this officer, I am aware, have already been brought to your notice by the very able and gallant commander of the flotilla, Captain Porter. And I have only to add the expression of my very high appreciation of his official ability and gallantry, and my thanks for his zealous assistance during this anxious day—anxious from the fact that, from the hour of half past one until nearly eight in the evening, the mortar-schooners were lying in position comparatively unprotected, within two and a half miles of this ram, which had successfully run the blockade of our fleets, not knowing at what moment her repairs might be completed and she again ready for action."

About half past seven o'clock in the evening the mortar-boats were signaled that the gun-boat fleet was getting under way to run the gauntlet of the batteries. This was the signal for them all to open fire with redoubled rapidity. Flag-Officer Farragut was attempting the passage of the batteries with his New Orleans fleet, having the double purpose in view of joining his squadron below, and hoping also to destroy the rebel ram in passing. The fleet accomplished its wonderful achievement of running, with but little loss, those formidable batteries frowning along the bluffs for a distance of three miles. This was attributed to the rapid and well-directed fire from the ships, which often drove the rebels from their guns. In the deepening twilight the tempest of war, with its flash and thunder-peal and crashing bolts, raged with all the fury with which human passion could inspire it.

The designs against the Arkansas, however, proved a failure. She was so concealed under the shore, and so protected by heavy batteries, that she could not be reached in the darkness.

The chagrin which the career of the Arkansas caused the officers of the fleet, as well as the country at large, may be inferred from the following Report of Flag-Officer Farragut :

"It is with deep mortification that I announce to the Department that, notwithstanding my prediction to the contrary, the iron-clad ram Arkansas has at length made her appearance and taken us all by surprise. We had heard that she was up at Liverpool, in the Yazoo River, and Lieutenant-Colonel Ellet informed me that the river was too narrow for our gun-boats to turn, and was also shallow in places, but suggested that Flag-Officer Davis might send up some of his iron-clad boats, which draw only six or seven feet of water.

"When this was proposed to Flag-Officer Davis he consented immediately, and General Williams offered to send up a few sharp-shooters. The next morning they went off at daylight, and by six in the morning we heard firing up the river, but supposed it to be the gun-boats firing at the flying artillery said to be lining the river. In a short time, however, the gun-boats appeared and the ram in pursuit. Although we were all lying with low fires, none of us had steam or could get it up in time to pursue her; but she took the broadside of the whole fleet. It was a bold thing, and she was only saved by our feeling of security. She was very much injured, and was only able to drift down at the lowest speed—say one knot—and with the current she got down to the forts at Vicksburg before any of us had steam up.

"I had a consultation with Flag-Officer Davis, and we thought it best to take the evening, when he dropped down to take the fire of the upper battery, and my squadron passed down with the determination of destroying the ram if possible. But by delays of getting in position, etc., it was so dark by the time we reached the town that nothing could be seen except the flashes of the guns, so that, to my great mortification, I was obliged to go down and anchor with the rest of my fleet, to protect the transports, mortar-boats, etc.

"The ram is now repairing damages, for we put many holes through her, though we do not know the extent of damage done to her. Be assured, Sir, however, that I shall leave no stone unturned to destroy her."

It was quite evident that the Arkansas had received pretty severe handling from the fleet, as day after day passed and she did not venture from her moorings beneath the guns of the shore batteries. On the morning of the 22d another attempt was made to destroy the rebel ram. Flag-Officer Davis, about daylight in the morning, attacked with great vehemence the upper batteries with the gun-boats Benton, Cincinnati, and Louisville. Under cover of this fire the Essex and the Queen of the West rushed down the river at their utmost speed, to plunge upon the Arkansas, to endeavor to crush in her sides. The rebel ram was at her place at the levee under the batteries. The Queen of the West struck the Arkansas with sufficient force to do her some injury, but did not succeed in disabling her. The Essex delivered several very effective shots into the ram, but in endeavoring to strike only grazed her side, and ran with great force upon the bank. Here, for ten minutes, until she could be got off, the Essex was exposed to a terrible fire from the shore battery.

The sickly season had now come. The most vigorous men wilted and broke down under the unintermitted and exhausting heat of that pestilential region. Men who were apparently well one day would sink away and die before the close of the next. Of one hundred and thirty men of the mortar fleet one hundred and six were sick and off duty. The crews of the gun-boats were, many of them, reduced to one-half their number. Six hundred men were needed immediately to secure the efficiency of the flotilla.

The rebels suffered even more severely than the patriots. Out of from eighteen to twenty thousand men on his rolls, he could scarcely muster five thousand in his ranks. They suffered far more severely than our men from want of suitable hospital accommodations, medicines, and food.

As it was manifest that the shore batteries could not be carried without the assistance of a far more powerful land-force than we then had, it was judged expedient to abandon the enterprise for the present. Flag-Officer Farragut was therefore instructed to drop down the river with his fleet to New Orleans, while the nation gathered its strength to strike the rebels on the bluffs at Vicksburg an effectual blow. Commander Porter was left below Vicksburg, with the Essex and the Sumter, to watch the movements of the enemy.

On the 28th of July Flag-Officer Farragut returned to New Orleans with most of his fleet. The Katahdin and Kineo were left at Baton Rouge with a small land-force. On the 5th of August a rebel force of ten regiments, under command of General J. C. Breckinridge, made a vigorous assault upon the small force stationed at Baton Rouge. One of the most severely contested battles of the war ensued, in which General Williams was killed by a rifle-ball through the chest. About two o'clock in the afternoon of the 4th some friendly negroes brought the intelligence to the camp that the enemy was approaching. All possible arrangements were made for the menaced attack.

At half past three o'clock the next morning the reveille was beaten, and our little army marched about a mile out of town to meet the foe. The enemy, however, appeared in such force that, after very severe fighting, we were compelled to fall back. Our troops experienced much annoyance from facing the blaze of the rising sun. But in defiance of every difficulty they manfully bore the shock of overwhelming numbers. The Sixth Michigan, with Nims's battery on the right, and the Fourteenth Maine, with Manning's battery on the left, won great renown. They were exposed for some time, in the open field, to the swarming foe who assailed them from the woods. The Thirtieth Massachusetts was sent to the aid of the hotly-pressed Michigan troops, but before they were in position the rebels were driven back. At the same time the Ninth Connecticut and the Fourth Wisconsin, which had been held in reserve, were ordered to advance to the aid of the left wing, but as they were rushing upon the field the foe sullenly retired.

During the fight a portion of the enemy broke into the camp of the Twenty-first Indiana and burned it. But the despoiled regiment took fearful revenge, in pouring into their disordered ranks a volley of balls, which strewed the ground with the wounded, and caused the survivors precipitately to retreat. The rebels also forced an entrance into the camp of the Twentieth Maine, where they encountered a similar fate. The Twenty-first Indiana fought:

DEATH OF GENERAL WILLIAMS.

with such desperation of courage that it is said one of the rebel Generals, whose fortune it was to encounter them, remarked:

"But for those accursed Indians we should have taken Baton Rouge!"

The gun-boats Essex, Sumter, Kineo, and Katahdin took glorious part in this conflict. The two former were placed in position to protect our left. They opened fire into the woods through which the foe was swarming, and with their screaming shells shattered the forest and scattered a storm of iron hail around the assailants. Signal-Officer Davis, of the Kineo, took a position on the tower of the State House, where he had an excellent view of the field of battle, enabling him to signal the gun-boats where to throw their shells. These death-dealing missiles, hurled from the 11-inch guns of the boats, constrained the rebels to keep at a respectful distance. It is said that one shell from the Kineo killed from forty to sixty of the rebels.

When near the close of the engagement, Lieutenant-Colonel Keith, of the Twenty-first Indiana, was taken from the field severely wounded. Colonel Cahill says in his report that no words of his can do him justice. He adds:

"He was every where, in every place, working his men through tents, trees, and under-brush like a veteran; and when seriously wounded and taken from the field he would not give up, but moved around among his officers and men, counseling and assisting in every thing, to the injury and irritation of his wounds. Colonel Roberts, of the Seventh Vermont, fell mortally wounded, and has since died.

"Colonel Nickerson, of the Fourteenth Maine, had his horse shot from under him by a discharge of grape. He sprang from under his dying steed, and waving his sword called upon his men for one more charge. The men sprang forward with three roaring cheers, and drove back the advancing foe."

But we have no space to record the individual acts of heroism. It was near the close of the battle when General Williams fell, mortally wounded. He had just said to the men of the Twenty-first Indiana, as their gallant Colonel was borne wounded from the field, leaving the regiment in command of Captain Grimsley: "Boys, your field-officers are all gone. I will lead you!" The men responded with three cheers. Just at that moment the fatal bullet pierced the bosom of the General and he fell. It is not too much to say, in the words of Colonel Cahill:

"That more undaunted bravery, coolness, and skill has not been displayed in any battle-field than on that of Baton Rouge, and that too by officers who never before handled troops in a fight."

As the discomfited rebels retired the gunboats continued pitching shells into the woods every half hour during the whole night. But the foe was far away on the rapid retreat. Our small land-force, weakened by sickness and exhausted by heat and fatigue, were not in a condition to pursue.

The Union force engaged numbered less than two thousand five hundred. The enemy had at least five thousand, with twelve or fourteen field-pieces and some cavalry. About thirty of their number were captured, and they left seventy wounded men upon the field.*

It was in the plan of attack by the rebels that while Breckinridge with his overpowering force fell impetuously upon our little garrison, the Arkansas was to crush and sink our gun-boats. Our boats were all ready to receive her, but the Arkansas did not make her appearance. It was therefore decided for the gun-boats to take a trip up the river to ascertain what had become of her. On turning a bend of the stream the monster ram was seen close to the bank, evidently disabled. Two rebel gun-boats, the Webb and the Music, were hovering around her. Prudently they retired as soon as our little fleet hove in sight. The Essex led, followed by the Sumter, the Kineo, and the Katahdin.

* Colonel T. W. Cahill's Report. Lieutenant G. Weitzel's Report states the rebel force at 6000, ours at 2000.

The Essex ran by her crippled antagonist, which could only bring one gun to bear upon her, and taking a position about five hundred yards distant, opened upon the ram with three guns charged with solid shot. One of these balls struck the bow of the Arkansas, and though it produced a deep indentation the ball was split in two by force of the concussion. The correspondent of the New York Herald, as quoted in Harper's Weekly, writes :

"Commander Porter then ordered the same gun to be loaded with an incendiary shell of his own invention, and without moving the gun to take a new aim the shell was fired, entering just where the solid shot had struck. Immediately a jet of flame was shooting up from the Arkansas, and in a short time the entire vessel was on fire. It is supposed that the condensed cotton, with which the Arkansas is packed, caught fire from the shell, and communicating thence to the wood-work, soon wrapped the monster in flames. After burning till all her upper-works were destroyed she swung off into the stream, where she blew up with a terrific explosion."

Soon after this, by the 23d of August, Baton Rouge was evacuated by the Union troops. But the exultant rebels on the river's banks found that the transient lull in the storm of war was only the prelude of a tempest which swept the Mississippi of every incumbrance, and restored the majestic stream to the undisputed possession of the nation.

CROCHET.

WHILE the sun, with parting glances,
On my zephyr web is beaming,
Will you listen to my dreaming?
Would you like to know my fancies.
Know what hidden meaning lies
In my spinster-like devotion
To the polished shaft, which flies
In and out with easy motion?
How old Walton loved his hook
He hath told us in his book;
If I prize my hook as well,
Sure I too my love may tell.

Now the thought of Izaak's angling
Bringeth to my mind the saying
That this crochet is but playing:
That we keep poor fishes dangling
With a wearisome delay,
From our line so soft and pretty.
We are anglers too, they say,
Cruel anglers, void of pity.
Yet we do not hide the hook,
Do not cast it in the brook;
If they snatch the fatal link
Are we guilty, do you think?

Now I call me Clotho, spinning
Some one's measure of existence.
With a hero's wise persistence,
Looking back to the beginning,
Never thinking of the end;
For 'tis not my task to sever,
Nor may I from fate defend,
When the parting comes forever.
Thus I spin the slender thread,
Tint it with a rosy red,
And, with lingering touch and slow,
Gently check its rapid flow.

But my dreams are shifting ever.
I am striving now to weave me,
From the thread which Clotho gave me,
Such a web of pure endeavor
As shall fold me evermore
In a robe of light and beauty,
When my busy life is o'er—
When I've finished all my duty.
But my thread is oh, so fine!
Smallest moments form the line,
And I weave 'mid anxious fears,
For I dread the fatal shears.

Here a knot is in the worsted.
See how carefully I hide it!
Just so carefully I tied it
When to future skill I trusted
For concealment of the knot.
That's the way with woman's sorrow,
Hidden pain is half forgot
In the bustle of the morrow.
Yet my web is no less fair
For the tangle hidden there,
And our lives seem joyous still,
Though they bury many an ill.

So, while twilight shades are falling,
Threads of fancy I am twining
With the rosy wool combining;
Heedless of the voices calling
From beyond the garden wall;
Till, at last, the steady motion
Knits up all my zephyr ball.
Here's the spring of my devotion—
This is why I love my hook
As the poet loves a book:
Thus its charms my cares beguile,
For I'm dreaming all the while.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

THE war for the Union is over. Our surviving veterans are once more among us, and the country tenders them its gratitude and homage. We meet them in all the highways and by-ways of life, bronzed of feature, and a little stiff and precise, perhaps, from the pursuit of arms; but there is that in the glance of their eye and firmness of tread that speaks of work well done, and the people welcome them to their hearths and homes as the crowned heroes of the age. Society, without distinction of clique or party, unites to do them honor. Doting mammas and blushing maidens smile upon them. Law and Physic invite them to their high walks; Trade and Commerce throw open their august portals and bid them enter. Even politicians forget their brawls, and cordially unite, as seldom before, on some soldier because strongest with the people, and, therefore, most "available" for candidacy. The scramble for "soldier" candidates between the two political parties, pending the elections of last fall, was most amusing to the on-looker; but it was also most instructive, because it showed the strong and decided drift of the popular current, which none detect more quickly or measure more accurately than our shrewd political managers.

And we hold this is right and fitting—eminently so, and in all respects. For it is but a just Reward of Merit. It is the Nation's silent but hearty Vote of Thanks. It is but our natural and inevitable hero-worship after great deeds done. It is only mankind's unconscious testimony to the high dignity and worth of bravery and pluck.

"—Men, who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain;"
these are the men whom mankind unite to reward and honor, and so may it ever be.

But while we all agree to honor and reward our living heroes, we must not forget that there are solemn duties we owe also to the dead. Both duties belong equally to true patriotism, and an enlightened civilization will surely regard one as but the complement of the other. It may be that death is an eternal sleep, and the grave the end of all things, as some "small philosophers" hold. But the instincts of humanity recoil from the doctrine, and with all right-thinking men care for the dead stands close to reverence for God.

Indeed, to respect and care for the dead is no modern sentiment. Such was the practice in the ruder ages and among the coarser civilizations, and in even the most materialistic times it keeps steady pace with all humaner developments. The same reverent idea prevails every where among mankind, and similar results appear ever to follow. The Indian of the plains elevates his dead upon a rude scaffold, with food and implements of the chase by his side, to keep his remains from desecration and equip him in advance for the Happy Hunting Grounds. The European does no more, when with more enlightened view he commits his friend to the earth—"Dust to dust, whence it came"—and erects a simple tablet, or costly mausoleum, in some village grave-yard, or urban cemetery, to commemorate his deeds and perpetuate his fame. They both follow out the same ideal, the best and highest in them, the truest and noblest thought of their natures; but the ignorance and savagery of barbarism appear in the one, in the other the touching beauties and refinements of a Christian civilization. Human history, indeed, concurs in this respect, though we do not know what it is that should every where induce such reverence and care for those who have gone from us and apparently are of no further account to us, unless it be that vague hope and "anxious longing for immortality" which all possess and none can satisfy, but which by this means we yet seek unconsciously to express and gratify. True, different nations in different ages have had different methods of embodying the sentiment, but all have sought the same reverent result. By some the dead were burned, and their ashes preserved in sacred urns. In India, and some other countries, this custom still prevails to some extent. And we have read somewhere of a Russian prince who, on the death of his wife, to whom he was very tenderly attached, submitted her body to some German chemists, who reduced it by scientific processes to so small a compass that he could wear it as a stone in an ordinary seal ring. But the usual custom, from time immemorial, has every where been to commit the dead to the bosom of mother earth. Hence we find burial-places and cemeteries established by law, and consecrated by religion, from the earliest ages. The word cemetery itself comes from the Greek, κοιμητήριον, meaning literally a "sleeping-place." In the German we have the corresponding words Friedhof, "Court of Peace," and Gottesacker, "God's Field." These all came to mean indifferently a place set apart and kept for the sepulture of the dead.

Among the Hebrews the first care on arriving at a new place was to select burial-grounds. Their cities usually had cemeteries outside of the walls. That of Jerusalem, it will be remembered, was in the Valley of Cedron. The Greeks, before they adopted the Phrygian custom of burning their dead, had what they called their "sleeping-field." At Athens the most common place of interment was near the road leading to the Peiræus, outside of the Ionian Gate, which on that account was also styled the Burial Gate. Those who had fallen in battle, however, were buried at the public expense, in the famous Ceramicus, the most beautiful suburb of Athens, which had been adorned with walks, and fountains, and columns, and whose groves were filled with altars and temples. At Rome, even after incremation became common, because of her crowded population, the Appian Way was lined for miles with costly sepulchres and finely chiseled urns. The same custom prevailed at Pompeii, as recent discoveries have satisfactorily developed. In Babylonia and Egypt there were immense burial-places, proportioned to the denseness of their ancient populations, as is well attested by the grand ruins and multitudinous mummies still to be found there.

In Europe many of the ancient churches have crypts beneath them, filled with the dead of other generations, and several of its great cities are literally honey-combed with vaults or catacombs, containing the bones of their former inhabitants. The three most finished and celebrated of modern European cemeteries are those of Pisa, Naples, and Paris. That of Pisa, called Campo Santo, is inconsiderable in size, being only 490 feet long by 170 wide; but it is surrounded by arcades of white marble, 60 feet high, and is most beautifully adorned by ancient Etruscan, Greek, and Roman bass-reliefs, and by superb paintings by the old Italian masters. In the centre is an extensive mound of earth, said to have been brought from Palestine during the Crusades, and formerly used as a burial-ground itself. This cemetery is the pantheon of the Pisans, and among its most famous monuments is the tomb of Algarotti, erected by Frederick the Great in 1764. That of Naples lies along the main road leading from the city, and consists of 365 great cells, one of which is opened every morning to receive the dead of that day. That of Paris, Père la Chaise, is a vast necropolis, northeast from the city, and contains the tombs of Abelard and Heloise, La Fontaine, Molière, Beaumarchais, Laplace, Cuvier, Arago, Marshal Ney, David, Sièyes, Barras, etc. Situated mostly on a hill, it commands a fine view of the city and surrounding country, and is adorned with column, pyramid, obelisk, and every variety of sculpture suitable to such a place. The cemeteries of Russia are mostly distant from the cities, and their chief adornment consists of the native pines.

In our own country we have many handsome rural cemeteries, chief among which are Mount Auburn, near Boston; Greenwood, near New York; Laurel Hill, near Philadelphia; and Bonaventure, near Savannah. All of these are of considerable extent, and abound with walks and shrubbery, the most of which are in good taste and of excellent design. They already contain many elegant and costly tombs, and year by year advance in beauty and refinement.

We have touched thus upon cemeteries in general, because we hold them to be indicative of the spirit and growth of the race. We commend them very heartily, in so far as they go, because the visible expression of civilized affection and well-meant, if not just, tributes to the loved and lost. But we have spoken of them thus at length especially, in order to affirm this thought, namely: that in but few, if any instances, that we can discover, after much research, had any age or any people, except Republican Athens, vouchsafed a cemetery to its fallen soldiery. Instances abound, indeed, of monuments and memorials to distinguished generals, from the Pyramids of Egypt and Pompey's Pillar to the latest statue of Washington and Wellington. Rome had her Temple of Janus, dedicated to War, with its doors closed but three times in seven hundred years, and her Campus Martius, where, by solemn vote of "the Senate and people of Rome," her great commanders were borne to their rest. France has her Hôtel des Invalides, consecrated to her surviving veterans, and with the Great Napoleon sleeping beneath its dome. England has her St. Paul's Cathedral and her Westminster Abbey (the latter now past its thousandth anniversary), with her Wellingtons, her Nelsons, and her Napiers, as well as her Pitts and her Palmerstons, reposing in their shade.

So, also, great battles and famous victories have been commemorated, from the plains of Marathon to the ridges of Waterloo, and from ancient Zama to modern Bunker Hill. But in all these instances, as a rule, the common soldier has been overlooked, as if too humble to be taken into account, or as if posterity were indifferent to his fate, no matter how bravely he fought and fell.* In truth, in former ages, and among other peoples, the private soldier seems generally to have been held as only so much food for powder or the sword, and a hasty pit or ditch to receive his remains, on the field where he fell, appears to have been all that he was entitled to.† This was, perhaps, natural enough with aristocratic and monarchical governments, such as have usually dominated in the past, because their logic contemplates and cares for only the so-called higher orders. But a Democratic republic like ours, based on the equality of the race, and affirming justice for all that knows or professes to know only excellence and worth wherever found, can not afford to pass by unheeded, however humble, those who have proven themselves by fierce and sturdy warfare in its behalf at once its best citizens and brave defenders. Then, also, it seems to us, there is something due to the voice and progress of the age. Things are not now as they have been. A new era has dawned, or is beginning to dawn. The world is getting to believe, however slowly, in the Fatherhood

* We except Athens again. She inscribed the names of all who fell at Marathon on the monument that she erected there, and, in general prescribed by law, that the obsequies of all her citizens who fell in battle should be performed at the public expense, and in the most honorable manner.

† We do not except England and France, even in the Crimea; for though the most of their dead there were decently interred, and chiefly together, yet we are not aware that either nation has done any thing as yet to preserve or adorn their resting-places. The same is true of France and Sardinia at Magenta and Solferino.

of God and the Brotherhood of Man. The day of narrowness and bigotry, of class and caste, seems passing away. There is, beyond dispute, a spirit abroad in the earth exciting to humane thought, rousing to generous endeavor, stimulating to philanthropic deeds, refining constitutions and laws, and seeking—indeed, ever and irresistibly—by all right methods, to broaden and elevate our common humanity.

Our Government, with all its multiplied burdens and cares, and though struggling for very existence, does not seem to have forgotten its duty in this regard in our late war, though, in common with other governments, it seems to have omitted it in all previous ones. Common burying-grounds, indeed, appear always to have been kept at the various posts and forts where our troops were stationed, and those who died thus in garrison have doubtless been well cared for; but those who fell in battle, whether in the Revolutionary struggle in the second contest with Great Britain, or in the Mexican and Indian wars, seem to have been hastily interred on the spot where they fell, and that was the last the nation knew or seemed to care for them. At all events we may safely affirm that nothing approaching to the dignity of national respect or national care appears ever to have been manifested afterward. This has struck us as fairly remarkable, all things considered; and we did not suppose that there had been such a total neglect of our national duty in this respect until we came to inquire into the facts for the purposes of this paper. But our record in this matter, as well as in so many others, promises soon materially to improve.

Early in the war, so long ago, indeed, as September, 1861, the Secretary of War, by a General Order*, directed accurate and permanent records to be kept of deceased soldiers and their places of burial. To this end the Quarter-Master General was ordered to print and place in every general and post hospital of the army blank books and forms, very minute and specific in their details, for the purpose of classifying and preserving such records. The Quarter-Master's Department was also charged with the further duty of providing proper means for a registered head-board to be secured at the head of each soldier's grave. To guard against the loss or destruction of mortuary records it was further ordered that copies should be transmitted as soon as possible to the Adjutant-General's office at Washington for file. The substance of this order was afterward embodied in the Revised Army Regulations,† and thus became a part of the permanent law of the army.

The Quarter-Master's Department had previously been charged with "the burial of officers and soldiers,‡ as a part of its general duty; but its instructions were far from specific, and its care about ended ordinarily with the smoke of the guns that were prescribed to be fired over their graves. These additional instructions, however, we rejoice to say, soon worked a radical reform. The surgeons in charge of regiments and hospitals soon began to exhibit a just pride in keeping and perfecting their melancholy records, and the result is, the mortuary history of our armies to-day is about as complete as could well be desired—far more so, indeed, than could reasonably be expected, if we consider the number and vastness of our campaigns, and the heavy lists of mortality invariably attendant on great military operations. Certain we are that it is far in advance of that of any other nation, in any previous war, ancient or modern.

The Secretary, in his Report for 1865, states the aggregate number of men credited on the several calls, and put into the service of the United States, in the army, navy, and marine corps, from April 15, 1861, to April 14, 1865, when drafting and recruiting ceased, as 2,776,553. Of course it will be remembered that this number does not represent actual men, but enlistments, of which many of our men made two or three. It is probable that the greatest number of men actually in the service at any one time was about May 1, 1865, when they amounted to 1,000,516.

In the same Report, p. 29, he gives the total number of colored troops enlisted into the service during the rebellion as 178,975. Of these, he says, "the loss during the war from all causes, except muster out, was 68,178;" that is, about thirty-eight per cent. It would not do, however, to take this heavy per-centage as a fair average for mortality among all our troops, because it includes desertions and discharges for sickness or other disability; and, also, because our white troops enlisted oftener under the different calls, were mostly longer in the service, and lost more by battle and desertion, and less by disease, than our colored troops. But if for these differences, which, on reflection, will appear very considerable, we allow say twenty-three per cent., this will still leave our aggregate losses during the war, from both battle and disease, at fifteen per cent. of all enlistments, say 400,000 men, which we do not believe will be found very far wrong. A careful examination of official reports, as far as published, and repeated conversations on the subject with those in the army who ought to know, as well as good opportunities of our own of judging in the premises, confirm us in this view.* This mournful number, though large,

* Since this article was written the Provost-Marshal General has reported "the deaths in battle, from wounds and from disease, in every regiment and company of every loyal State, from the beginning to the close of the war," at 280,739—officers and men. As this does not include losses in the regular army, nor losses of Union troops—white and colored—enlisted in the disloyal States, we do not think our estimate of 400,000 in excess, especially if you include those discharged for disability, many of whom subsequently died from diseases contracted while in the service.

is not so large, however, as the nation a year ago sorrowfully expected, nor nearly so large as our enemies both at home and abroad then gleefully proclaimed. And, large as it is, the Republic, calmer than a Spartan matron, not unwillingly made the sacrifice, rather than yield one jot or tittle to treason, and she would do it again, thank Heaven! yea, thrice over if need were. In the touching lines of one of our best war lyrics:

"Four hundred thousand men,
The brave, the good, the true,
In tangled wood, in mountain glen,
On battle-plain, in prison-pen,
Have died for me and you;
Four hundred thousand of the brave
Have made our ransomed land their grave
For me and you,
Good friends, for me and you."

Gallant, high-souled, manly fellows, they loved home and friends, parent, wife, child, domestic ease, and fireside comfort, not less than the best of us; yet they cheerfully forsook all, and marched Southward at the call of patriotism to fight and die—as God so willed—unmurmuringly, that the nation might live. There is not a Northern town or hamlet, scarcely a Northern family of spirit, that has not been called to mourn the loss of some favorite citizen or darling son. This generation at least will not forget our frequent funerals that for four years darkened with their woe almost half a continent, nor the dull roll of the platoon, that daily announced another Martyr for freedom laid to his rest. Oh, how grand and how glorious our roll of honor! There are Kearney, and Whipple, and Stevens, and M'Pherson, and Bayard, and Shaw, and the countless heroes of the ranks unknown to fame, but who each did his part well, and, falling, died none the less gloriously because carrying a musket or swinging a sabre instead of leading a division or commanding an army corps. If men after death are to be judged and honored according to the work they have done and the results they have achieved, then above all others should we take the memories of these men home to our hearts and lives, and embalm in the nation's remembrance forever and forever. The remains of many, indeed, have been recovered by friends and brought back from the South, and our communities with one accord have united in burying them with booming cannon and muffled drums and half-mast flags beneath our own loyal soil. Many on entering the service or marching into battle made each to the other a solemn vow, that if either fell the other would, if possible, send his body home for burial.

Comrades in arms and friends at home have no doubt done what they could in this respect, but the number thus brought back and interred among our Northern hills has necessarily been very small compared with the many thousands that fell throughout the South, and still lie buried there, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, and from the Ohio to the Gulf. The great majority we say, of necessity, still lie on the fields where they fell, or near the hospitals or prisons where they died, and their rude, hastily-constructed, and now neglected graves are fast being obliterated by the leveling forces of time and nature. In the edges of groves, in the fence corners, by the side of turnpikes and railroads, every where are scattered individual graves, while at locations of former hospitals, and on scores of battle-fields, they swell up into the hundreds and thousands. Where our men died in camps or on the march, their comrades usually found some means to mark their resting-places, such as a rough head-board, or, failing that, a whittled stick, with some rude inscription, indicating at least the name and rank of the person buried. In hospitals, as we have heretofore said, full and accurate records were kept of all that died, and the graves were numbered and named, with rank, company, regiment, etc., so as to render certain each man interred.

So, also, on battle-fields where we were victors, our regiments seem to have vied with each other in the attention given to the decent and respectful burial of their own dead; and the long rows of graves are almost invariably marked by stones and head-boards, however rude. There is something touching, indeed, and that speaks well for American human nature, in passing over our lines of campaign, and observing how anxious our brave fellows appear to have been to pay the last offices of respect to their fallen comrades as far as could be done. Disinterments made in various places show that so well has this been done, that at least eighty or ninety per cent. of our dead can readily be identified, if not more. Even where outward indications fail, it is often found that vials and bottles have been buried with the dead with papers inclosed, giving all needed information; and where these are wanting our army blue woolen clothing ordinarily distinguishes Union from Confederate dead, because of their cotton gray; and names, etc., can generally be gleaned from marks on clothing, belts, or cartridge-boxes, or from letters, diaries, memorandum books, Testaments, etc., something of which sort is usually found on the body of every soldier.

But on battle-fields which we lost, of course, as a general thing, the enemy cared little for our dead, except to get them out of the way and under ground with the least labor and as soon as possible. As a rule, when we triumphed, we religiously buried the Confederate dead, and in many instances, where time sufficed, we marked their graves as carefully as our own. On the battle-field at Corinth, near the foot of Fort Robinett, our men magnanimously interred a Confederate officer who fell fighting gallantly at the head of his command, and out of admiration for his conduct erected a rude head-board over his grave with the generous inscription, "Col. Wm. Rogers, 2d Texas Infantry, said to be the Bravest of the Brave."

Here was true chivalry worthy of the Black Prince or Richard Cœur de Lion, and the best days of Agincourt and Cressy.* But the Confederates undoubtedly were less particular in this respect than we.

Those of our men who died in Confederate prisons seem as a rule to have fared much better. Though tortured and tormented with cold and hunger, disease and vermin, while living, when dead they were turned over by their keepers to burial-parties of their own comrades, who gave them the most decent and respectful interment they could, and kept accurate records of the same in all instances where allowed to. Even at Andersonville the last privilege to the dead was permitted; for which let history award such credit as is due.

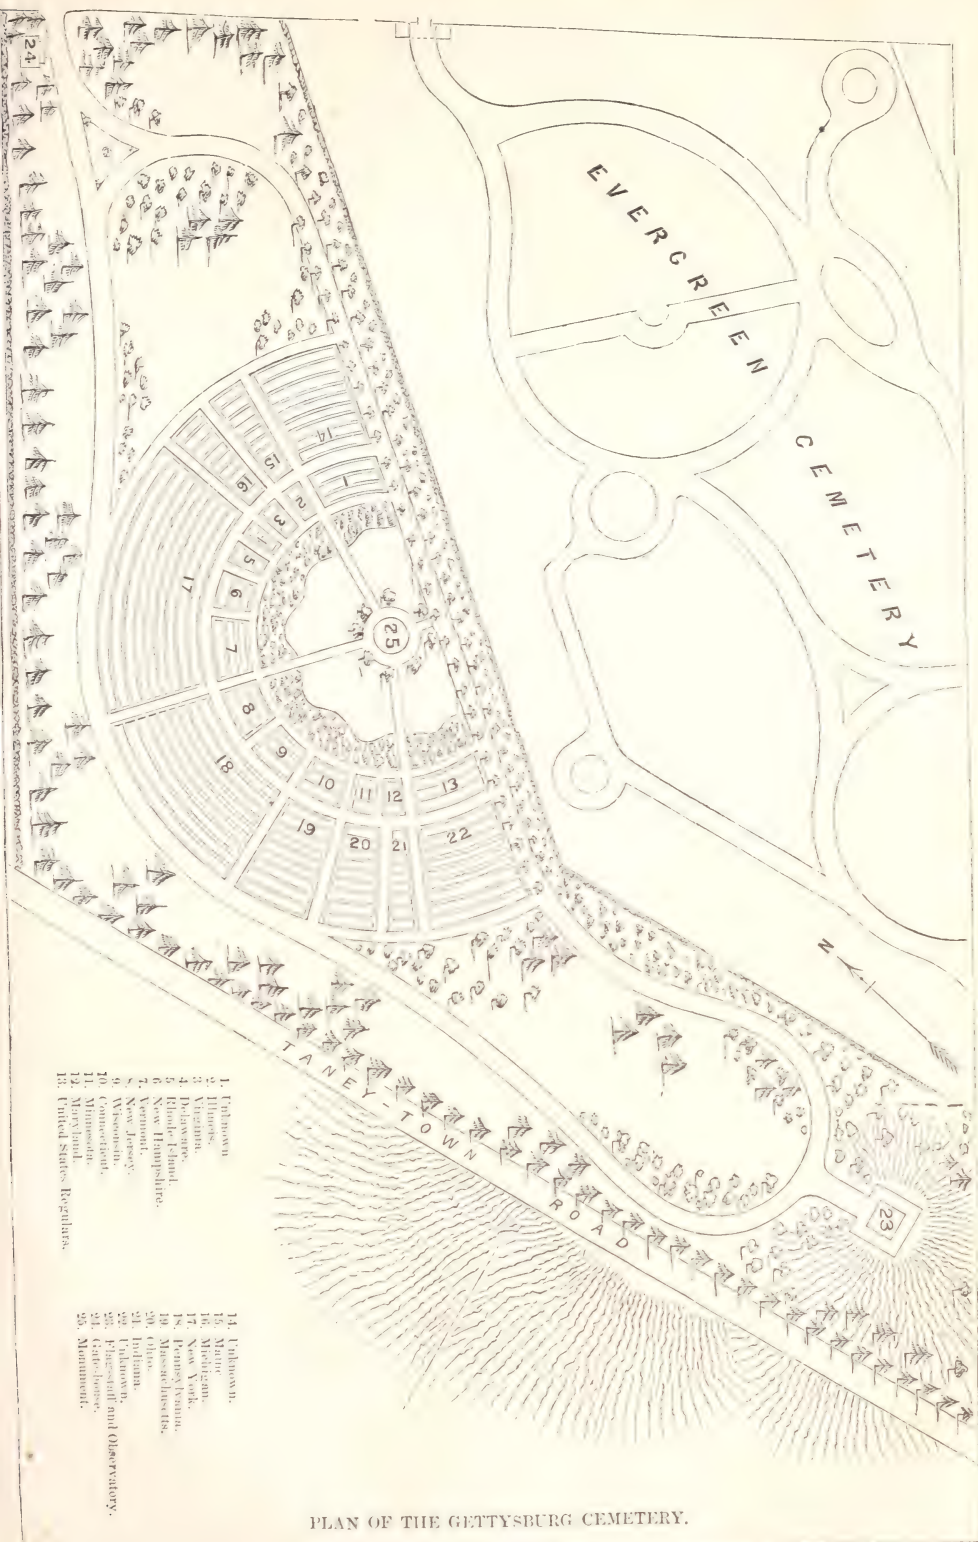

These remarks now conduct us naturally to the question, What shall be done with these fallen heroes, the nation's martyrs, the republic's slain? Shall we permit their honored graves, holding the best ashes of the land and proudest of the century, to be left liable to desecration by hostile hands, or to be obliterated quickly by time and nature, as among other nations and in other ages? Or rather shall we not at once gather their remains tenderly together into great national cemeteries, few in number but centrally located; beautify and adorn these in a moderate but just way, and solemnly commit them to posterity as a part of the precious price our generation paid for the Union, to be the republic's legacy and the nation's inheritance for evermore? We are glad to find that Congress has already anticipated this question, at least in part, and for what it has done we say, most heartily, hail and thanks. By act approved July 17, 1862, section 18, it was enacted, "That the President of the United States shall have power, whenever in his opinion it shall be expedient, to purchase cemetery grounds, and cause them to be securely inclosed, to be used as a national cemetery for the soldiers who shall die in the service of the country."† We are not aware what action has been had under this law as yet, if any, though surely there has been none worthy of the subject, and a lawyer-like mind might construe it, we suppose, as authorizing the establishment of only one cemetery. If this be so, we submit all loyal and patriotic hearts will agree (and none others have a right to speak in this matter) that Congress should at once give us additional legislation, and call on the President, respectfully but earnestly, "to go forward" with this great and humane national undertaking, before the lapse of time and the obliteration of the graves render it too late.

* Says Napoleon, in his Life of Caesar, vol. i., p. 162, in speaking of the proudest period of Roman history—"It was an age when all noble sentiments were raised to such a point as even to do justice to an enemy. The consul, L. Cornelius, gave magnificent funeral rites to Hanno, a Carthaginian general, who had died valiantly in fighting against him." Across two thousand years we strike hands with Rome!

The Country and the Army have already shown their deep and abiding interest in the premises by what has been done voluntarily at Gettysburg and elsewhere. In the absence of any national action, immediately after the battle of Gettysburg, Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, "took the responsibility" of purchasing some seventeen acres of ground, embracing the centre of our line of battle there, and proceeded to disinter and re-bury there the bodies of all our soldiers who fell in that memorable struggle. They were found to belong to eighteen States, including Pennsylvania, and the Governors of those States were invited to participate in the purchase and assist in the further work of reintering the slain and beautifying the grounds. Of course they all readily assented, and those eighteen States are now joint stock-holders of the cemetery there, in the ratio of their representation in Congress. We give herewith a plan of the cemetery there, which, as we have said, embraces about seventeen acres. It is inclosed on three sides by a substantial stone-wall, surmounted with heavy dressed capping-stone, and on the fourth side by an iron fence, that divides it from the old local or town cemetery at Gettysburg. The grounds have been simply graded and tolerably planted with shrubbery and trees, and roads and walks have been introduced, so as to combine utility, as far as possible, with pleasing landscape effects, at the same time having reference to economy both in the present and the future. As will be seen by the plan, the interments are arranged in a semicircular form, the ground appropriated to each State being, as it were, a part of a common centre. The position of each lot, and indeed of each interment, is by this means relatively of equal importance, the only difference being that of extent, which, of course, had to be determined by the number of interments belonging to each State. The coffins are deposited side by side in parallel trenches, a space of twelve feet being allowed to each parallel, of which about five feet are reserved for a walk between each row of interments. At the heads of the graves are granite head-stones, all precisely alike, bearing the name, company, and regiment of the man interred, each rising nine inches above the ground, and showing a face or width of ten inches on its upper surface. A main roadway, or drive, courses round the grounds, and in the centre of the semicircle it is proposed to erect a simple, unostentatious monument, some sixty feet high, twenty-five feet square at the base, and crowned with a colossal statue representing the Genius of Liberty. Into this cemetery have been collected all of the Union dead that fell at Gettysburg that have not been claimed by friends and removed elsewhere for burial, and the total number of interments now foot up 3512.

All this, it will be observed, has been done by the States themselves represented there, the only contribution made by the National Government being a supply of rough deal coffins, through the Quarter-Master's Department, by direction of the Secretary of War, on application, when the reinterments began. All honor to these States, we say; and their surviving soldiers, we are sure, with bent heads and grateful hearts, will respond, Amen. This cemetery, however, we must say, is in no true sense a "National Cemetery," because established and now supported by certain of the States themselves. It is unfortunate, we think, that the distinction of States should have been kept up there so carefully. Gettysburg was fought by the nation, for the nation, to save the nation. It should have been the work of the nation to consecrate its precious soil to freedom and the fallen now and forever.

We believe some preliminary action has also been had with reference to the establishment of a cemetery at Antietam, but we are not sufficiently advised of the facts to speak of them at length. The facts, however, appear to be, briefly, about as follows: Some time in 1865, we think during the spring, Maryland made an appropriation to purchase and inclose certain grounds, embracing a part of the battle-field at Antietam, to be held hereafter as a national cemetery, and we believe she has since invited the other States that lost troops at Antietam to join with her in removing the dead of Antietam thither, and in grading and somewhat ornamenting the grounds. This, it will be seen, if carried on to completion, will give us only a duplicate of Gettysburg, and we object to it because it involves only State action, not National, as the subject deserves.

Just here we would say a word about the dead of the Sixth Massachusetts that fell in the streets of Baltimore on the famous 19th of April, 1861. They were all, we believe, of humble, if not obscure origin; but Massachusetts, true to her high professions and great traditions, promptly secured their remains and bore them home to Lowell for interment, where they were awarded a public funeral and given an appropriate monument at the expense of the Commonwealth. Nor did Maryland fail in her duty toward them, after the first wave of treason was past. As soon as a loyal Legislature was convened she communicated to Massachusetts her desire to redress the wrongs of the 19th of April as far as possible, and as evidence of her sincerity proffered annuities in perpetual support of the families and widowed mothers of those who, in her hour of madness, had been so traitorously slain.

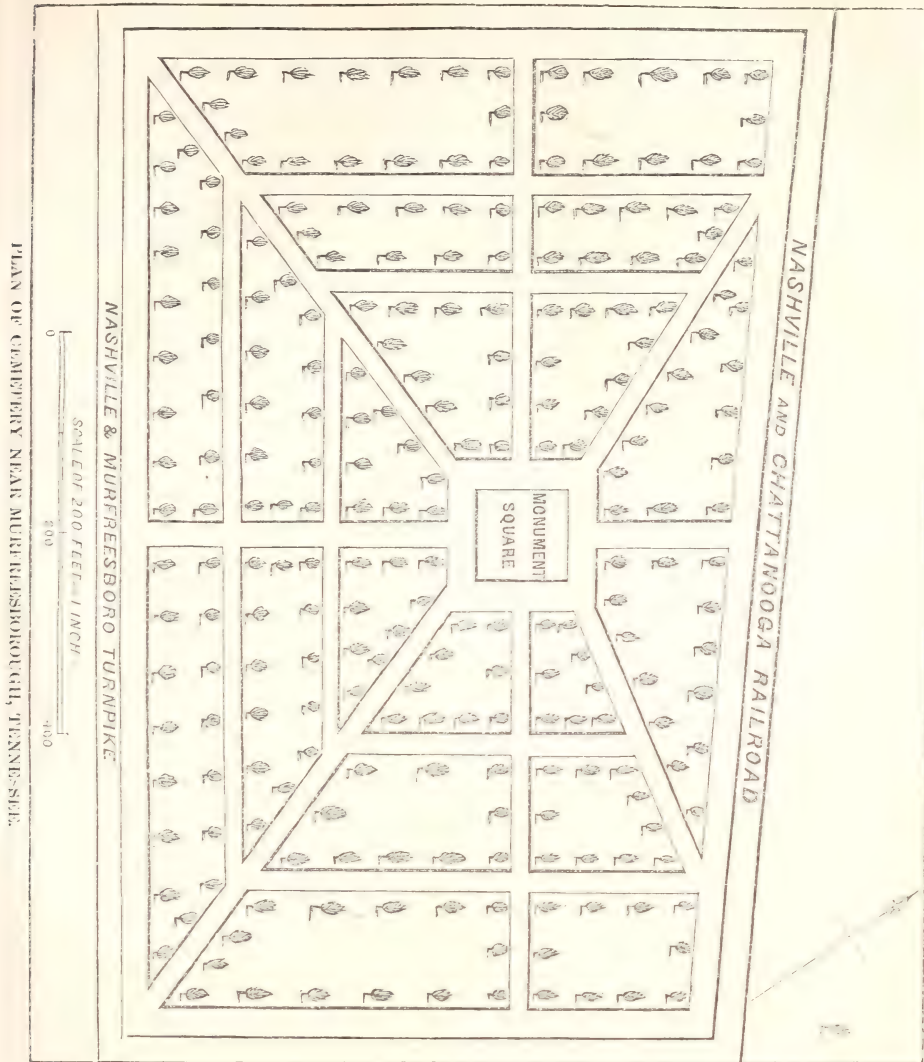

So much for what the Country has done. The Army, it will be found, has not waited in the matter, but, on the contrary, has proceeded to prompt action of its own wherever time and opportunity have offered. In the East our troops in the Department of Washington, in the summer of 1865, when having but little to do, collected together many of our dead from the battle-field of Bull Run, and erected over them a plain but substantial monument, to mark the spot, at least, until something better could be done. Another monument, erected at the same period, marks the scene of the battle of Groveton, or Manassas, fought near the same place, August 29 and 30, 1862. The materials were derived from the vicinity, and consisted only of common stone, arranged suitably for the purpose.

We are not aware of any further action by the army in the East; but in the West our troops have begun, and pretty well finished, two great cemeteries that are worthy of the subject. The first one we refer to is that near Murfreesborough, Tennessee, on the battle-ground of Stone River. It is about four miles west of Murfreesborough, with the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad on one side of it, and the Nashville Pike on the other. It is of a rectangular form, and comprises about sixteen acres in all. The grounds were selected by General Thomas, and the work has been carried forward chiefly by his direction, though the troops have ordinarily vied with each other in the work to be done. Sufficient walks and roads have been laid out and graveled, trees and shrubbery have been introduced, and a plain but substantial stone-wall, some four feet and a half high by two feet thick, is well under way to inclose the whole. The graves are arranged in lines, parallel to the railroad, without regard to States, though those of the same regiment are kept together as much as possible. The plot in the centre is reserved for a suitable monument, to be hereafter determined on. A space nine feet by four feet is allotted to each grave, which will afford room, it is estimated, for some eight thousand interments, should so many become necessary. About one thousand five hundred bodies have already been disinterred from where they were scattered over the battle-field, and reinterred here, which is supposed to comprise all who fell there that have not been taken North.

It is proposed to make this cemetery the general burying-ground of our dead in all that section, and with this view bodies are being removed to it from hospital-grounds at Murfreesborough, Tullahoma, Decherd, Cowan, and other points along the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. These, it is supposed from records obtained, will swell the aggregate up to some seven or eight thousand graves, the capacity of present grounds. As the bodies are removed to the cemetery the graves are all numbered and recorded on a plan kept for that purpose; and neat head-boards of hard wood, with inscription containing name, rank, company, and regiment, are placed at each grave. It may not be amiss to add that the work is now being carried on chiefly by colored troops, though few of that class have fallen or died in that vicinity. Steps have already been taken to secure the monument referred to, but we deem them in the wrong direction, and trust they will all fail.

The estimated cost of the proposed monument is some twelve thousand dollars; of this amount it is said that the four regular regiments present at Stone River have already pledged themselves for five thousand dollars, and for the balance it is proposed to appeal to the States that had troops engaged there. In the name of the Union, for which their comrades fought and fell at Stone River, we protest against these regulars paying one cent for this purpose, and against the States contributing a dollar. They have both given their bravest and best blood there for the Union, in the face of all mankind. Now let the Union, saved by them, do its part, by simply but fitly commemorating their deeds, or stand disgraced to the end of history.

In this connection we must not omit to mention a small but neat cemetery some two miles west of Murfreesborough, founded by the soldiers of Hazen's Brigade. This was done by them soon after the battle of Stone River, and before the idea of a general cemetery there seems to have occurred. As it is already so complete of itself, indeed a model in its way, we think it should be retained as it is. It consists of a small lot of ground, one hundred feet long by forty feet wide, inclosed by a substantial wall of hewn stone, four feet high by two thick. Within are the graves of twenty-nine privates of the brigade, who fell at Stone River. Neat head-stones of cut limestone, bearing the name, rank, company, and regiment of these, are placed at the head of each grave. In the centre is a simple but tasteful monument of hewn limestone, consisting of a pedestal ten feet square at base, and a quadrangular pyramidal shaft, with a height in all of eleven feet. The sides of this monument bear the following chaste and most appropriate inscriptions:

South Face.

This work was all done by our common soldiers while the Army of the Cumberland was encamped in that vicinity, the materials being obtained from the country there. We think it reflects marked credit on all engaged in it, both officers and men.

The second one we refer to as established by the army, and the main one in the West, however, is near Chattanooga, Tennessee. It is located about a mile and a half southeast of Chattanooga, and perhaps a mile or so beyond the present line of fortifications there. It consists of about seventy-five acres of undulating land, rising by successive slopes to a very considerable hill near the centre. The whole of it is inclosed by a rough but substantial wall of limestone, laid up dry, about four feet high by two and a half thick, which it is proposed to crown eventually with a plain capstone, laid in mortar, so as to give stability to the whole.

The materials for this were of course obtained upon the spot.

The plan adopted contemplated a central area, with sections of different sizes grouped around this. These sections are no two alike, but depend for their form and size on the varying features of the ground. Twelve of these have already been laid out and partly filled up —ten for white and two for colored troops—and the grounds are large enough for quite as many more. In these sections the dead are interred in concentric layers or circles, with officers in the middle, and non-commissioned officers and privates spreading out to the circumference. The centre of each is still vacant, and it is proposed to establish there such minor monuments as may hereafter be determined on. These sections are now designated by letters of the alphabet, though it has been thought to name them after some of our great battle-fields or distinguished officers who have fallen in battle in this war.

In the central area or section, the most elevated part of the grounds, and overlooking the whole, it is proposed to erect a chief monument, or a temple, embodying the national ideas as affirmed and vindicated by the war.
Broad roads and paths, well graded and mostly macadamized, have been laid out, with much skill and taste, though the plan embraces many others not yet commenced. Shrubby and evergreens have also been introduced from Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge, and though considerable died last summer, yet enough remain to promise well for the future. A large amount of blasting and grading has been necessary to bring the hill into proper shape, but this is now mostly over.

The interments in this cemetery footed up over seven thousand in November, 1865, and fatigue parties were making additional ones daily, by transfer from battle-fields and hospitals adjacent to Chattanooga. They were mostly through, however, and had collected here the great majority of those who fell in battle from Bridgeport to Loudon, embracing the dead of Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, and all who expired in hospital at Chattanooga and about there. The interments are made without regard to States, as we think justly, though members of same regiments are kept together as far as practicable, on a good suggestion of a distinguished Major-General, as we learn, that "there had been quite enough of State Rights; that these soldiers had died fighting for the Union, against rebellious States, and now we had better mix them up and nationalize them a little." He thought our poor fellows would like that best, if they could have a voice in the matter, and we heartily concur in the opinion. The graves are all carefully named and numbered, and steps have been taken to prepare and keep a full military history of each soldier interred. Copies of this are to be sent to the Adjutant-Generals of the States from which the soldiers enlisted, so that corrections may be made if errors have occurred. Head-boards have been erected to a part of the graves; but it is designed to remove these, and to put up plain stones of Tennessee marble instead at the heads of all the graves, the materials for which are readily obtained but five or six miles away.

This cemetery was established in 1863, in pursuance of General Orders No. 296, Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, for the purpose of providing a place of interment for the dead at and about Chattanooga; and all the work so far done has been performed by our troops when encamped or stationed there. No State has contributed a dollar toward it so far, and we trust none will be asked to. It stands out a truly Union and national work as far as completed, simple but grand in its conception and execution; and General Thomas well deserves high praise and the united thanks of the army and the country for what has there been done so promptly and appropriately for our slain and dead soldiery.

In addition to these national cemeteries proper there are other quasi ones, but none, we believe, that merit any extended notice. We refer to those that have sprung up at Washington and elsewhere by the accumulation of interments chiefly from hospitals, and which have since been inclosed and partially cared for. In all of these cases, we believe, accurate mortuary records have been kept; but the grounds were originally selected more for convenience or from chance than aught else, and, as a rule, it was not until they had grown into vast grave-yards that they began to be inclosed and to take the name of cemeteries. All such are inclosed only by a common deal fence, and no proper regard has been had to method or to permanence as at Gettysburg, Murfreesborough, and Chattanooga. As examples of these we refer to the soldier cemeteries about Washington, including Arlington and Alexandria, that foot up in the aggregate over twenty-five thousand interments; to those at Nashville, that foot up over seventeen thousand; to those at and near Vicksburg, about ten thousand; to those at New Orleans, about the same; to those at Louisville, over nine thousand; to those at Memphis, about eight thousand; to those at St. Louis, about seven thousand; and those at New York, about four thousand. There must also be heavy interments at Cincinnati and elsewhere North, as well as at many other points South; but we are without sufficient data at this writing to speak intelligently of any more. The cemetery at the Soldiers' Home near Washington and that at Arlington are the best of this class; but neither of them approach to the dignity of a national cemetery in either design or execution. We think all who have visited them will concur in this opinion, at least substantially.

Much similar in character to the ones above-mentioned are those that have been established in the Wilderness and elsewhere by direction of the War Department. In the Wilderness are two, both inclosed by paling fence; one containing one hundred and eight graves, and the other five hundred and thirty-four. At Spottsylvania there are some seven hundred graves more. These are the dead of the Army of the Potomac, resulting from Grant's obstinate, determined fighting there in 1864; though some of those slain at Chancellorsville, under Hooker, in 1863, may also be included. In all of these instances the graves have been marked by simple white tablets of wood, containing the names and regiments of the men as far as ascertainable. Working parties were sent out from Washington by the Quarter-Master's Department for this purpose, and the usual practice seems to have been to select grounds where the dead lay thickest, and to collect in that locality, after inclosing it, all the dead found in the vicinity. The dead at Ball's Bluff, we believe, have been removed to Washington, or at least similarly cared for; but those at Fredericksburg, Williamsburg, Gaines's Mill, Cold Harbor, Seven Pines, the Seven Days' Fight, Petersburg, Five Forks, etc., still lie substantially where they fell, with such poor burial as our troops could then give them. So, also, those in the West, at Perryville, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Chickasaw Bluffs, Pea Ridge, Red River, Port Hudson, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, and other points; though in some of these cases the graves may have been roughly inclosed as at Memphis and elsewhere.

In this connection we must not forget the cemeteries at Salisbury and Andersonville. We are without positive data as to the one at Salisbury; but the cemetery at Andersonville consists of fifty acres, and contains twelve thousand nine hundred and twelve graves. On the collapse of the rebellion Captain James M. Moore of the Quarter-Master's Department was sent there with a force of men to inclose the grounds and erect head-boards. He found our own men had taken great pains in burying their dead, numbering the graves, and keeping a careful record of the names and numbers, as well as erecting rude head-boards as far as possible, so that he was able to identify twelve thousand four hundred and sixty-one out of those buried there. This, however, left four hundred and fifty-one poor fellows to be recorded forever as "Unknown," their names and very resting-places, as it were, blotted out of existence. We have been fortunate to obtain photographic views of that hell on earth when in full blast, that we think at a glance readily account for its terrible mortality. By way of specimen we give the "View from the Main Gate." We received this from an officer who escaped from Andersonville when a prisoner there in 1864, and he vouches for the liberal accuracy and fidelity to everyday experience in that living hell when he was imprisoned there. He says all the horrible accounts of cold and hunger, of dirt and filth, vermin and disease, outrage and cruelty at Andersonville, during the reign of Winder and Wirz there, are true, but only half the truth, because human language is incapable of expressing the whole, or the human mind of comprehending it—so fearful and hideous was the reality.

On a previous page we have spoken of the action of the War Department, early in the war, requiring a record to be kept of all who died. We have also spoken of the law, passed in 1862, authorizing the purchase of grounds for cemetery purposes. In addition to this we are glad to say there are indications that the Government is about moving further in the matter—though as yet apparently somewhat casting about as if uncertain of its policy. The Quarter-Master-General, by two General Orders (Nos. 40 and 65), late in 1865, called upon all officers of his Department for Special Reports of the location and condition of soldier grave-yards known to them, with recommendations as to the means necessary to preserve from desecration the remains of those interred there, having reference especially to the following points, to wit: (1.) location; (2.) condition, whether inclosed or not, whether with head-boards or other means of identification; (3.) place and condition of mortuary records and names of officers who have had charge of same; (4.) recommendations as to disposition to be made of the grave-yards, whether to be continued or removed to some permanent cemetery near the place. General Thomas's chief quarter-master, General Donaldson, acting, we suppose, on these orders of General Meigs, has issued a circular, calling on all who have served in the army at any time during the war, in the Military Division of the Tennessee, for information as to the places of burial or scattered graves of our soldiers in that region, and he goes a step farther than the Quarter-Master-General by intimating that the information is desired "with a view to the establishment of national cemeteries, and the removal to these of the dead, on the plan of those already in process of completion at Chattanooga and Stone River." We have found this circular in the papers, but judge it to be authentic, and sincerely hope General Thomas and his Quarter-Master are only a step in advance of what is meant by the Government at Washington.*

We go for closing up the war now, and ending it fitly and nobly. And with this view we submit that the nation, with a united voice, should call for these scattered dead of the Union army, whether white or black, to be disinterred from the places where they lie, and brought speedily together into great national cemeteries, where they may repose in peace and dignity beneath the ægis of the Republic while time endures. The cost need not be large; and should it be millions, no Congress that we are likely to have for some years to come would refuse it, if properly called on. Gettysburg, Murfreesborough, and Chattanooga are models in their way, because of their grandeur yet simplicity, or at least will be, when the nation has done its share of the work, by erecting plain but tasteful monuments there, as we have elsewhere indicated. So the cost of maintaining them will be small, as the troops might be charged with this duty in time of peace, and in time of war they could readily be provided for.

To get at this practically we would suggest that Gettysburg be retained where it is in the

* Since preparing the above, the Quarter-Master-General has announced that it is the intention of his Department, sooner or later, to inclose the cemeteries (i. e., the rude grave-yards or burial-places) of all Union soldiers, and of all prisoners of war, with plain but substantial fences, and to mark the graves with a suitable head-board, bearing name, company, regiment, and State of each man, so far as can be ascertained. He says, it is also his wish to publish a record of the names and places of interment of all soldiers who have perished in the service of the United States during the war." This is certainly very creditable to the Quarter-Master's Department, and the country will thank General Meigs for his just and humane views, so far as they go.

bosom of Pennsylvania, and that all the dead in Pennsylvania be concentrated there; that Antietam be pushed forward to completion in the heart of Maryland, and all the dead in Maryland concentrated there; that a great national cemetery be established at Washington, to include all the dead there and in that vicinity; those at Bull Run, Groveton, and Chantilly, those in the Valley of the Shenandoah, those at Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville, and all who fell under Grant, from the Wilderness to Cold Harbor—this to be the largest and grandest of all, as befits its location; that another be located at or near Richmond, to include all the dead who fell on the Peninsula under McClellan, and all of Grant's dead from Cold Harbor to Lee's surrender, together with all other dead in Virginia, not sent to Washington; another, at or near Wheeling in West Virginia, to include all the dead of that region; another at or near Bentonville, or Fort Fisher, to include all who fell in North Carolina; another at Charleston, to include all who fell in South Carolina, both white and colored; another at Atlanta, to include all who fell in Georgia; another at Mobile, to include all who fell in Alabama; another at New Orleans, Galveston, Vicksburg, Arkansas Post, or Fort de Russy, St. Louis, and Perryville, to include all who fell in Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kentucky respectively. Tennessee has been so great a battle-ground, and is so large a State, that she seems to require four. The two at Murfreesborough and Chattanooga, of course, ought not to be disturbed, and we trust never will be; the seventeen thousand dead at Nashville should have a cemetery of their own, to include the dead of Franklin, Fort Donelson, and other points adjacent, and Shiloh should be marked by a cemetery, to take in the dead at Fort Henry, Memphis, and all West Tennessee, except Fort Pillow, where we had almost forgotten to say the Secretary of War has already ordered a small cemetery in perpetual memory of the savage massacre there. Of course the dead from each place should be kept together in these cemeteries, as far as practicable, at least those from different battle-fields, for obvious reasons. This would give a national cemetery to every State affected by the war, on the field of our greatest victory or at place of most importance, to stand as a monument forever to the South, and to us all, of the crime and folly of Secession. We would establish and keep these, not from Northern glorification, nor as a taunt to "our wayward sisters" of the South; but as a just return, due our heroic dead, from the enlightened civilization of the age, and as a standing exhibition to the world of the might and majesty of the Union, the dignity and power of a free republic, the sentiment and culture of a self-governing people.

We esteem this the Nation's solemn duty, and would urge it from every consideration of patriotism and humanity. We owe it to patriotism. We owe it to humanity. We owe it to the intelligent progress we boast, and to the perfect freedom God has permitted us to save and enjoy. Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori is a good sentiment for soldiers to fight and die by. Let the American Government show, first of all modern nations, that it knows how to reciprocate that sentiment by tenderly collecting, and nobly caring for, the remains of those who in our greatest war have fought and died to rescue and perpetuate the liberties of us all. Let us emulate the lofty example of that other republic, Athens, in the best days of her supremacy, and thus rebuke forever the current calumny and slander about "the ingratitude of republics." We are sure the army would rejoice, through all its grades, to see this done, from the humblest private to the Lieutenant-General, and the people would approve, large-hearted, great-thoughted, as they always are, where the national name and fame are involved.

We acknowledge to have written this article con amore, and to have lingered upon it perhaps more than we should have done. Our excuse is, that we served with our armies, both in the East and in the West, throughout the war; are conversant with many of the fields and most of the facts we have mentioned; and we frankly confess to the instincts and feelings born of the march and fight, the bivouac and camp-fire. We do not know how we can better or more appropriately end it than by Mr. Lincoln's brief dedicatory address at Gettysburg in 1863, which, in the light of subsequent events, sounds more like inspiration or prophecy in this connection than the utterance of mere human lips:

"Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We are met to dedicate a portion of it as the final resting-place of those who here gave their lives that the nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here; but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work that they have thus far so nobly carried on. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that, from these honored dead, we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve, that the dead shall not have died in vain—that the nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom, and that the Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

MISS INGERSOLL'S PRIDE.

I.

WHEN John Ingersoll died, it was found that out of a great fortune and a great business there wasn't enough left to support his family. The great fortune had been entirely swallowed up in his mercantile enterprises, and though these were so large that the income must have been in proportion, still, there never seemed to have been a time when any thing was laid by. It was all "spend as you go" with John Ingersoll: and certainly this spending had been conducted in a very royal manner. There was never any stint of pleasure in his house or in his family. He never spoke a word of limitation to his wife or his daughters. Money seemed always easy with him, and it flowed like water; and he, the dispenser of it, was always, in externals at least, a genial, jovial gentleman. When he came to die, and it was discovered that the great business had used up the great fortune, and there was nothing behind, nothing to show for it now the great manager was gone—what conjecture and perplexity there was as to how those three girls and Mrs. Ingersoll were going to live! "What will they do?" was the question that rung through Avenue-dom late and early in the first excitement of the knowledge that had come to them.

"Kate can teach music!" said one. "She plays well, you know."

"Julia can turn governess, for she was the best scholar at Madame's the whole time!" said another.

And still another: "Em can paint pictures—she has a taste that way!"

So they were severally disposed of, over and again. But not one of these things did they do. People never do what is expected of them.

A gay little lady who was one of the Ingersolls' "dear five hundred" was the first to tell the story of their whereabouts in Avenue-dom. She came flying in to Mrs. Crœsus's boudoir with the exciting question, properly emphasized:

"What do you think has become of the Ingersolls, Mrs. Crœsus?"

"They've opened a girl's school! I told Mr. Crœsus it would be the very thing!" returned Mrs. Crœsus, triumphantly.

"Not they. Wait, you'll never guess. Mrs. Ingersoll has gone to Philadelphia to spend the winter with a sister of hers; Kate and Julia are with the Delanos—cousins, I believe, of theirs; and Em, after staying a week at Mrs. Vandervere's, has disappeared somewhere into the country, and the joke of it is, Kate and Ju won't tell where."

More in this strain the young lady rattled off, and then took herself and her gossip, perhaps, into another boudoir. And all the time those two proud girls, Kate and Ju, were learning their first lesson of bitterness, and speculating with new and keen pain upon this very kind of gossip.

"Oh, but I wish Em had staid at Mrs. Vandervere's!" sighed Julia.

It was the end of all her sighing—the burden of all her complaint. If Em had only staid at Mrs. Vandervere's. And why didn't Em stay at Mrs. Vandervere's? For this reason: she was too proud. Em was the eldest: Miss Ingersoll. Too proud, she called it, and the other girls thought it was a lack of this quality. In the first breaking-up Miss Ingersoll had accepted Mrs. Vandervere's invitation to spend a year with her, because there seemed nothing else to be done just then, and if there had been, her mind was too confused to make any plans. A year, and she only staid a month. But that month was longer than any year Emily Ingersoll had ever known. She had been there barely a week when she surprised her sisters one morning with the information that she "shouldn't stay at Mrs. Vandervere's any more."

"Not stay? what is the matter, and where are you going, Em?" asked all, in a breath of amazement.

"One thing at a time;" answered Miss Ingersoll, with a cool, impenetrable face. "I sha'n't stay because I am convinced that I was never made to eat the bread of dependence."

"Why, you don't mean that Mrs. Vandervere makes you feel that it is the bread of dependence—that she doesn't treat you well, and—"

"Makes me feel? Well, I don't know as any body does that. I think it is the circumstances. Mrs. Vandervere is kind, she treats me well: oh yes. But I don't like it. I am invited for a year; at the end of that time if I don't get married—which is Mrs. Vandervere's plan for me;" and here a gleam of some fiery spirit shone in the speaker's eyes: "why, I must depend upon another invitation elsewhere. My day of grace will be up with Mrs. Vandervere—and quite rightly; don't think I am complaining. There is no reason why Mrs. Vandervere should ask me for any longer: she is very kind to ask me for the time she has. I am simply mentioning the fact of limitation. I don't relish the prospect of living round—going from 'pillar to post,' as Mary Nelson used to; and as the marriage prospect, notwithstanding Mrs. Vandervere's hopes, is more than uncertain, I think I had better be looking about me; bestirring my wits, to employ them in an independent manner; which is, after all, what I always meant to do."

"Em, Mrs. Van don't plan openly to you of marrying you off?"

Em laughed. "Oh, she don't say, 'Emily, the only thing for you to do is to get married, and you've got a year to do it in.' She don't say, 'Now there is Tom Vars, who always admired you, and who has quite a snug fortune; and Mr. Sizar, who admires you still more, and has a still snugger fortune; and I'll invite them here to tea quietly, or to lunch some day when I'm out: and then we'll follow it up by various little arrangements of a like nature.' Oh no, she doesn't say this, but she does it. I go down to lunch some day, and I find Tom Vars's little, red, good-natured face beaming over the tablecloth. Mrs. Van has 'picked him up' on her way home from Stewart's. And another time, in the same place, sits Mr. Sizar, looking pale and interesting across his coffee-cup. She has 'picked him up' too. And then Tom has some sort of commission for her, and when he comes to the house Mrs. Van is engaged and can't see him, and will I go down? And Mr. Sizar calls to bring her a particular paper she wanted, and she is engaged again, and I am requested to go down and thank him for her. This is the way I am put up for sale. I think of Ethel Newcome and her little green ticket every day of my life. And yet Mrs. Van thinks she is doing her duty by me. In her estimation there is nothing left for me but a good match, and I suppose after all that that is the usual feeling as the world goes, toward reduced gentlefolk like us, Ju. But I 'don't see it,' as Jimmy Vandervere says."

As she concluded Kate and Julia eyed her with some alarm. Em had ever been a kind of perpetual surprise to them. She was unlike them. Not at all a proper young lady, who did as the rest of young ladydom did; but full of "notions" of her own, new ideas of right and wrong, and strange interests which they couldn't account for. She was what most persons call "queer," and another class "transcendental." It was no wonder then, that, after this outburst of hers, her sisters should regard her with some alarm. What was she going to do? And presently they asked her the question.

Emily Ingersoll looked them steadily in the face while she made this astounding reply:

"I am going to Meriden Centre to open a dress-maker's shop."

"Emily Ingersoll!"

"Of course, I knew you would dislike it; and so do I. But, girls, I know it is the one thing I can do."

"But, Emily, you can paint pictures beautifully."

"Yes, very pretty pictures; but I couldn't earn enough to keep me from starving painting those pretty pictures. I have only a taste for painting, and some talent—not a bit of genius: I found that out long ago. But for dress-making, that little French Arles used to say when I got into a hurry and helped her about my party-dresses, 'Mamselle, you have de one grand talent. If you was poor girl now, you could make your fortune.' Well, you see I am 'poor girl' now, and with my 'one grand talent' I am going to make my fortune."

The tears ran down Julia's cheeks, and Kate's aristocratic profile suddenly grew sharp and severe, as she said, hastily:

"Em, I think this is too bad of you. You, who might do something so much higher, to turn to an occupation that requires simply mechanical skill—what Ann Mahoney down stairs could do as well."

"I know, Kate, it is one of the common inferior occupations; but I am morally certain it is the only thing I can do to real pecuniary advantage."

"And to think of your going to Meriden Centre: such a high and mighty town. They are just like English people there, and they'll patronize and snub you unmercifully," Julia cried out through her tears.

"That's just why I selected it, because it is 'high and mighty.' I remember the summer we spent at Meriden Hill the Meridenites out-rivaled us all in the splendor of their attire. So I thought it was a fine field for my 'grand talent.'"

Much more of this kind of talk followed during the interval that elapsed before the flitting to Meriden; but though it pained deeply, it did not move Emily Ingersoll from her purpose. She was older than the others—twenty-six, though most persons couldn't believe it, she looked so young. And when, as a last suggestion, Julia half hinted that if she would remain in her own station she might perhaps better her condition without sacrifice of any sentiment, she answered, a little satirically:

"I'm twenty-six, Julia, and I have never yet found this Sir Launcelot you hint at, though I have been quite a queen of the revel for the last six of the years. It isn't very reasonable, then, to count upon his coming at this day, when I am not even one of the maids of honor, but only a kind of hanger-on at court. I've known girls spend the best of their lives in this waiting expectation; but I don't see what they did with their self-respect in the mean while."

Julia would sigh at these replies, and Kate would shrug her shoulders and comment severely upon Emily's transcendental notions. And all the visible effect this had was to hurry Emily off to Meriden Centre.

II.

Young Mrs. Chatam, riding down Main Street, at Meriden Centre, one morning suddenly caught the glitter of a new sign:

MISS INGERSOLL,
FASHIONABLE DRESS-MAKER.

Beneath this sign, in quite a large window, was a lay-figure, got up in veritable silk and thread lace in such an unique and artistic style that Mrs. Chatam became interested at once. Consequently she stopped for further observation. Consequently she turned her phaeton before the door, and alighting therefrom went into the new shop for closer inspection. She was full of curiosity and question. "Did Miss Ingersoll come from New York?" Miss Ingersoll did.

"And did she dress the model there? and was that a new pattern of sleeve and trimming?" All of which questions Miss Ingersoll's assistant answered affirmatively. Mrs. Chatam tapped her fingers meditatively upon the table, and from the charmingly dressed model her scrutinizing eyes went on a general survey. She was evidently not displeased with what she saw, for coming back from the survey she says: "Can I see Miss Ingersoll?"

The assistant disappears through an inner doorway, and presently reappears with Miss Ingersoll.

Mrs. Chatam, who has an eye to business, regards Miss Ingersoll with keen attention, and after two or three well-put questions, which were as well answered, she says, inwardly: "She'll do, I'm certain." Whereupon a negotiation was immediately entered into, and home drives the lady to communicate her "morning's luck" as she calls it. She bursts into Madame Chatam's room with:

"Mother Chatam, I've engaged your new dress-maker to make up my dresses."

Mother Chatam removes her spectacles.

"My new dress-maker; what do you mean, Louisa?"

Louisa laughs and relates her discovery.

"I knew she must have taste, if not skill and experience, when I found she got up that model; why, it was a regular fine lady in real silk and thread lace: and the loveliest trimming, perfectly novel and unique! Then I learned, by some questioning, that Madame Arles, of New York, is her reference, so I engaged her at once."

"That's just your hasty way, Louisa. Why didn't you wait until you heard about her work?"

Mrs. Louisa began to look uneasy, but she wasn't going to let "Mother Chatam" know it; so she said, valiantly, "Oh, I feel perfectly satisfied as she comes from Madame Arles, even if her fitting of the model wasn't just as charming as it could be!"

Mother Chatam resumed her spectacles with rather an incredulous air, and hoped in rather an incredulous tone that Mrs. Louisa wouldn't be disappointed. It was an awful wet blanket, this air and this tone, to little Mrs. Chatam. She would have given any thing just then if she had waited, as Mother Chatam had suggested. But it was too late now to retract. She had engaged Miss Ingersoll for the first of the week. And when the first of the week came, and she stood under the hands of this Miss Ingersoll, she fortified herself against any little misgiving by another admiring glance at the lay-figure arrayed so charmingly in real silk and lace.

That figure had been a trump card to Miss Ingersoll; but she never told any body that she took one of her old silk dresses, and improvised the trimming out of some lace that she had worn to perhaps a dozen balls, to get up this charming array. Yet such was the fact. There were a good many other facts too about which Miss Ingersoll did not find it necessary to speak. She told nobody at the time, not even kind, sympathizing little Madame Arles, who would have done 'most any thing for her, that she had spent nearly all of the small fund—that was her portion out of the great ruin—to start herself in her present occupation. And so, of course, she told nobody of the anxious fears that beset her by night and by day; nor of the tears that wet her pillow through many an hour of darkness. In the mean while her mother and sisters called her unfeeling, and thought her utterly devoid of pride.

I don't know what they would have said had they seen her with her employers there at Meriden Centre. She put on no haughty airs, nor was even a little cold and chilling, as perhaps might have seemed natural to a young lady so suddenly brought down in the world. Instead, to the farmers' daughters as well as to the gentry like Mrs. Chatam, she was alike pleasant and obliging in her demeanor, showing candidly that she wanted to please them. She might have taken a lesson of Madame Arles in this, for that shrewd Frenchwoman never grudged her finest manners to the poorest. Indeed, there must have been suggestion of this, or Mrs. Chatam would not have said to her mother-in-law after that second interview, that Miss Ingersoll's ways were continually reminding her of Madame Arles. To which the old lady grimly returned: "I hope her fitting will remind you."

Mrs. Louisa could make no answer here, and it was with a good deal of trepidation that she prepared to meet the final test on the night her dresses were sent home. Flying up to her room with a gay air of pleasant expectation which she did not feel, she proceeded to array herself. Madame Chatam down stairs picked up the bill she had dropped in her swift flight. Peering at it through her spectacles, she said, aloud: "The idea of a country dress-maker's charging these prices; and I'll warrant the gowns are ruined. Just Louisa's hasty way."

But presently Louisa stood before her with a—"Look, mother, look! what did I tell you?" Mrs. Chatam raised her eyes. Yes, she allowed that was very well—very well, indeed—for Mrs. Chatam mère was an honest-spoken woman, though a trifle given, as we have seen, to croak when there was the least chance.

"Yes, that is very well; but, Louisa, what do you think of this bill for a new country dress-maker, eh?"

Louisa, elate over her gowns, caught the slip of paper in a little, airy, indifferent manner, as if it wasn't of the remotest interest to her. Running her eye across it she tossed it back with the same manner, and a—"Well, that isn't too much, is it? nothing near what Arles charges, and just as perfect a fit. Tra, la la, la li la," and Mrs. Louisa was waltzing before the mirror to see the effect of her gown.

"Oh, Mother Chatam, I think it's a love of a fit, and when I go home to Boston, I verily believe I'll send down to this country dress-maker of yours whenever I need any thing."

"A good deal you will," Mother Chatam returned, in her short, incredulous tone.

"Well, I will; see if I don't, for I'm all out with Miss Mackenzie; she shall never set another stitch for me. If it hadn't been for that, I should have sent these very dresses to Boston for her to make."

Mother Chatam said nothing to this. Her mind was occupied with its little grumble about Miss Ingersoll's bill, and she forgot to remind giddy Mrs. Louisa that she'd very likely be all out with Miss Ingersoll before long.

Mother Chatam, notwithstanding her croaking and her grumbling, was very fond of her daughter-in-law, and probably Louisa was in some way sure of this, or she would not else have been so untouched by it. And then Louisa liked Mother Chatam. She couldn't have told you why, and she wouldn't have tried, but she liked her very much.

So all this external difference had nothing malicious in it; it was the sauce piquante at the Meriden Hill house. But if Mother Chatam relished an opportunity to croak and grumble, in her grim, half-humorous manner, at Louisa, Louisa no less relished an opportunity of triumphing over these croakings; what she gleefully called, "Making Mother Chatam own up that she was right." So she sung her dance-tune, and kept time to it before the glass, all the while thinking, "I've made her own up to the fit of my gowns, and the next thing I'll coax her into having Miss Ingersoll herself, instead of that frump of a Dorcas Brown!" And she actually did. Before the winter had set in down rolled the phaeton into Meriden Centre again, and stopping before Miss Ingersoll's, out got Mother Chatam and followed her daughter into Miss Ingersoll's presence.

And all this apparent accident of Louisa's giddy haste, and then Louisa's gay little triumph, was a great thing for the new dress-maker. The Chatams were some of the gentry of Meriden, and what they did persons of less importance were inclined to do after them. In less than six months, then, Emily Ingersoll found that she had a flourishing business before her, and instead of one assistant she had been obliged to employ sometimes three or four. And morning and night click, click went the busy hum of the sewing-machines. To her sisters and her mother Emily wrote in a playful, jesting way of her success. To Madame Arles she spoke out of a serious, grateful heart of what she had accomplished. The former sighed over her, and bewailed her spirit and her want of pride. The latter looked radiant as she read what "Mees Emilie" wrote, and said, softly: "I always told her she had grand talent that way."

III.

"It's of no use, Louisa, my trying to go down to Miss Ingersoll's; I can't move a step on that foot without pain. Why, just look at it." And Mother Chatam lifted her skirt from the disabled foot, reposing upon a brioche. Louisa opened her eyes with amaze:

"My goodness, mother, it's big as two! What a nasty thing rheumatism is!"

"Humph!" grunted Mother Chatam, in reproof of Louisa's English usage of the word

"nasty." But Louisa paid no heed. She was full of another subject, and she went on with it.

"But what will you do, mother; you must have that silk made up by Christmas? I ain't going to have you wear that old dowdy gray that Dorcas Brown had a hand in. Oh, I've got a plan! You just write a note to Miss Ingersoll, and tell her all about your poor foot, and beg her for once to come to you."

"But, Louisa, she refuses to go out, you know; and she might not like it."

"Like it! oh, she won't dislike it. She's the best-natured, most obliging person in the world. There's no nonsense, and no pride about her. Come, mother, you just write your note, and George'll go for her; won't you, George?"

George Chatam, Mother Chatam's youngest, and, some people said, her favorite son, thus addressed, laid down his newspaper which he had been reading.

"Go for whom?" he asked.

"The dress-maker. Mother can't go to her, you know, on account of her foot."

George Chatam put on a look of grim humor that was a great deal like his mother, and turning to that lady, he said:

"Mrs. Chatam, did you authorize that giddy young woman to send me out on this freezing December morning upon such an errand. It makes my teeth chatter to think of bringing that dismal Dorcas up here."

"Dorcas! 'tisn't Dorcas any more, George; it's Miss Ingersoll," exclaimed Louisa.

"So, mother, this giddy young woman has persuaded you into changing old acquaintances, eh? The next time I come home I shall find somebody else in my shoes. Eh, what, is that note ready? And I'm to take the buggy, you say? Well, I'm in for it, I suppose. Where's my hat? Louisa, don't use that journal for curl papers as you did the other while I'm away."

And out he went, followed by Louisa's saucy rejoinders, and his mother's fond, but covert smile. He was the apple of her eye. Not quite thirty yet, and of a generous, hearty manhood, which, wherever he went, gave him a first place among his fellows.

"Be sure you don't come back without Miss Ingersoll, George!" Louisa cried out to him from the door-way as he drove off.

When the young man observed the look of indecision Miss Ingersoll's face wore as she read the note, he remarked, pleasantly:

"The last thing my sister-in-law said to me was: 'Be sure you don't come back without Miss Ingersoll.'"

Miss Ingersoll smiled vaguely in return, but stood, thoughtfully, holding the matter under silent consideration.

"I don't see how I can," she spoke, at last, more to herself than to him, and looking meditatively out of the window.

The young man stood idly waiting. He had no interest in the matter—indeed it was rather a bore; only he didn't want his mother and Louisa to be disappointed. A few moments more, and Miss Ingersoll had decided. She would go. It was half an hour's ride to Meriden Hill, and in that time there was very little said—a few remarks about the weather, and a few questions and answers concerning the arrangement of the wolf-robe. George Chatam felt rather relieved than otherwise when he had delivered his companion over to his sister-in-law. But he hadn't got rid of Miss Ingersoll yet. Toward night his mother came to him, saying:

"George, I wish you'd take Miss Ingersoll back. I wouldn't ask you, but Michael isn't fit to be out with his cold."

"Certainly, mother;" answered George, obligingly; but it was a little disagreeable to him to leave his warm nook in the library, and those "English Humorists," of which he was so fond. It was a dismal night to turn out in; raw and rainy, with an east wind blowing. But George never showed his petty annoyances. He was just as kind and pleasant, though a little absent; his thoughts more with that warm fireside he had left, and the company of Swift and Steele, and Gay and Prior. Perhaps it was this absence of mind that made him a little careless in his driving, for in turning at the cross-road he seemed to have forgotten a certain pile of stones to be avoided—for the road was under repair at the time—and this inattention very nearly caused a serious accident. There was a sudden swerve, a sudden shock; and though George retained his seat, it wasn't so easy for Miss Ingersoll, in that low-backed, or no-backed, open buggy. She gave just a little "Oh!" of fright as she was thus unceremoniously thrown out, and then George heard not another sound. He righted himself and jumped to the ground with no very great delay, you may be sure. It was quite dark, but he could just see Miss Ingersoll, sitting with her head bent forward upon her hands.

"Are you hurt, Miss Ingersoll; are you hurt?" he inquired, anxiously.

"No," in rather a faint voice; "only it was a shock, and I am a little faint and giddy."

"It was very careless of me, very; and I am ashamed to ask your pardon."

Miss Ingersoll didn't reply. She sat there quietly a moment or so longer, and then said, in her simple way:

"Now I can go on, if you will help me. I think my ankle is sprained."

"Bless my soul, you don't say so!" George was so sorry and so shocked at himself that he expressed a good deal of his feeling. Miss Ingersoll replied to it all with:

"Oh, it might have been much worse; and there is no justice in your blaming yourself, Mr. Chatam. It was simply an accident, and nothing very serious at that."

But her cool way, though it was a relief, didn't make him regard his own carelessness in a less culpable light. As he put her into the carriage again, he said, decidedly:

"You must let me take you back to my mother, now; she would never forgive me for letting you go off to take care of yourself after suffering by my carelessness." And with these words he was turning his horse in the direction of Meriden Hill.

"Mr. Chatam, you will be kind enough to take me to my home at Meriden Centre."

The quick, firm tone impressed George Chatam with her earnestness at once.

"But, Miss Ingersoll, I wish you would trust to me in this. It is better as I say. My mother will gladly do any thing she can for you."

"Mr. Chatam, I thank you; but I don't want to go to Meriden Hill; I want to go to my own room."

For the first time there was something a little haughty in Emily Ingersoll's manner; haughty, and almost ungracious. George wouldn't have resented any thing from her then; but he felt, somehow, confused and misunderstood.

"You shall go just where you like, Miss Ingersoll," he answered her, gently.

It was the best thing he could have said, and the best thing he could have done, to have obeyed her wish as he did. But after he had seen her safely landed at her boarding-place he went to his mother's family physician, and begged him to go at once and attend to her. This was some satisfaction. He felt still better about it, however, when he had told his mother and Louisa what had happened, and enlisted their sympathies and services. Mrs. Chatam mère was quite horrified.

"My goodness, George!" she exclaimed, in her abrupt way, "I wonder you weren't both of you killed. See to her—of course I will; but she ought to be here."

Louisa couldn't help her jest with George, even on so serious a subject.

"You're a pretty fellow," she said, "rushing across the country in such a hap-hazard manner that one doesn't know whether they are in or out of the carriage hardly. I think I shall insure my life next time I go with you."

But spite of her fun Mrs. Louisa felt sorry for Miss Ingersoll, and the next morning went to make kind inquiries and offer what service she could. There wasn't much opportunity for any body's service it seemed; for there sat Miss Ingersoll, inside her shop-window, busy, with her two or three girls, over Mother Chatam's dress, the sprained foot properly bandaged, and resting upon a cushion.

Mrs. Louisa went in full of her mission, and came out entirely robbed of it. According to Miss Ingersoll's statement there was nothing to be done. The foot and ankle were getting on well—a little painful, of course, but nothing but what could be borne. Home sped Mrs. Louisa and related the result of her interview.

"Mercy! I should have been on the lounge, making every body wait upon me; and there she sat, as cool and easy as you please; but I suppose girls in her situation get used to taking things coolly. They are obliged to, poor things!"

George Chatam, in the window-seat, made no comment; but he thought, with a good deal of curiosity, of the character this cool way suggested, for he hadn't forgotten his own experience of this coolness the night before. And that remark of Louisa's: "I suppose girls in her situation get used to taking things coolly; they are obliged to, poor things!"—touched George a good deal. He hadn't given it much thought before, but there was this girl, evidently a person of refinement; just as much, and perhaps more, of a lady than Louisa; and how different their lots in life! As George pondered this his pity increased, and his desire to make some amends for his carelessness became naturally stronger. That afternoon he rode down himself to make personal inquiries. Miss Ingersoll was alone in the front shop, and the busy click, click of the sewing-machine going on in the room beyond. She received him pleasantly enough, answered his questions, his commiserations briefly but politely, told him, smilingly, that it wasn't worth so much talk, and grew so evidently annoyed with the subject that he dropped it. And then came an utter silence which she would not break, and George was fain to make his exit as speedily as possible.

"She's a curious person," he thought, "and very unlike most girls in her position. No embarrassment, no flippancy, no commonplace volubility, but as cold and simple as a duchess might be. She evidently scents patronage, the condescension of people who look over her head, and she is determined to bluff it off. Plucky, I declare!"

But George Chatam was a persistent fellow when he set out on a principle; and it was a principle with him now to do a gentleman's duty under the circumstances. A little proud, too, it hurt him to be the means of doing an injury, and then he denied any reparation whatever. So a second time he presented himself at Miss Ingersoll's door with his inquiries, and then he spoke to her quite frankly of how he felt about it.

"You are scarcely generous, Miss Ingersoll," he said, seriously, "to treat me in this way."

Miss Ingersoll was completely taken aback by his honest, serious directness. She began something, however, in the old strain. "It wasn't worth minding, etc."

"Miss Ingersoll, it is worth minding. If you had been in my place and I in yours would you have felt that it wasn't worth minding?"

Miss Ingersoll was obliged to own by her silence, if not by words, that he had the best of it here. She broke this silence at last by saying:

"Well, perhaps I am not generous—perhaps I am a little morbidly sensitive. I suppose I am; but you can not know, Mr. Chatam, how hard it is for a woman in my circumstances to keep the exact balance—to know just what is best for her self-respect to do when brought into contact in any other than a business capacity with persons differently circumstanced."

"No, I don't suppose I do, Miss Ingersoll. I think I can imagine how you feel, however, and this is the very point. You fancy that people situated as we are mean patronage and condescension, whenever we approach you in any other way than that of business. You may have had experience which proved it to you, but you mistake in the present case. I should have shown no more and no less interest in any one, however circumstanced in the world. But perhaps I am too hasty. I think very likely that I have felt a keener sympathy and interest in your suffering by my carelessness because of your very circumstances. You depend upon yourself; you can not afford to lose your time or your health in any way. You surely will not misunderstand me now."

"No, I will not, Mr. Chatam."

For the first time George Chatam realized Emily Ingersoll's personal appearance as he looked up at her. She was really attractive—not a beauty, but fair to look upon.

"A lady!" he said inwardly, as he rode home, "whatever her condition in life."

IV.

Louisa was down from Boston again, and sat reading aloud to her mother-in-law. It was approaching spring, and though the road was white with snow there was a twitter of bird and a swelling of bud which were sure harbingers; and Louisa, looking up from her book every now and then, welcomed these indications with a vague sense of pleasure. At last she looked up and forgot to look back. Mrs. Chatam mère glanced over her spectacles at her to see what delayed her.

"What is it? what do you see, Louisa?"

"Mother Chatam, did you hear the gate clang just now?"

"I don't know as I did. Why?"

"It was George with a bundle of books, and a basket of flowers from the hot-house. Do you know what he is going to do with them?"

"No, of course not. Why should I?" answered Mother Chatam with lofty indifference.

Louisa was gazing thoughtfully from the window out upon the long white road, the distant town. She went on as if Mother Chatam hadn't spoken.

"Mrs. Tennett told me last night, mother, that George goes to see Miss Ingersoll very often, and that he carries her books and flowers."

"Louisa, I hope you haven't been encouraging any idle, vulgar gossip about the family with Mrs. Tennett or any one else."

Mother Chatam spoke in her haughtiest tone. Louisa knew what it meant—knew she was in earnest, and did not mean to discuss the matter. She wisely resumed her book then without further remark, and the matter was dropped. But Mother Chatam had not dropped it so easily out of her thoughts. Her George carrying flowers and books to Miss Ingersoll—to her dress-maker! If the rumor was true, what did it portend? But no, it could not be true. It was only idle, country gossip. George had simply been kind to her on account of her accident. Mrs. Chatam was not a snobbish person by any means; but she was a conventional woman of the old-fashioned school of country gentry. And this country of Meriden had always been specially aristocratic in its tone; what Julia Ingersoll had termed "English." Mrs. Chatam then, with her Mayflower blood and her ancient prejudices, looked upon her dress-maker as only a short remove from her chamber-maid. She would have nursed her in sickness, and helped her generously if she had been in need of help; but she would have done it from the "lady of the county's" sense of duty, just as she would have tended or helped any of her poor.

But while Mother Chatam's mind is in this state of commotion from Louisa's gossip, let us see what George is really going to do with those books and flowers. Yes! he drives down the road and turns the corner—that very corner where he once turned over—and keeps on to Meriden Centre. It was late in the afternoon when he started; it is coming twilight when he reins up—yes, actually before Miss Ingersoll's door! It is her shop-door, and in this shop—Miss Ingersoll has never tried to call it "rooms"—Miss Ingersoll spends her evenings; for here she has quite a pretty little parlor all to herself, when no customers are there. George enters this little parlor like one quite at home.

"I've brought you those books I spoke of, Miss Ingersoll; and here are some of our last roses and a few other flowers, if you'll give them house-room."

"Oh, thank you; how lovely!" and Emily Ingersoll bent over the basket with a face of delight. Presently she opened a port-folio and pushed it toward her guest:

"Do you recognize those?"

"What! the violets and pansies I brought you last week?"

"Yes; I tried the multiflora, but it had faded too much, and I am used to painting violets and pansies more than other flowers."

"You have painted flowers a great deal, haven't you? Those water-lilies you showed me were wonderful."

"Yes; I have painted them a good deal—I like to copy from nature."

So they talk first of the flowers, and then of the books, and George reads some of his favorite passages. George has evidently none of his mother's prejudices. He is of the new-day school instead of the old, as you might perceive if you observed the books he bought. There are two or three of Thoreau's, and one of Emerson's which Miss Ingersoll hasn't read; and George gets quite brilliant as he discusses them. The town-clock struck ten before he dreamed of it.

"Bless me! I didn't know it was so late!" he said, rising. It was a lovely night that met their eyes as they stood a moment by the open door.

"It will soon be delightful riding, Miss Ingersoll," George remarked, animatedly, as he felt the spring air: "and then you must let me take you over some of these hills; I'll promise not to upset you. You will go with me, won't you?"

"I—I think not, Mr. Chatam."

"What, did you get so permanent a fright after all in that upsetting?"

"Oh no, not that; but this is a gossiping neighborhood, Mr. Chatam, and women in my position have to be very careful. I was going to speak to you a week ago or more about another matter connected with this subject. It is better that you should not come here so frequently for that very reason. Of course I know that you are a liberal-minded gentleman, and that you recognize me as a friend without regard to my worldly position; but others will not. There will be always in such companionship as ours the ordinary vulgar supposition of a flirtation or something of the sort. There, now, you need not say a word. We can't help it, you know, and we are just as good friends as ever."

She smiled at the conclusion—would not let him speak in reply, but bade him "good-night," in such a frank, commonplace way as to divest every thing she had said of the least over-sensitive or sentimental feeling.

George drove off with a sensation of chagrin and disappointment.

"Why wouldn't she let me speak, I wonder?" he thought over and again as he rode along, and the thought seemed vexatious and mortifying.

Mother Chatam was sitting up for him when he arrived. It was an unusual thing, and George stared at her in surprise when he entered the parlor. He was in no mood for talking, and was lighting his candle to go up to his room, when she surprised him still more by saying:

"George, I want to have a little talk with you."

"Very well, mother;" and he drew a chair up to the fire.

She began at once without preamble.

"George, Louisa tells me that there is a gossip about you and Miss Ingersoll."

The old lady was regarding him keenly over her spectacles. She saw that calm face of his not a whit disturbed in outward serenity, and his only reply was the monosyllable "Well?" in a questioning tone of voice. She saw that he meant her to go on.

"And they say that you carry her books and flowers."

"Well?"

"I told Louisa that it was only idle gossip; that you had been kind to Miss Ingersoll on account of her foot. But I thought I had better speak to you about it, and let you know what was said, so as to put you on your guard. Such tittle-tattle is always annoying, and it might be of serious detriment to Miss Ingersoll."

"Yes, it might; I will look out that it does not, however. I will either cease going altogether there, or I will have the best of reasons to go."

"George, you don't mean—"

"Yes, I do, mother. I mean that I am going to ask Miss Ingersoll if she will marry me."

"Well, George, I never thought you would come to this!"

"Come to what, mother—matrimony?"

"Don't jest, George, I beg of you. You know very well what I mean. You know that it is not the marrying, but the marrying beneath you, that I object to."

"Beneath me!" and from this indignant exclamation George went on to expound to his mother his own liberal ideas on this subject. He told her that Miss Ingersoll was more of a lady, and a better educated one than Louisa; and it was the accident of poverty, of course, that had given her her present position.

"But if she was such a lady, if she was better educated, etc., why didn't she make use of her advantages? There were plenty of occupations—teaching for instance, which were ladies' occupations. If she was so well educated why didn't she teach?"

"I never asked her, mother. If I thought about it I trusted such a person as Miss Ingersoll to have good and dignified reason for her choice of occupation. When you talk of plenty of lady-like occupations, consider a moment—what is there open to women except the few employments such as teaching, dress-making, millinery, and fine sewing. I mean the legitimate occupations open to all. The others are accidents or special talents."

George, of course, had the best of the argument; but his mother was not convinced by it—rather irritated instead. She didn't understand this new doctrine of equality. It partook of schism and conspiracy, and even the Prayer-Book warned her of that.

"But you'll welcome her, mother, as your daughter if she accepts me?" George finally asked, with some anxiety.

"I can't welcome her, George, for I can't lie," the old lady answered, decidedly.

George rose up with a sigh. "Ah, well, mother, I know that you will think better of it sometime."

He went out with his usual good-night, a little sad-faced but kind as ever. Her favorite son. She looked after him with tears in her eyes, and thoughts both gentle and bitter were in her mind. She had always been proud of his steady-mindedness, but it was this very trait now that she feared. When George once made up his mind there was no turning him.

Louisa, sitting near the window the next afternoon, saw her brother-in-law go out at the gate again, and, entering his carriage, go riding forth toward Meriden Centre. "There he goes to see Miss Ingersoll, I'll bet," she thought, but she did not give utterance to her thoughts this time. Yes, he went to see Miss Ingersoll, yet Louisa little guessed his errand.

Miss Ingersoll herself did not guess it as he stood before her. She was surprised to see him, after the conversation they had had, and her face showed it, if not her tone of greeting; but there was no lack of cordiality in her tone. So far from that, it seemed as if the surprise was so sudden a pleasure she had not time to conceal it if she had cared to. His heart leaped as he met that glance, and something shone in his eyes as he put out his hand that brought a little flutter of color to her cheek.

"You did not think I would come so soon again, did you? You thought you had sent me away for good and all perhaps."

"Oh no, not so bad as that, I hope, Mr. Chatam," she answered, with a new constraint upon her.

He stood with his hand upon the back of a chair, looking thoughtfully down as she spoke. He waited a moment thus in silence, and then in the same voice:

"If you send me away again it will be for good and all, for I have come to say what will either banish me entirely from your presence or give me a right to it forever, as your answer may be. I have come to ask you to be my wife—you know that I love you with my whole soul."

"As he said this, lifting his eyes in that full tender gaze, she did indeed know that he loved her. A sudden rapture lit her face, then faded.

She put out her hand to him, but only said, in a wistful, anxious way,

"Your mother?"

He knew what she meant—he knew that she had read his mother's character, and anticipated her opposition. A dark flush mounted to his brow as he answered:

"My mother has some old-school fancies and prejudices which are scarcely American; but our lives must not be marred in consequence. We are mature enough, we are reasonable enough to make our own choice."

"Yes—I know, but—I can not enter a family unwelcomed; I should not be happy."

"But a prejudice; an old whim of a past day, with which we utterly disagree in every belief and principle that we have. Think, Emily; think what it is to sacrifice a whole life, perhaps, for that."

"A whole life?—yes, I think what it is; yet I do not see that I can do otherwise."

As she said that, musingly, in a soft, tender tone—"a whole life," his face glowed, for well he knew what she meant. By those words, so uttered, she had confessed her soul to him. When he spoke again, it was with new vehemence, and eloquent was the suit he urged. The tears were in her eyes when he concluded, but still she shook her head.

"You think this is poor pride, perhaps, or morbid sensitiveness. It may be; but listen to me. If I married you with this knowledge, and under these conditions, that to your own mother I was an alien, an unwelcome guest, that she held me as beneath your choice; spite of my philosophy, spite of my entirely different principle of belief, I should become embittered, and the bitterness would enter into my daily life, and gradually affect my relations with others. Worst of all, I think it would, perhaps, make me suspicious where I had no right to be suspicious. This is a weak and pitiful pride, I dare say; but I know that it is the grain of my character, and I dare not let it have opportunity to run riot as it would have under the circumstances you propose. Do not blame me too hardly for this; do not hate me for this decision," she concluded, sadly and tearfully.

"Hate you? hate and you can never come together in my mind, Emily. I believe you are making a grievous mistake for us both, that is all."

She was quite silent for several moments after this; then, with a new flush upon her cheek, and a little quicker of tone:

"I do not know—it might make a difference with your mother if she were aware of the facts of my story. Still, I think I understand the quality of her pride. It is the old name only she holds worthy of alliance with hers, and my father was a self-made man. It is in this day and generation that John Ingersoll's name was noted, and that only for wealth and commercial transactions, I suppose she would say; though, I am sure, she could never have found a truer gentleman."

"So your father was John Ingersoll the merchant prince, Emily? Know him? not personally, but I knew of him as every man of the world did, by reputation, and that was as a true and honorable gentleman. Whatever my mother's opinion might be in regard to an alliance with such a man, I should feel honored by it. To make a good name I hold to be a greater grace than the simply bearing one."

"Whatever his mother's opinion might be." Unwittingly he had by this sentence admitted her suppositions concerning his mother's opinions to be correct. Emily felt this at once; but there was no more time for further words, even if she had not seen that further words were only a useless trial, for voices and footsteps sounded outside upon her door-step, which warned her that the conference was over. She turned to the new-comers—her landlady's young daughters—with a heavy heart, for she had just bade adieu to a great joy. But George Chatam, as he rode down the road, carried a hopeful spirit. He had scarcely realized the truth of his unwitting admission as yet. John Ingersoll's daughter! That ought to be enough for any body. He went straight home with this idea, and up to his mother's room, where he knew she would be sitting at this hour, quite alone. Last night she had wanted to have a little talk with him; to-night he wanted to have a little talk with her: and he sat down there before the fire, and told her the whole history of the evening. Of his rejection and the grounds of it, winding up with the one grand climax of her parentage, John Ingersoll's daughter! But omitting—I dare say for the moment he really forgot it—Miss Ingersoll's last supposition, of the quality of old family pride that would still look down upon so new a name. But he remembered soon enough. Mother Chatam heard him through in grave silence, and then she said, quietly:

"I do not see how the fact of her being John Ingersoll's daughter changes the matter. Who was John Ingersoll, George?"

"Mother, you certainly have heard of Ingersoll, the great merchant?" answered George, a little indignantly.

"Oh yes, yes; he made a sudden fortune and lived lavishly to the end of his life, and lost it then, it seems. 'Up like a rocket, and down like a stick,' George; just like such new people."

"Mother, John Ingersoll was an honorable gentleman. In the commercial world his name is famous. Dying suddenly in the midst of his enterprises was his misfortune, not his fault; and if he lived lavishly, it was generously, too. Many a poorer man had cause to bless the name of John Ingersoll."

"He may have been a worthy man enough; I dare say he was, George; but he was a man of money—that is all I can recall; and he was of low origin. The book of merchants, I remember, says he started a news-boy."

"Oh, mother, mother! your prejudices are not Christian."

"Oh, George, I see how it is! I know you want me to favor this match. You want me to say I like it, that I think this girl a fit mate for you; but I don't, and I can't. I think she has shown herself a nice, sensible person, in many ways; but if she had been a lady, and the daughter of a gentleman, as you say, she must have chosen a different means to support herself. I have known a great many poor gentlewomen, but I never knew one who did not take higher grade than this."

What was the use of combating such prejudice? Alas, none! And George knew it. He gave one heavy sigh and rose up from his chair, feeling very bitterly, though he did not give utterance to it.

V.

As soon as twilight approached the next day he again sought Miss Ingersoll's presence, and again vehemently pleaded his suit. Not a word escaped him, however, of his interview with his mother. But Emily Ingersoll was not to be deceived; she knew by his very avoidance of the subject that an interview had taken place, and that it had been unsatisfactory. Simple and straightforward in every thing she did, she answered his impassioned pleading with this knowledge. Once more that dark flush mounted to his brow, and once more he brought up his former arguments against the prejudice they could not hope to overcome. She interrupted him at last very gently, but with the old, sad, inflexible tone.

"Stay a moment," she said; "in our personal loss I think we have put aside another and not less weighty consideration. If I could not for my pride enter your family an unwelcome guest, I am sure I ought not for another feeling—that of honor and duty. It is your own mother who thus opposes your inclination. How could I in honor deliberately sow dissension between you two? How could I stand between mother and son?"

"Good Heavens! Emily, you do not suppose my mother is so vindictive or so unreasonable as that? It is true she does not favor my inclination—you know for what reason—but you do not know the limit of her disfavor. She simply objects to our marriage on the ground of worldly position; objects, mark you! She gives this objection frankly as her right—the expression of her feeling; but she does not question my right to rule my own action; and once my wife, Emily, I make no doubt that she would unlearn her ancient prejudice even, in learning how true a woman and lady she had found in you."

This was a fair and eloquent statement; but still Emily Ingersoll shook her head, still she maintained her sad inflexibility. Pride, and Honor, and Duty. It was a formidable trio. Against it all urging and argument were vain. Not that she was unmoved by what he said. Ah, no! Tears were in her eyes; they choked her utterance and almost betrayed her into sobs as he went on. It was so hard, so very hard, to fight against him, when her heart ached for his sympathy and companionship. He saw all this—her tears and her struggles, yet he saw too, that her will conquered. Pride, and Honor, and Duty. These three; but he recognized only the first, and at last grew bitter under it. And as he rode back, in the still, splendid night, he felt sorely used on every side.

"So," he mused, gloomily, "she can sacrifice her love for her pride. I thought she had too large a nature for this. I thought I had found one woman above such weaknesses. Pride to part us two! What comes next, I wonder?"

He was both angry and bitter as he contemplated his defeat; but it was the anger and bitterness that grows out of wounded feeling and sharp disappointment. Later, he learned to do her justice. Now, in view of her determination, he could not see that she suffered more deeply than he did himself. He could not see, if it was hard for him it was harder still for her—a woman almost friendless and alone, and working for her daily bread.

Day after day to toil there and think of the love she had put away. Day after day, year after year, perhaps, to struggle against the tender dreams that would arise, and know that she was doomed to a lonely life. This was the prospect that presented itself to Emily Ingersoll, as she worked mechanically over a gay party dress, on the morning after this last interview. How many times her deft fingers had helped Madame Arles to decorate her own dresses in just this way! Yet she did not think of this now; there was no regret for the costly garments. It was for the desolate existence that she must support; and for the first time a doubt assailed her as to the wisdom of the step she had taken in choosing her present occupation. Never before had she realized how it had separated her from her class. Perhaps it would have been better if she had turned governess, or starved on those "pretty pictures," as Julia had suggested, for evidently she was at odds with society now. These thoughts stung her for a moment, then were followed by a swift scorn of herself for the entertaining of such thoughts. "Alas, have I no more courage than this!" she cried, bitterly. "Has my pride no deeper virtue than to be shaken by the first trial?"

But even as she asked this sad question she knew that no sorer trial could come to a woman's life.

Perhaps the sharpest pang of this trial was when the news reached her that George Chatam had sailed for Liverpool without seeing her again. "I should not have served him so," she meditated; "I should at least have gone in peace from one I loved with a 'good-by!' and a 'God bless you!'"

Most women would, but most men would have done precisely as George Chatam did. Afterward, when he smoked his pipe under the shadow of the old palace roof where he lived a traveler's life, gentler thoughts came to him, and he repented of his bitterness. He saw her toiling alone, day after day, with no hope, no consolation, but with the ghost of a vanished happiness perpetually before her—for he could do her justice now—and he knew that she loved him. These meditations filled him with other thoughts than those of self-commiseration. He began to think of her with a yearning sense of pity. He was learning to be friend as well as lover—that truest, rarest union of ties. And out of this new feeling arose a desire to serve her as a friend might. There was surely one way; he might now and then write to her, calmly and kindly, assuring her of his never-failing interest and watchfulness over her welfare. And no sooner did this occur to him than he acted upon it. It was a manly letter that he wrote, full of honest, earnest cordiality, though a little sad and solemn in its earnestness, as was natural under the peculiar circumstances, but entirely devoid of complaining or sentimentality.

It came to Emily Ingersoll like a message from heaven. The dreary weight of desolation that had oppressed her now lifted. Not as a hope did she welcome it, but as a renewal of faith. In his hasty departure there had been more than the disappointment of the external good-by to her. It was the disappointment in the man, whose generous nature she had trusted. Now she had it back again—the faith which was a comfort in itself. As friends they corresponded with each other, neither ever alluding to the subject that had parted them, because both instinctively recognized that to have done so would have been to have fed the fever, which had already seared them with its consuming fire.

Weaker and less assured characters would not have allowed themselves this consolation of friendship. The terse old French motto, "Tout ou rien," would have been their watchword. But these two were of different mould. A little of the heroic element mingled in the blood of both of them perhaps, and where they had cast the anchor of duty or determination they knew that by the force of their natures they must need at least outlive storms might shake or sirens sly, and I da had not been lovers only, but friends. If one relation was impracticable, why should the other be given up? Friends were not so easily found that they could be thus put aside. And with this faith in themselves, and something like this reasoning, the correspondence began and went on—went on through months, which lengthened into years.

In the mean time the proud old dame who had parted them lived in her stately mansion upon the hill, and gave no sign. It must have been a dreary state she kept, and grievously she must have missed the genial presence of this favorite son.

Three years; three summers and winters, springs and autumns, and still the wanderer did not return. And still the old life was kept up at Meriden Centre and Meriden Hill. Still Emily Ingersoll worked steadily through all the changes of the seasons, keeping up a brave, steady heart, thanking God for one friend and for the health and strength that was vouchsafed her to hold her place. It was not always easy to keep this brave heart, and to feel thankfully for health and strength. Sometimes, at lonely twilight hours, the bitterness of these lonely days would smite her, and before her vision the long, long future would stretch in desolate, dreary mockery. But a gentler mood would follow, and, bending over the rich silks or delicate muslins, she would think: "I have certainly prospered in my undertaking, and by-and-by when I get old I shall not have to work, but, like good little Madame Arles, I will have a store laid by to live upon. And then, and then—but there is no use to perplex myself about that future 'then.' Heaven, who fits all things, will send me peace and perhaps pleasure then."

And this was all the comfort Emily Ingersoll dared give herself, and she did not mix with it either bitterness or sarcasm. If she dared give herself no more comfort, she certainly dared give herself no less by tainting her philosophy with bitterness and sarcasm. I think the sharpest pang that struck her in these days was when sometimes in her walks she met "Mother Chatam." The old lady's face was very like her son's, lacking however his genial, pleasant look.

Her greeting to Emily was grave and civil, wanting no courtesy, but it some way seemed to frost the air and chill the currents of her life. After these meetings she would feel more lonely than before, and as if friend as well as lover was put far from her. Occasionally, too, gay little Mrs. Louisa would flash in upon her, and her easy ways were hardly less trying than the cold, grave dignity of the mother. For if the former was unconscious, she ran against so many remembrances in her heedless mention that the sore heart bled. But "Patience, patience," whispered the angel of consolation; "there must be 'sweet fields' somewhere beyond these swelling floods!"

Three years was a long time to wait for peace, but there were those who had waited longer than this. Three years! At the end of these three years a great trial came to George Chatam's mother, and in a direction she had never looked for it, which made it harder. She had always been very much gratified at her eldest son, William's, marriage. Not that Louisa was in every thing her ideal of a woman. By no means. But she was Lloyd Fotheringay's daughter, and the Fotheringays were of the best blood in the country. A long line of gentlemen and ladies, and Louisa was the last of her race. It was quite fitting that the old Fotheringay name should be merged in one still older—that Louisa Fotheringay should become Louisa Chatam. Louisa cared very little for this prestige of name herself. Mother Chatam never understood how little. She knew that her daughter-in-law was a gay, careless creature, with not so much dignity as she would have liked to have in her son's wife; but she was young, and by-and-by it would be different. By-and-by she would resemble her grandmother Fotheringay in character as she did now in person. And Mother Chatam remembered with admiration what a brilliant woman Sarah Fotheringay had been in her day. But Louisa, if she was like her grandmother in person, inherited much more of her father's character, which was not only brilliant, but gay, and wild, and reckless. A pleasure-seeker, with a pleasure-seeker's idleness, selfishness, and vanity, was John Fotheringay. To a man these qualities were dangerous enough, but to a woman they were fatal. And with this fatal dower, and with another to make it still more fatal—that of beauty—Louisa at twenty was launched fully on the broad sea of fashion. She was a good-natured little thing—every body liked her; even Mother Chatam, apart from her being a Fotheringay, was fond of Louisa's bright company, though she vexed her sorely with her careless, idle ways. And Mother Chatam thought these idle, careless ways were the worst of Louisa. And they were only the froth upon the surface—mere indications of what lurked beneath. But when she went to Boston to pay her annual visit, two years after George's departure, she did think Louisa was imprudent.

"I wouldn't let that young man pay me so many attentions, and I wouldn't dance with him all the time, Louisa," she remonstrated, in her brusque way, one morning after a party.

"What young man? Oh, Roswald. Pooh, that ain't any thing; I don't care any thing about him."

Mother Chatam took off her spectacles, and looked at Louisa in amazement and horror. There stood the giddy thing filipping her earring, while she coolly talked of not caring any thing about somebody who was not her husband.

"As if I supposed you did care any thing for the popinjay, Louisa, or any body but William. I wouldn't insult you by such a supposition."

Louisa lifted her eyes in wonder. What had she said to call down Mother Chatam's wrath like this? Mother Chatam soon enlightened her, and Louisa burst into a shriek of irreverent but good-natured laughter.

"Why, was that any harm? I'm sure I didn't mean any; but you are such an ark, Mother Chatam; you think I must act and talk as they did in your young days before the flood."

Mother Chatam delivered herself of a wholesome lecture; and Louisa took it so easily and with such frank mirth that the old lady was appeased.

"There is really no harm in the child," she said, to herself; "but she is so careless; and then these nineteenth century manners are detestable, enough to spoil any body."

The next thing, Louisa went to Europe with her husband.

"You'll come home with so many foolish, foreign notions you won't be good for any thing, Louisa," was Mother Chatam's comment as she bade her good-by.

Louisa made her a courtesy. "I shall come home covered with glory and conquests, for I mean to turn all those foreign heads with my yellow hair. Yellow hair is fashionable there, Mother Chatam, and I shall carry the palm!" This was all said with only the merriest malice. "Louisa's careless way." But there, with the bright June sun shining down upon her, Mother Chatam shivered.

"Take care of her, William!" she suddenly exclaimed, with more than usual earnestness.

William laughed a little at his old-fashioned mother, for he took things as easily as Louisa, though in a different way.

The letters from Paris were full of rattle, and vivid life and color, like Louisa herself. They amused the lonely old woman in her lonely house; but every now and then a vague uneasiness would assail her at the gay gossip and allusion in these letters. "I told you so," she wrote once: "all Paris is mad after my yellow hair. You see I came to the right place to be appreciated, Mother Chatam? And then there came gleeful mention of some fine, and even famous names, of whom she spoke with that gay malice as her 'adorners.'"

Mother Chatam knew perfectly well this was mischievously written; but then she knew, too, that Louisa was "imprudent," and she worried about her. Not that she imagined for a moment that Louisa would be any thing but simply gay and heedless, and too fond of attention. Louisa was a lady, notwithstanding her nonsense; a lady and a Fotheringay! They always knew their place, and kept it. But it would be so humiliating to be "talked about;" and that was so readily done. She answered Louisa's gay letter with one full of advice and warning. "Be careful, be careful, Louisa;" she reiterated. Louisa returned one gayer than ever, containing this item: "George has left Rome and is with us here, instituting himself my guardian and mentor in your absence. He is just like you, Mother Chatam, and teases the life out of me on every occasion. It's 'Louisa, you mustn't do this, and Louisa, you mustn't do that.' It is wearing the flesh off of me."

Mother Chatam thrilled as she read. If George had taken her to task she must be going on very heedlessly. There was a longer gap than usual after this letter. Then, one brilliant winter morning, another came from George himself, which verified all his mother's worst fears. "Write to Louisa; do, mother," he wrote, "and caution her. She goes on in such a giddy, reckless way that she must soon be a mark for scandal unless it is stopped; and I don't want to speak to William, it might make worse trouble."

VI.

Scandal. To be talked about. Those were Mother Chatam's "worst fears." And that this should arise from Louisa's foolish, childish ways, her "imprudence," was not at all surprising to her. That there was any thing deeper than this foolishness she never thought for a moment. Thus, unprepared and unsuspecting, what a blow was the next news! George wrote:

"MY DEAR, DEAR MOTHER,—I wish I could spare you the sad story I have to tell; but I can not, when in a few days it will be the public gossip of Paris and a newspaper paragraph. Not even your letter, it seems, had any effect upon Louisa, for there was no check to her mad career; and William, absorbed in his own pursuits, was blind until an accident suddenly opened his eyes and caused the catastrophe of which I write. It seems that the foolish, reckless girl has been carrying on a sentimental correspondence with a young count here, and that at various times she has received costly gifts from him. It came out in a most unfortunately public manner at the club the other evening. I had dropped in to see William a few moments before I went to my hotel, and found him playing billiards with the count himself. I waited for them to finish the game, and just as it came to an end, and I had begun to speak to William, he turned to De Vernai and said:

"Oh, Count, where's that note of Smythe's I let you have? If you have it about you I'll take it."

"De Vernai was busily engaged talking with some one else by this time, and hastily felt in his coat-pocket and drew forth what was supposed to be the note in question, and handed it across the table. I saw William's face change as he looked at it—an expression of surprise at first. Then he opened it and grasped its contents at a glance, for in an instant his eyes were wild, and I saw something was wrong. I had no idea what it was. I can never tell how all the rest happened. I have a remembrance of William leaping over the table, and a sound of high words and a quick succession of blows. There was great confusion, of course, and two or three voices were asking, 'What is it all about?' But alas! that question was soon answered, for the note he had dropped in his excitement was scanned by other eyes than his before I found it. It was a foolish little letter written by that foolish child Louisa, evidently an answer to another, and contained, among other half-gay and half-sentimental nonsense, thanks for a recent gift. If William had been cooler he would never have made this public scene; but I saw from the first he had been drinking too much wine. Luckily De Vernai was clearer headed, and was as desirous as myself to end the disgraceful scene. And in justice to him I must say that he is the least to blame of any of the parties. For in William's course there has been an entire disregard of any thing but his own pleasure, and a culpable neglect of Louisa in many ways.

"De Vernai is a Frenchman, with a Frenchman's ideas of gallantry. He found a pretty woman, who smiled upon him and welcomed his attentions, and whose husband was apparently wholly indifferent about it, which was certainly no uncommon state of affairs in fashionable life. It was simply, then, in his world but a matter of personal inclination. If she chose to smile upon him and receive his attentions, and he liked the smiles and liked to pay these attentions, why should he not? So it has gone on, and this is the end. Of course there will be a great deal said that isn't true; you must be prepared for that; but always remember that what I have written is the whole. Sad and humiliating enough I know, but report will make it out a good deal worse, I dare say. I hope the matter may be tidied over without further trouble now, for William has awakened to a sense of his own carelessness, and De Vernai is a man of sense in his way, and abhors what he calls an esclandre. Louisa, like the foolish, vain child she is, scarcely realizes what mischief she has done not only her friends but herself, and talks about 'such a stupid fuss over such a little matter.'"

"I am afraid she will never take higher views than this, for I am afraid her character is moulded after the pattern of that gay worldling, Lloyd Fotheringay. But we will hope for the best. I shall not write again, for we sail for home next month.

"Your affectionate son,

"GEORGE CHATAM."

Mother Chatam groaned in spirit over this news. Proud old Puritan that she was, she sat in sackcloth and ashes now. It was an awful blow, for it struck at the very root of her citadel. Blood had been her infallibility. She went about as usual for several days after this, but old Rachel the housekeeper said to one of the maids in a mysterious tone,

"Miss Chatam's goin' to hev a spell o' sickness, Mary. She looks all broke up someway."

And old Rachel was right. One morning Mrs. Chatam did not appear down stairs at her usual hour, and Rachel went to her room to discover the reason, and there she found her mistress unable to rise from her bed. She had had a "stroke," and though it had left her brain clear, and speech unimpaired, there would be no more activity and busy usefulness for her. It was three weeks from this event before she might expect to see her children, and during these weeks she had nothing to do but to lie there and think. It was dreary work, but the result proved the temper of her mind. She had been a stiff, prejudiced, and perhaps a narrow-notioned old woman, but honest and true as steel always. She was honest and true as steel now, but a clearer, broader light was letting in upon this honesty and truth.

"My own flesh and blood, too!" Rachel heard her murmur one day as she lay there thinking. The old housekeeper thought she was talking in her sleep, but she wasn't. She had spoken aloud unwittingly; but it was the key to all her thoughts, and she went on with these thoughts in silence.

"My own flesh and blood! for it isn't only Louisa who is at fault, but William. And I reared him so carefully to be an honor to his name—the name that never had a stain upon it before. And I was so proud and pleased with this Fotheringay alliance. And this is what it has all come to. This is the end of my pride. God forgive me; I believe it is a judgment upon me, for I thought that blood was infallible. And there's that girl down there at the village who shames us all. And her pride is better than any of ours. Ah, I wish that George would only come!"

VII.

This was the end of her meditations—that wish for George to come. And one bright morning George did come. He was greatly shocked at his mother's state, and glad that William and his wife lingered behind in New York. To talk over things with him was quite enough for her now. And in talking "over things" George found his mother changed in a good many ways. Not a whit less vigorous of mind, but a great deal softer than he had ever expected to see her become.

"I've been wrong, George," she said at last, after one of these talks. "And I've made a great mistake, and I want to set it right."

She paused here and looked steadfastly at her son for a few moments. She was thinking how worn he looked—how sad, and wistful, and old; and she knew the reason dated far back of this trouble about William; and she knew that she herself was the sole cause of it, and that in spite of that he was a good and tender son to her.

"Yes, I want to set it right, George. I've been lying here thinking by myself for three weeks, and I see that I've been setting myself up against the Lord's judgment and nursing a wicked pride all my life, and it needed this very humiliation to set me down; to show me that blood wasn't infallible. You know what I mean, George?"

George did know what she meant, and a great flush came into his cheek, and his eyes filled with tears. It was so sudden, so unexpected, that he hadn't a word to say. He had never looked for this. If he had no words his mother had plenty, and she was never afraid of speaking the truth, even when the truth was against herself.

"I've been a hard and a foolish old woman, George, but I see now that there is a better pride than mine; perhaps better blood. I liked it in that girl even then, George, though it sent you away, as I thought at the time, never to come back. And I've thought a great deal about those last words of hers. I'm glad you told me of them. And when this news of Louisa and William came I couldn't help comparing them with her. Honor and duty! yes, she knows what these words mean, and she knows how to respect herself too! And her pride all through has been better than ours. She is a lady, George, out and out, or she never could have done as she has. She's a lady spite of her trade. There, go and tell her so; go and tell her an old woman has learned something of a younger one, and fetch her back with you, George, fetch her back with you!"

George did not wait a second bidding; and his heart throbbed with a mighty throb as he found himself once more on his way to Emily Ingersoll.

It was just at dusk, and Emily was alone at last after a tedious, harassing day. She was in one of those moods which, singularly enough, affect people when on the threshold of some unsuspected bliss—a mood of unwonted depression.

Lonely and weary, she sat there in the gathering dark, while before her trooped all the ghosts of her life; and, sadder than any, were the dead hopes of three years gone, and the struggle that would never end but with her existence, she mused. But as she mused she heard vaguely a hand upon the door—then a footstep sounded; yet she did not stir or take much heed. It was some neighbor, doubtless. But the footstep comes nearer, and it has a ring that echoes back three years. Her pulses beat quicker, and a red heat rises to her brain; but she puts it down with a resolute will, and says, mentally, "How fanciful I am getting!" and she says aloud, in a steady enough voice, "Come in," to the light tap upon the inner door. And the next moment the wild fancy she was putting down is a fact, a palpable presence, for he stands there before her—the wanderer of three years; only a friend, only a friend, she had elected him; but nature was too powerful for her to hinder that joyful cry of welcome. And then he had his arms about her, and was trying to tell her in a few incoherent words the great change that had come for them. But it would not be told in this way. A little later, when he sat there beside her, he made the story more intelligible.

Emily was very happy to have her friend and lover back again, and at the first words she had gathered enough to know that something, she did not question what then, had arisen or happened to remove the necessity of any further parting. And now, when a little cooler, she heard the whole story—the sad and bitter story about William and his wife—and the gentler one about his mother, it may be that she was a little unreasonable, or it may be that in the repetition of the latter story she did not receive the touching impression which George had when he listened to the honest, frank confession. At any rate, spite of her happiness, there rose up in her mind a little leaven of the old pride, which could not come under the head of honor and duty. She remembered the three long years she had been toiling alone and almost hopeless for this prejudice of Mrs. Chatam's; and now, though she was very, very glad that it had given way, she did not feel like going forward and expressing her gladness or acceptance until something more had been said to her. In short, if Mrs. Chatam had discovered that she was wrong in her prejudice, and if she designed to make known to her that she regretted it, and was disposed to regard her in her proper light as a lady, and one whom she no longer considered beneath her son's choice, it was certainly due to one who had suffered under this prejudice to be personally addressed and conferred with about the matter. Very gently, but very decidedly, she acquainted her lover with this state of her mind. He was wise enough not to try any more words of his own, for he thoroughly understood how she felt, but he understood his mother also. He proved his wisdom by the course he took. And that was by confiding the whole matter to her the first thing the next morning.

"Bless my soul! does the girl want me to go down on my knees to her?" the old lady exclaimed, with her wonted grim humor. But in a moment she resumed, nodding her head emphatically: "I don't blame her, I don't blame her. She's a right to her pride; and she's all the better for it, for it's the right stuff. There, George, hand me my desk, and I'll ask her to come up and have a little talk with me. I can use my hands well enough, thank Heaven, if I can't my feet."

George gave her the desk, and she wrote the note—as cordial and courteous a note as even Emily Ingersoll's pride could demand. But when Emily stood by that bedside and saw the stricken woman, whom she had met so little while since hale and active; and when she listened to that "talk," so kind, and hearty, and honest, she was thoroughly overcome, and felt that this last point of her pride might have been a little overstrained.

"No, no, my dear, not a bit of it," answered Mother Chatam, cheerily, as this doubt found expression. "It's the right sort, for it comes from self-respect." And then a spasm of pain crossed her face as she thought of "that foolish child Louisa," and her lack of this quality. And when "that foolish child Louisa" came again to Meriden Hill, just the same foolish child as ever, and expressed her flippant surprise at George's choice, and Mother Chatam's pleasure in it, the old lady answered, in a significant tone:

"I do not think I shall ever have cause to be ashamed of her, Louisa. She has a better pride than any of us, and you may depend she'll never cast a slur upon it."

And when Mrs. Ingersoll and her two daughters, Kate and Julia, were apprised of Emily's prospects, they were, of course, greatly relieved; but they expressed themselves as characteristically as Mrs. Louisa, for they all agreed it was the most wonderful piece of luck for Em, after the mistake she had made; but they didn't suppose she'd appreciate it, for Em never had any proper pride!

It was scarcely supposable that Kate or Julia would understand Emily's real appreciation in this matter, for in marrying men like little Tommy Vars and Mr. Sizar they could not certainly have followed the dictates of taste or affection.

MISS STUYVESANT.

SUPPER was ready. The windows of the little dining-room were open, the wind sweeping through, fresh and cool, the fringe of the white curtains tossing idly. The table was set in the draught; the day had done credit to even a July day in a bare Vermont Valley; now, since five o'clock, a faint wind was rising, like the breath of a sleepy monster, rousing from a dream. Mrs. McKay had picked up the threads from the carpet, tucked her work neatly away out of sight in the machine—one did not want always to be reminded that one had to eat in a sewing-room—skimmed the stone-china pitcherful of yellow cream, gone out in her sun-bonnet to pick that dish of raspberries, crimson and glowing among their leaves, baked the flaky biscuit, and pumped from the lowest deep of an old, dark well water clear as crystal, cold as snow. Who was to know that she seldom afforded ice? When money left her in the gap, nature had a kindly way with Mrs. McKay of making up the deficit. And if nature happened to fail, Mrs. McKay's own invention was discovered to be about the same thing.

She had laid the plates, and put her silver—what there was of it—in the sunbeams that flecked the table; it looked so bright there fairly seemed to be twice as much; moreover, the children liked to fancy it was gold, and the more merry dreams they could have over their bread and milk the better. This was a specimen of a whole system of such tiny household craft, in which Mrs. McKay was a perfect Machiavelli. Her husband used to wonder where she learned it. Out of the Bible, she said.

She had placed the chairs, the baby's next to his father, who would always have it so, the guests facing the open door with a glimpse of mountains through it. If people had tastes, Mrs. McKay reasoned, it would be such a pity not to suit them. Such a trifle where one sits at supper? Oh, she didn't know, it was no trouble to her to stop and think about it, and how could you enjoy your supper if you knew somebody would rather be somewhere else all the time?

The white table-cloth had been smoothed from its spotless wrinkles a dozen times, the last tender touches given to the pat of golden butter, stamped with a clover, the merry tea-bell rung, the children scattered right and left with a laugh, to wash their hands, and the baby tied into the high-chair. She had run out to meet her husband coming up the lane, weary and warm from his mowing, and then run on ahead to meet him at the door with a glass of sparkling water, and a look in her wide, cool eyes that he caught thirstily, though it was always on him, and though they had been married ten years.

Every thing was ready now, and she had gone to the door to look for her niece.

"Mary, Ma-ry! I don't see where she is. Did you see her any where, Frank? Oh—there!"

Miss Stuyvesant, coming up the lane, nodded and smiled.

"Just look at her, Frank! Did you ever see a head held like that? She treads those dusty clovers like a queen at court, and there she is in my old broad-brimmed hat, with a purple lawn and thick boots! I'm a little afraid Mary won't have a very smooth time in the world, somehow. These royal people never do. They don't know how to manage themselves."

"How can she help it, with such an aunt, my dear?"

"Frank, I'm really ashamed of you! Well, Mary, what now? Butter-cup roots for your conservatory?"

"Only a little missionary enterprise," said Miss Stuyvesant, crossing the piazza in her stately way, her apron thrown over one arm, her head erect, her cheeks bright under the shadow of the old hat. In spite of the hat, malgré the lavender lawn and muddy boots, this young woman was well worth looking at. It is quite possible that she was aware of the fact, and, in her usual logical fashion, scorned herself for the knowledge. Miss Stuyvesant, considered in an objective point of view by Miss Stuyvesant, was a curious specimen of humanity.

"Dear me, sassafras!" cried Mrs. McKay, as the apronful of dusty roots fell tumbling into a chair; "very thoughtful in you not to spill them on the floor, I'm sure, and you with your bringing up, what could you be supposed to know about floors? But sassafras!"

"For you," said her niece, giving her apron a little shake. "I have the impression that I overheard you sighing for some in your chirping little way yesterday."

"For Frank—yes, poor fellow! with his rheumatism; and it hurts him so to mow. Sassafras makes such a capital liniment—and so good in you to think of it, my dear! But how on earth you happened to know sassafras from dog-berry?"

"By a process of induction."

Mrs. McKay knit her sunny forehead, and said "Oh!" and looked as learned as possible.

"I tasted it."

The wrinkles smoothed out of Mrs. McKay's forehead, and she repeated her "Oh!" with animation.

"If it had been ivy-root you'd have eaten it all the same, my dear!"

"Probably," said Miss Stuyvesant, half-way up stairs.

"How delightful it is!" said the young lady at supper—what with the perfume of the wind, the golden butter, the glowing fruit, the cozy chatter, and that glimpse of mountains touched in beyond the door, finding herself in an idle trance of physical content.

"What is?"

"To be poor."

Mrs. McKay laughed merrily.

"We don't have cream on berries 'cept when there's company," put in one of the children with a pugilistic scowl. "Mother she just has to use it all for the butter, 'n then she goes 'n sells the butter, 'n I'd rather live in a big house, and have a pony and a candy-shop—so!"

"Oh, Frankie!" Frankie was hushed up in a flutter. Miss Stuyvesant looked at the mountains and heard nothing. To see her dreaming away with her great eyes there all supper-time, as if the rye-bread were ambrosia and that dining-room the seventh heaven! Mrs. McKay's eyes twinkled over at her husband as nobody's eyes but Mrs. McKay's ever did twinkle. To practical people who had lived through the washing and ironing days of ten years together, it was as good as Punch. But Miss Stuyvesant having left the city, and her parties and admirers and diamonds and dividends and account-books, and accepted in the stead thereof rye-bread and a room without any carpet in the corners, for the especial purpose of doing as she pleased, they let her alone, and she dreamed away the meal in her imperturbable silence, heard every word that was said and saw every look.

Doctor Enoch James, coming up to the gate just after supper, saw her sitting there upon the piazza, behind the vine-leaves, where the westering sunlight shifted, her profile just turned from him. There was a little of the Marie Stuart cut about it at times—in certain moods, and always when she was alone.

Doctor James stopped short, having no fancy to go in, anathematizing his errand with Mrs. McKay. He had hoped to accomplish it quietly and come away. He and this young lady clashed instinctively.

She raised her eyelids slowly as he passed her. His grave, nonchalant bow would have piqued some women. It simply puzzled Miss Stuyvesant. It was something she was not used to.

Mrs. McKay bustled out on the piazza presently with Doctor James. "Go home?" He shouldn't think of it, with a sunset like that! He should sit straight down and look at it. He sat down and looked at it. The sight was one Doctor James could not turn his back upon, even if Miss Stuyvesant's company must be its price. Ranks of purple phantoms serried round a tiny, golden grave; its head-stone a slab of crimson veined with fire; in the pallid blue above it the quivering of unseen wings.

Doctor James was startled from his silence by a curious, quick-drawn breath. "Now for a convulsion of well-bred enthusiasm!" he thought, in his bitter way. Leaning forward to pick up his hat he saw Miss Stuyvesant's eyes. "Hum!—used to the theatre, probably."

"I'm so sorry Frank lost it," said Mrs. McKay, softly.

"The coffers of the night thrown down, her treasures scattered golden on her silent floors," quoted the Doctor, under his breath. Miss Stuyvesant's lip curled.

"Isn't a sight like that free from contamination?"

"Contamination?"

"You can ask? Are the very skies to be likened to dollars and cents?"

Doctor James smiled. There was something peculiar about Doctor James's smile.

"To beggar and to prince alike! the matchless cry goes echoing and re-echoing through her ancient halls—let him that thirsteth come!" I see you were not familiar with the quotation, as is very natural; it is a prose work, somewhat rare—a great favorite of mine."

"For its financial allusions?"

Dr. James bit his lip. He felt that Miss Stuyvesant ought to have understood him. Apparently Miss Stuyvesant agreed with him; she turned suddenly, her cheeks faintly flushed.

"Dr. James, I believe I was rude."

Dr. James was standing with his hat in his hand, his tall height towering above her against the sky. He bowed, and begged leave to differ. That a poor country doctor could, in the nature of things, be otherwise than avaricious Miss Stuyvesant certainly was not justified in assuming. He would wish her good-evening.

"Dear me, dear me!" exclaimed little Mrs. McKay, in a flutter. "You two are always in a pitched battle! You never talk like charitable members in good and regular standing five minutes at a time—beg your pardon, Dr. James, I forgot, you are not a professor. What! not going so soon?"

The Doctor really must be going so soon, and Mrs. McKay tripped away down the walk with him, anxious to make the peace. In her good-natured little way Mrs. McKay was a bit of a gossip. Living there so long among the Vermont wildernesses, with a heart open like a lake to the merriest sunbeams of interest in every body and every thing, and with no more intense excitement stirring in town than the bi-monthly arrival of the peddler's cart (which bore the remarkable advertisement, "Two Fletchers," and of which, to this day, no citizen of Dunkirk hath the audacity to inquire the significance), is it much of a wonder?

In her cozy, confidential way Mrs. McKay began:

"Really, Doctor, you don't understand my niece."

"I never aspired to that honor, Mrs. McKay."

"No; but really—of course I know it's just as bad on her part—but you don't. She's not a bit more of an aristocrat than I am—it's only a way she has. She's as foolish and morbid because she has money as you are because you haven't."

Dr. James winced a little; but there was no resenting Mrs. McKay.

"You're both of you living in a strained, suspicious, unnatural mood, and you fly to different poles at sight of each other; and between you both you keep a poor little woman on pins and needles. I do so hate not to see people have a good time! Now, there isn't a truer girl in the country than Mary. She's as true as a Mayflower through and through; and so much as she does for Frank and me, under pretense of giving presents to the children, and so silly about her money too! I believe she'd will it all away to-morrow if she thought it right. Why, Doctor, have you any idea how much that girl is worth?"

"I prefer not to know, if you please."

Mrs. McKay opened her eyes wide.

Miss Stuyvesant was sitting very still when she came up the walk, her head resting on her hand. There was a certain contraction of her forehead which was a match for Dr. James's low whistle as he walked rapidly up the road, switching the thistles with his cane in his nervous way.

She sat down at Mrs. McKay's feet, her head thrown back, her soft dress falling around her like Raphael's draperies. Miss Stuyvesant's dresses always hung like a picture; which is a circumstance quite worth mentioning. Let a woman be "Juno when she walks, Minerva when she talks, and Venus when she smiles," if her dress is an inch too short, too long, too scant, her breadths uneven, the silk flimsy, her muslin limp, she is good for nothing in an artistic point of view.

"Auntie, I want to be talked to."

"Very well, my dear. Shall I tell you a story of the depraved little girl who quarreled with country doctors, and what a sad end she came to in consequence?"

"No," said Miss Stuyvesant, with decision.

"Dear me, Mary, how you made me jump! My dear, my style of conversation isn't adapted to eyes like that."

Miss Stuyvesant's manner suddenly changed. She threw up her arms a little in brushing her hair from her forehead.

"Auntie, auntie, I'm tired, and foolish, and troubled. Talk about yourself—tell me all about you and uncle, and the children, and the hard times, and just how happy you are—exactly; don't make up a bit. I want to hear something that is real and true. I get so puzzled sometimes."

"Why, my child, I've nothing to say. There's only the old story—Frank, and the doctor's bills, and the children's jackets, and a little dread that would be a worry if we would let it, for fear the two ends won't meet. But then they always do meet, my dear."

"But weren't you ever unhappy, auntie, in all that's happened, when all the Mondays and Tuesdays kept going on with their washing and sweeping and cooking and sewing, and no end to it all, and no way out of it—never a bit? Oh, I so hope you weren't!"

"Once, Mary, I was a little blue—just once. It was just after Frank's health broke down, and he had to give up his parish and take to this farm. It was so hard for him, poor fellow! and for six months we hardly knew where next week's bread was to come from, and the children growing so fast. I used to go up into my room sometimes, and just get down on my knees and throw up my hands over my head and cry—and cry. Some days that was all the prayer I could say any way, if you'll believe it—I was so wicked, Mary. But then Frank never knew."

It's easy enough to laugh if you try. There wasn't but one day I couldn't joke and carry on at dinner. That day Molly was just down with the scarlet-fever, and none of the children had had it, and we in this damp house with the fresh plaster and paint, and no doctor in town then to be trusted, and no money to get one from Burlington. I did try to speak up bright, and—I was just pouring the tea—and I broke down all at once, and cried out, 'Oh, Frank, Frank!' just as if I were a baby in a spasm, and expected him to give me paregoric, or something, you see, Mary, and so silly! I've never forgiven myself for that, and I never shall to my dying day. He grew so white about his mouth, and his eyes looked so. 'Delia,' said he, 'come here,' and he took me right up in his arms and let me cry as hard as ever I could—right there before the children, too. Mary, where did I drop my handkerchief?"

Miss Stuyvesant looked very hard at the sky where the early moon was setting.

"There was only one other time when I thought something was coming that I could not bear."

"I know."

"The fever lasted so long the Doctor gave him up. We'd said good-by and talked it all over, what was to be done with the children and all, and I'd kissed him and—well, he got well after all. What a goose I am! Where did I leave my handkerchief? Any way, those are the only two times I haven't been as happy as the day is long."

"And you were all the prouder of him because he was a poor man? And you never repented it one minute?" said Miss Stuyvesant, triumphantly.

"Repented it! Oh, Mary!"

Miss Stuyvesant's eager smile softened and quivered; her triumphant tones grew low.

"Auntie, you are so sure people love you. When they say you are dearer to me than any thing on earth you know they don't mean your United States bonds and petroleum shares. I would throw every dollar I own into the sea if I could, and begin life as a shop-girl—to dare to believe in people, to dare to take manliness, honesty, friendship for what they seem. I can say this to you—and it is a fact—that you are the only person I know in all this world who would not answer me with a superior smile and—oh, that's because you've never been poor. Money is quite worth having, Miss Stuyvesant; and what's the use of friendship without it? Poor people always quarrel, etc., etc. The very air is full of it, Aunt Delia. You breathe it in at every breath. It is the keystone to every novel. Magazine stories are flooded with it—avarice, avarice, avarice, told over and over, as if a woman could marry, could desire to marry, could harbor the shadow of a thought of marrying for any reason upon earth but a love so solitary, a love so mighty, that if she and it were alone in the universe she would say, I am content! As if a high-minded woman could talk about money, ease, position, home, as temptation to marriage—as if she could be capable of it!"

Miss Stuyvesant drooped suddenly, that curl on her lips, which would have fitted Zenobia, sharpening.

"And I—I have nothing. I can believe in neither man nor woman. You are all I have, auntie, all I shall ever have."

Mrs. McKay caught her outstretched hand with a quick movement, kissing it in her soft, petting way.

"Mary Stuyvesant, you are just as morbid as you can be."

"What! you don't understand me—you?"

"Understand you? Better than you understand yourself, my dear. But I don't understand that you can't have just as many friends as any body else. You can make your money just as much of a blessing to you as it is a curse to some other people. And every poor man, my dear, doesn't want to marry you for your money, nor every woman court your acquaintance for the sake of your parties. Hark! what's that?"

It was nothing but a little low cry from somewhere up stairs, but Mrs. McKay hurried away as she always hurried to such little cries.

"That's one of the uses you might put me to," said Miss Stuyvesant, impatient at the interruption. "If you'd only have the grace not to be as proud as Lucifer, and let me hunt you up a good stout Irishwoman! You see if I don't smuggle one into the house some day!"

Miss Stuyvesant paced the piazza many times that night there—the dark, her hands looked behind her. She paced her room a while too, in the same restless way, a set bitterness in her smooth, womanly face that ought not to have been there. She was morbid, of course. But a little story lay beneath the morbidness that the happy woman with the wide, cool eyes, singing away in the next room to her babies had never translated. Mary Stuyvesant had not loved. No. Otherwise, her history were ended; she was not a woman given to fancies; what was once was always. But somewhere in her life a bit of a dream had come to her, and faded, rudely.

A circumstance worth mentioning happened the next morning: the slight circumstances are the great ones in nine cases out of ten. Dr. James, coming up from the office, saw Miss Stuyvesant out in the garden in a calico dress and Mrs. McKay's old hat. She looked up as he stopped, her lap full of weeds, both hands in the mud.

"Miss Stuyvesant weeding!"

"She appears to be. Mrs. McKay has several other little things to do."

"Mrs. McKay asked me to bring her letters. You monopolized the box," said the Doctor, gravely, holding a letter over the fence. Miss Stuyvesant broke into a merry laugh, and raised her muddy hands. Dr. James's professional eyes noticed the blue veins on them; his democratic and critical eyes observed that she wore no rings.

"Dr. James, will you be good enough to open the letter and tell me who it's from?"

He hesitated from simple astonishment.

"I will not trouble you," said Miss Stuyvesant, haughtily.

He opened it.

"Ah, my man of business! And he knew I came here to be rid of him. Will you do me the favor to read it aloud, and save me the trouble?"

He read it. It notified her of the loss, by fire, of one of her stores, a new building, but partially insured. The young lady laughed a low, bubbling laugh, and tossed the letter away.

"Thank you. See the clover leaves I've pulled out of this pansy-bed, Dr. James—this one bed."

Dr. James leaned over the fence and looked at her.

"You care so little!"

She flushed to her temples, and rose in her queenly way.

"I am surprised that a gentleman of your perception should ask. Do you not see that I am heart-broken? What higher aspirations are there in this world than those bounded by four walls of granite and accompanying rents?"

Dr. James bowed and left her without a word. She dropped her weeds, opened her great eyes, and watched him walk away. That these two should misunderstand each other seemed inevitable. They gravitated away from each other by a law.

"Aunt Delia, I feel at this moment precisely as if I should like to hire myself out as your Irish girl. One could believe in one's rosary and the ghosts of one's first cousins, I suppose," said Miss Stuyvesant, going up to the house.

That next fortnight there fell a judgment upon Dunkirk. The why and the wherefore, the whence and the whither, no man knew; but the judgment came and was gone and left a great hush in its place.

Dr. James's journal will be, perhaps, for our purposes its best record:

"July 15.—The heat is intense. Thermometer 98° in the shade, not the shadow of a wind. There is a peculiar dry, scalding sensation in the air I never remember to have noticed in New England before. It reminds me of that week I spent becalmed just off Bombay years ago. I am not, to this day, capable of recalling that week without a gasp.

"I don't like the looks of things in the east quarter of the town. That case of Hoadley's disappoints me. Then there is Brandon; the man ought to be well by this time. The resemblance between the two cases may or may not be fancied. I can hardly tell as yet. Neither do I like the face of Brandon's wife exactly; there are circles about the eyes that had better not be there; the pulse ninety-six, moreover. But the woman complains of nothing. We must have rain.

"Passed that young lady from New York this morning, on my way to dinner; noticed her at a distance, owing to the fact that she wore a dress of some light blue stuff which shaded into the sky where she stood against it at the brow of the hill. She appears to fancy plain colors. I passed her with a bow, walking rapidly on. It may have been fancy, but I thought she looked a little surprised—she has a haughty way of drooping her eyelids when she is surprised. It probably was fancy.

"I had not gone far when I saw a lady's veil caught on a thorn bush—a delicate affair, blue, like Miss Stuyvesant's dress; there was a faint perfume of attar of roses about it. If there is any thing I particularly dislike it is attar of roses. Reasoning that she must have dropped it on the way down to the village, I deduced the conclusion that there was nothing to be done but go back and give it her. I did so with the best grace of which I was master. I was a little amused at the conversation; of course it was Hobson's choice to join her then.

"Thank you. I did not know I had lost it."

"I presume not. If it had been a five-hundred-dollar watch it would, without doubt, have been quite the same. These heiresses are extravagant from their cradles, always. In handing her the flimsy thing it caught upon my sleeve-stud and tore slightly. I made as much of an apology for my carelessness as I thought the occasion required. She interrupted me with a gesture of impatience:

"N'importe, n'importe! c'est assez!"

Her face was worth seeing when the words were spoken. That she should have insulted an inoffensive country doctor by addressing him in a language which he could not be expected to understand, I saw, and I was surprised to see, jarred terribly against her sense of the generous and the courteous. Her face flushed in its faint way; she turned abruptly to see the view (which, by-the-way, consisted of a high board-fence, a thicket of nettles, and an interesting and diminutive boy eating bread and molasses on top of a barrel). At that moment I was awkward enough to tread on her dress. At my 'Pardonnez, Mademoiselle!' she looked relieved. Her haughty eyelids, however, dropped in their surprised way for the second time.

"And that was literally every word that was said till our roads parted, and I left her.

"I incline to the theory that this young lady has been decidedly bored by something or other at some time in her life. I begin to have a faint suspicion of the basis on which she rests her opinion of me, if she does me the honor to have any, which is more than doubtful.

"The above is respectfully submitted to Enoch James, M.D., as bearing on the question, 'How shall a country doctor, with eight hundred a year, no rival, an epidemic coming, and a whole night's study before him, spend his precious time?'

"July 16.—Brandon's wife is down. The eldest daughter doesn't look right. I begin to understand matters.

"July 17.—The cat is out of the bag now, and East Dunkirk has made up its mind to immediate extermination. It appears to be a species of malignant fever; of the typhoid type, if it can be said to have any type. There are five cases within a stone's-throw of each other. The Brandon girl, though the most recent, is the most unpromising.

These people are wretchedly poor, and wretched poverty has little chance against an epidemic. Am doing what I can. The worst of it is, I am not made of stern stuff, and the women have such a way of wailing at you to save their husbands, as if you held human life between your finger and thumb, and could take it up or lay it down at pleasure.

"These still women cap the climax, however. There is that young creature, Annie Guest, sitting there all day with her eyes on David's face—they haven't been married three months. She never sobs nor cries out; she only looks up when I come in, and looks at me while my finger is on the pulse, and looks at me as I turn away. It makes a fellow feel so precisely like going away and saying his prayers.

"Went up to Mrs. McKay's to-day to tell her just how things are; the stories about town are so ridiculous—cholera, small-pox, and yellow-fever—all three have raged within the last ten hours, with attendant horrifying circumstances ad libitum. Such as Dr. James having told Mrs. Guest to order her husband's coffin, as the undertaker would be so busy shortly that it might save her some expense to do it now.

"I found Mrs. McKay expecting me, and unprepared to believe any thing till I came.

"This thing will grow, Doctor?"

"Probably."

"It may come to us, then?"

"Possibly."

"It is one of my rules to have nothing to do with evasions. Of all men I believe a physician is most culpable in the use of them. I believe there are few cases in which the simple truth, properly told, can do a patient harm. Mrs. McKay, at least, should always hear it.

"Her children were clustered about her as they always are; her husband sitting by the window. I believe McKay likes to keep her in sight as well as he did upon their marriage-day, or better. She stooped suddenly and kissed the little upturned faces; then went over to her husband and slid her hand quietly into his.

"I suppose I have caviled a good deal at the abuses and the shams of marriage; more perhaps than is necessary. There is something about this woman's love that always makes me feel like taking off my hat.

"Miss Stuyvesant followed me out to the door. The intelligence I brought had drawn no word from her. She had been quietly sewing (some of Mrs. McKay's work, I could see) in the corner. There was a light in her eyes that puzzled me.

"Dr. James."

"I bowed, and waited her pleasure.

"Can money help it any—this trouble?"

"Money can hire nurses and purchase ice—yes."

"I am so glad! I should like—Doctor James—"

"She paused, with a delicacy for which I had not given her credit, unwilling to remind me of the great gulf between us.

"I should like to do something for these people—any thing you think best. Will you do me the kindness to call upon me at any time?"

"I confess I was unprepared for this. This young lady has a fashion of developing where you least expect it. However, it is an easy thing to play the lady patron. One never feels so rich; and it is such an excellent method to remind people of the fact! Fancy Miss Stuyvesant's great eyes if you suggested that she come down herself into these wretched homes, from whence the frightened nurses have fled, and touch these parched hands with her own white fingers!

"Query: Is it preordained, predestinated, and in the eternal nature of things, that country doctors shall grow bitter as they grow old?—an inalienable instinct of the genus?"

"A ring at the door—the fourth this evening. The Brandon girl, probably. I had hoped for a little rest.

"July 18.—No rain. A sky like molten brass. Slow, purple hazes creeping like snakes down the valley; a mountain on fire four miles up the river. This grows serious. I have ten cases in one street. Hoadley died to-night, poor fellow! in a horrible spasm. I have done all I could for him—all human help could do, I solemnly believe. This thing puzzles me. I keep some cases from fatal termination: I effect no change—no cure.

"Later: 11 P.M.—Just back from the Guests. Eureka! These people have actually been drinking the water of that half-stagnant pond without a filter!

"July 19.—Still no rain. Those wells ought to be filled. I am afraid the mischief is too far under headway for me to do much with it. The people get drunk, and can not be made to take care of themselves. I have lost two more. Brandon is better; I shall save him. But things are in a terrible condition there. The girl got hold of some rum in some way, and is dying horribly. The woman can not leave her bed yet; the nurse has fled with a cowardice that would be ridiculous if it were not abominable. What is to be done!

"Since writing this page my question has answered itself. Right in the middle of the glaring afternoon, with that sun like molten brass in the sky, and clouds of dust like the smoke from a huge furnace, the whole length of a long mile's walk, some one opened Peter Brandon's door, and swept in a little breeze of Cologne-water and the flutter of a cool white dress. It was Miss Stuyvesant. She had a pail of fresh ice in one hand, and a couple of palm-leaf fans in the other.

"Miss Stuyvesant!"

"Dr. James!"

"What does this mean?"

"Just what it appears to mean."

"But I protest—"

"Protest if you choose. I don't know what difference that will make."

"You are not afraid?"

"Do I look like it?"

"But Mrs. McKay?"

"Bid me God-speed, and sent me down."

It is simply impossible for her to leave the children. I have wanted to come from the first. I suppose she read it in my eyes. You can go now; they want you in the next house. Have you any directions?"

"July 20.—I saw a sight to-night I never expected to see. The Brandon girl died at nine o'clock. I was sent for at eight, and found Miss Stuyvesant there, sitting like a statue, in her pure, soft dress; her face a little pale, one of her hands—they are slender hands and white, with neither gold nor jewels on them—clasped convulsively in the girl's rigid fingers. I declare it made me start to see that clasp—the girl has led a wretched, evil life. I stood a moment looking in at the window. The lady's regal head was bent a little in the lamp-light, her eyes—the lashes, I think, were wet—upon the open pages of a well-worn Book, bound in purple-and-gold. Her voice I could hear, but the words she read were lost. It was somewhere in the Gospels.

"'But I'm so wicked!' sobbed the ruin lying there, so still and listening.

"And then that woman, still clasping the other's hand, knelt down upon the wretched floor, beside the wretched bed, and prayed such a prayer as I never heard in any pulpit—as I never expect to hear again.

"Enoch James, there may be several things in this world you are not too old to learn.

"July 22.—The worst is over. I think I shall not lose more than one or two cases now, and have started the rest up hill. How much I have to do with it I don't know. There is no rain yet, but a brisk west wind is fighting with those snake-like hazes. Possibly what Miss Stuyvesant would call Providence is at work somewhere. David Guest has come out of the crisis a live man. His wife's face is worth walking ten miles to see.

"Now that the intense pressure of responsibility and terrible strain on my sympathies are lifted a little I begin to feel the reaction. I sit here in the cold, gray dawn and write on and on, because I have not the courage to stop and think.

"I suppose unconsciously I have written all these pages for the same reason—a Model Doctor you are, Enoch James! Our profession ought to be left to men with delicately-constructed pebbles in the place of nerves and heart.

"It rests me to write to-night, for I have something rather pleasant to write about.

"Miss Stuyvesant and I left David Guest's at about half past eight. She proposed going rather suddenly. Annie was taking a nap, but she woke her. I was surprised for the moment till I noticed—what I had been too busy with the man to notice before—a grayish pallor about the young lady's mouth.

"I hurried her out into the air, cursing the luck that had not predestinated me to ride this evening. Every other evening this week at that time my carriage has been standing there in the square.

"'You are not fit to walk!' I exclaimed, smothering an exclamation between my teeth which I fancy she must have heard, for, faint as she was, her eyes twinkled.

"'I am fit to walk. The greatest kindness you can do me is not to talk to me, if you please.'

"We walked on slowly and in silence, her hand upon my arm, the ribbon of her hat fluttering now and then against my cheek, the wind catching the faint perfume of the laced handkerchief she had thrown about her throat. She spoke only once to say:

"'I am afraid I tire you.'

"She was leaning somewhat heavily on my arm, and not a house in sight where a vehicle could be procured. I did not dare to leave her long enough to get one. At last she drew away her hand and sank slowly to the ground.

"'I believe I am a—little—faint.'

"The welcome lights from my hall-door were just in sight across the road; but they might as well have been across the Atlantic for her ability to reach them.

"'I am afraid you will have to let me take you in.'

"'No! oh no! I shall be better in a minute. It is nothing. I will just sit here till this dizziness passes off.'

"'Miss Stuyvesant, you will not sit here, and you can not walk a step, try as hard as you like.'

"I spoke in a tone I do not often use; and in a tone this young lady is not used to hearing. But I was proud enough, or foolish enough, or wicked enough—for there was not a particle of color in her face now—not so much as to touch her hand without permission. She looked up into my eyes. I don't know what she saw there, but I fancy she respected me at that moment—for the first time probably since she came to Dunkirk.

"She held up her hands to me like a child in the dark. I carried her in, gave her a tremendous dose of Cognac with one hand, and rang for the housekeeper with the other. There are few women or few men to whom I would have given just that dose. That it was precisely what Miss Stuyvesant needed I knew. It brought the color to her cheeks, her lips, her temples as if one were painting a statue. She sat up on the sofa and asked for her hat and gloves as if nothing had happened. I harnessed old Billy in a hurry and drove her rapidly home.

"Miss Stuyvesant, are you going to have that fever?"

"Doctor James, I have not the slightest thoughts of it."

"She will not."

"July 26.—How easy it is to say 'The worst is over!' Even such kings and counselors of the earth as Doctor James know precisely as much about it as a baby."

"I saw a pretty, womanly picture to-day. One of the McKay children had been sent for me with the simple message that I was wanted. I went as soon as I could get away. Miss Stuyvesant met me at the door with Mrs. McKay's baby in her arms, its little pink hands thrown up on her cheek."

"My work is here now, Doctor James. They are waiting for you up stairs."

"My inquiries revealed the fact that one of the little boys, straying away from his mother a few days ago, had wandered off with some ragged playmate picked up in the street into the very heart of the infected region, had spent two hours there before he was found. Mrs. McKay moved away from the bed as I came in, her eyes on my face. I wish I could forget the look of those eyes."

"I knew at once how it would be—the child was already in delirium. I gave some orders in a rapid way, which that woman saw through as well as I did."

"Doctor?"

"She said that, and that only, coming up to me presently, her hand on my arm."

"I will do what I can, Mrs. McKay."

"A slight shiver ran over her down to the tips of the fingers on my arm. She turned away and kissed the child with a sudden kiss."

"My little Frankie—mother's own little boy!"

"If she had wailed or sobbed a fellow could bear it. Miss Stuyvesant came in softly and took her hand. It seems as if I must save that child."

"July 28.—I may say 'I must' as much as I choose. I may spend half the night studying the case. I may—and I am not ashamed to write here that I did—get down on my knees and ask, in my blundering way, for the little fellow's life. What is the use? I have had a consultation from Burlington, but we can do nothing. It is one of those mysterious cases that baffle every thing; that come like a thief in the night and do their work, and are gone. I thought I had brought down the pulse once with aconite, but it was only a temporary relief."

"McKay is perfectly stunned. He sits with his face in his hands, moaning the child's name over and over. His wife comes up and just touches her lips to his forehead softly, and leaves him quiet. She sheds no tears; she seldom speaks. She bears him up on the strength of her great love and her great stillness, and, I believe, actually suffers every throb of his pain twice over where she is once conscious of her own. I always thought that fragile woman had the soul of a hero in her somewhere; she is more of a man than he, but she seems to love him all the more for that."

"Miss Stuyvesant is every where, does every thing. She keeps the children away out of sight and sound, nobody but herself knows where. The baby's clinging arms are about her neck all day. She is cook, housemaid, seamstress, nurse, and withal finds time and ways to manage to slip into the sick-room now and then, and let Mrs. McKay steal out for a nap. I see her often through the kitchen window, as I pass up the yard, in a muslin or calico wrapper and checked apron, her delicate hands in dough or gruel, her face flushed and weary and beautiful, the children playing softly about her. I hear her womanly voice, low and still about the house, falling like a strain of sweet music on its pain and its dread. I hear it when I come and when I go. I hear it long after I am in my solitary room at night."

"Sometimes, too, I go out and help her about her work, if I have a few moments to spare. We have cooked meat, and baked biscuit, and stirred gruel together. I thought myself learned in these departments from my experiences camping out in the Yosemite; but I find this city-bred heiress is a woman after all, and knows something of the wherewithal shall we be fed, in spite of her dividends. She is quiet and courteous; her eyes are right womanly, and her smile is always kind. Why not? Only the family physician—such a grave, unassuming man, with such a rusty-respectable hat, and the edges of his neck-tie frayed so perceptibly! To be sure, why not?"

"My German Bible lies on the table, open by some chance at the forty-second Psalm. I caught a line that I can't get rid of—'Was betrübst du dich, meine Seele, und bist so unruhig in mir?'"

"Later.—Received a sudden summons to-night from Mrs. McKay. Her niece met me at the door, and led me up stairs without a word."

"One or two of the children were sobbing in the corners of the room; McKay in the old attitude, his face buried in his hands, his wife leaning over the bed, her back to the door. She was speaking as I came in; her voice was low and still."

"Will Frankie kiss mamma once—just once?" "Can't?" "Well, mamma will kiss him, and that will do just as well—won't it, Frankie?" "Dark?" "Frankie needn't be afraid of the dark. Mother is close by him. Hold her hand so—no, she won't go away." "Sing?" "Well, she will try." And the quiet voice broke into chanting—some children's hymn that the little fellow was used to."

"She sang it without a tremor, and she sang it through to the end."

"I did what I could, but it was soon done, and the singing dropped softly away into silence, and the woman kissed the little dead face, and turned around, stretching out her hands in a curious way.

"Frank! Frank!"

"McKay groaned aloud.

"Frank! why, Frank! We have each other left, you see—don't you see, Frank? I have you, and you have me, and we—"

"She crept up into his arms with a stifled cry. We took the children out and shut the door.

"We stood there a moment in the entry, quite still, we two, with our unmarried, lonely lives stretching on into an unknown future, and I believe one thought was in the heart of both. I believe we envied that man and woman in their grief—in any grief, in any agony.

"August 15.—Miss Stuyvesant left for New York to-day at five o'clock. [Observation: How easily words are written!]

"I went up to the house to bid her good-by. It was an intrusion, of course, and I knew it; but I went.

"The carriage was already at the door, and I walked down the path with her to carry her little bag. The sweet graciousness of those days when death was in the house, and we struggled against it together, had given place to a certain hauteur in her manner, or embarrassment. I conclude the former. Her stylish traveling-suit—its soft drabs and blues suiting her face so wonderfully—the complete return to the elegance of her city life which showed so utterly in her dress (a woman's dress translates much of her unspoken history) dazzled me at first. I doubted for the instant—or rather I tried to doubt—whether the entire woman were not thus transformed into a thing of art.

"I doubted no longer when we reached the gate. She turned her face up to me with her rare, womanly smile, putting her little gloved hand frankly into mine.

"Dr. James, I have a confession to make to you."

"I stammered some protest.

"I grievously misjudged you once—so grievously that I can not tell you how."

"She was turning away at that, the bright scarlet color in her haughty lips; she has a curious way of showing emotion by the tint of her lips. I stepped before her in the path, caught her eyes, and held them.

"Miss Stuyvesant, I have learned something from you. May I tell you what? I have learned that to be wealthy is not always to be shallow; that position and accomplishments are not necessarily pride or vanity, or unchristian scorn of manhood and womanhood which God has not blessed with this world's gifts. I have learned from you what I have doubted all my life. And I have learned—"

"God knows what words were on my lips—mad words that were burning on my brain, and scorching my tongue, and crying like souls in pain to be uttered. What they were I believe I do not know. I do not wish to know. Whatever they were, remember, Enoch James, you did not say them—no, you have not said them. They are yours, and yours only; they are hushed with a great silence, until the day when the sea shall give up its dead, and hearts give up their mysteries.

"N.B.—Moral reflections spoil the beauty of a narrative, particularly when it is of a cheerful nature. Where was I? Oh yes; Miss Stuyvesant dropped her parasol suddenly, and the coachman swore at the delay sotto voce. I picked up the parasol, I believe—yes, I picked up the parasol. I also handed her into the carriage. She threw back an impulsive, girlish kiss at Mrs. McKay, who was standing in the doorway in her black dress, with her restful smile; fluttered her handkerchief a moment at the window, and was driven rapidly away.

"I believe I went among the trees back of the house, and watched the train whirl off into the sunset, and listened to its long, loud shriek. But I am not quite sure. There certainly could have been no reason for such a procedure. I seldom do a thing without reasons.

"Four o'clock, A.M.—The faint dawn is brightening; the gray hills outlined with crimson; the shadows turning green. How long have I paced this room? God help me!—I can form no idea....."

.....He had found her at last.

He had fled from her over seas, over mountains, over trackless prairies, over burning sands. He had stifled the vision of her face in Alleghany mists. He had dimmed it in the skies of the sunset lands—had drowned it in the beat of eternal waves—had ruled it out of his dreamings by the vagaries of a savage life. He had placed the width of a world between it and him. In the hospitals of Paris, in the caravans of Arabia, in scorched valleys of India, among nameless horrors of his profession, under blazing skies, under scalding winds, in jungles lighted by the glare of tigers' eyes, on shores where the alligator leered, and royal-tinted flowers breathed rare poisons, and the slow, sly hazes crept and rose over miles of purple, doomed solitude, stretching away and dimming into "places where no man is, or hath been since the making of the world"—he had struggled with this face, this womanly, gracious face, that neither time nor space could conquer; that no will of his could blur or blot from the place which it had chosen, forever bright and bleak beside him, with great, still eyes, and a smile upon its lips.

As he had fled from it, so he had come back to it—as one commanded.

And so on this night he had found her, in this fitting place, in this fitting way—the great, gay room filled with its splendor and its lights, its jewels, its costly draperies, its haughty smiles, its merry words; himself a stranger and estranged within it, with his bronzed face, and rusty coat, and awkward silence, tolerated there by the courtesy of a careless boy whose life he had saved in the horrors of a plague at Delhi—enduring the toleration, and gnawing his proud lips unseen, for the picture of the bright, bleak face that might be here among its like. Here, with no wealth, with no fame, where wealth and fame were all; with no passport but his manhood, where simple manhood was nothing, going back to-morrow to the old, dead days at Dunkirk, into his future of lowly toil, into years that the pictured face had left forever solitary—here, to-night he had waited for her, and she had come.

A voice at his side startled him roughly, as he stood half-hidden there in the curtain, his eyes on her as she came into the room.

"You are ill, Sir? Let me open this window. The room is close."

"Ill? No—oh no!"

His questioner, a flaxen-haired, wide-eyed belle, caught in that chance moment, in the strangeness of a crowd, a look that no human eyes had ever seen on the face of Enoch James. She remembered it to her dying day.

Miss Stuyvesant crossed the room in her swan-like way, her face rising like a statue's from her high-throated velvet dress, turned suddenly in the blaze of a chandelier, and saw him.

Her lips turned scarlet and paled.

Doctor James bowed gravely and stood still. Only the width of a mirror separated them. It might have become in that moment the width of a lifetime. He neither moved nor spoke. She neither moved nor spoke.

"Latest style from the Ganges! Voyez vous?" said a careless whisper from somewhere at the country doctor's elbow.

Miss Stuyvesant crossed in front of the mirror, her splendid length reflected in it, her eyes ablaze.

"Doctor James, will you give me your arm? I am tired of this room."

They crossed the gorgeous room, conspicuous in the gorgeous crowd, her gloved hand upon his arm, her velvet touching his rusty black, her head held like a queen's. At the conservatory door she stopped.

"We will go in, if you please," he said, his voice strange to himself, speaking as one who had a right to command.

She went in.

In a tangle of ivy leaves and fuschias, where the perfume of unseen heliotrope was faint and sweet, he faced her suddenly, with folded arms.

"You see I have come back. Do you know why I have come back? Do you know why I went away?"

She bent her head, a curious, listening look about her mouth.

"You know why I went away. You know why I have come back. I fled like a coward from that which has dogged me like my shadow. I turn to-night and face it. If it stabs me through all the slow years till I die, I face it. At its best or at its worst I face it. It is the love of a man to whom there is but one woman in the world; nor will ever be; nor can be."

He stood erect before her, with his head thrown back, with his folded arms—a man with his manhood only to offer her.

That listening look about her mouth sharpened like the look of one in an agony. If he had said but a word to her of his poverty, of his obscurity, of the contrast of his toil against the gorgeous dreaming of her life; if he had said so much as one word of it, she would have raised her haughty lids, wished him good-evening, swept out of the tangle of ivy leaves and left him. But he said no such word. Nor did he speak of that judgment with which she might have bitterly misjudged him—that judgment which in its possibility had, in certain silent hours of this man's life, almost wrung prayers from his lips that Heaven would decree her peniless and friendless. With something grander than pride he passed this by. In a silence more voiceful than any speech it hushed itself.

He loved her. That was enough for him and for her. He gave as much as he could receive from princess or beggar. The equality was accepted and simple.

"I think you know," he said, speaking very quietly and gravely—she could not see his hand clenched like iron out of sight—"I think you know what such a love may be. If it is worth any thing to you."

That listening look quivered out of her lips, their scarlet color shooting over them. She threw back her head, her face upturned to his.

"For the first time in my life I am rich. For the first time in my life I am proud—so very proud. Will you look into my eyes and see?"

He looked into her eyes and he saw.

OUR MINISTER TO MEXICO.

I.

I WAS standing, on a certain Sunday afternoon, in the centre of our Bible-class and of the question as to who Melchizedek was, when I observed a stranger enter the church-door and stand in the aisle. I was not sorry for it. The truth is, I was a little weary of Melchizedek; so much so, that I would have welcomed as a relief even the end of the world! Yes, better even than Melchizedek.

Permit me to explain.

In every Bible-class in Christendom there is a Mr. Yea, generally an old gentleman—lawyer, doctor, merchant. I am speaking not of a Bible-class composed of youth—that is altogether another question—but of an adult class, such as it was my lot to attend on the warm and slumberous afternoon of which I am speaking. And a thoroughly estimable Christian gentleman is Mr. Yea, especially on Sunday, so neatly attired, and with his thin white hair carefully brushed up, by the loving hand of wife or grand-daughter, from the sides as much as possible over the bald head. Long-considered and decided opinions are those held by Mr. Yea upon every subject, especially religious. In reference to Melchizedek and the date and mode of the end of the world, the old gentleman is very clear and exceedingly positive. If it were not for Mr. Nay it would make no trouble. Acid and alkali are quiet enough when kept apart. All the effervescence in our Bible-class was owing to Mr. Nay being a constant attendant thereon as well as Mr. Yea.

Much pleasure, doubtless, it would have afforded Mr. Nay if he could have agreed with Mr. Yea in reference to the theological points mentioned—only he could not, did not. If, only, while the one speaking could have been listened to, while proving his point, by the other! But not a bit of it; the one hearing really not hearing, only waiting impatiently for the other to get through to give his unaltered and wholly unalterable opinion.

No man could have strategized more than I did to keep these two estimable friends apart each Sunday; but, sooner or later, drawn together by the attraction of repulsion, would Mr. Yea and Mr. Nay fall into their inevitable deadlock, so stopping all thoroughfare for the rest of the class, and no police to help us. It mattered not what age of history our chapter for the day had reference to, the end of the world was almost certain to befall in some period of it; upon whatever theological platform we happened to be, the mysterious Patriarch alluded to was sure, like the Ghost in Hamlet, to rise through it and hold us spell-bound.

So that, when the stranger entered and stood in the aisle, I hailed him silently as a diversion. Mr. Yea and Mr. Nay, both sitting with their backs to that end of the church, went on with their swag-play, ignorant of the arrival, giving me time to study the person in question, standing as I did in the chancel.

And he was a man to look at twice at even under other circumstances; rather thick-set, very broad in the head and chest, clothed in the blackest and finest broadcloth, sumptuous Marseilles waistcoat, heavy gold chain across his bosom, a sparkling pin in his linen—a rotund, substantial-looking individual. There was nothing specially noticeable about his ruddy and clean-shaven face, save the very large and owl-like eyes out of which—as he stood, hat in hand—he gazed solemnly down upon us. Full five minutes he stood listening to the views of Mr. Yea, then gravely turned to hearken to the rejoinder of Mr. Nay for another five minutes, then came with slow step down the aisle, I making him a gesture of welcome to a seat near by as he did so.

"Could I see you, Sir, one minute?" he remarked, almost solemnly, in the brief interval, at that instant, before Mr. Yea resumed; and, with a word of apology to my class, I fell into his measured step down the aisle toward the door.

"I wish you, Sir, to marry me, if you will be so kind. My buggy and horses are at the door. I will detain you but a few minutes," he said to me in grave accents, and with smileless solemnity in his great eyes as we stood together in the vestibule.

Returning to my class, I begged them to excuse me for a while, and, taking my hat, withdrew, smiling to myself as I walked out of the church, both at my own escape and at the despairing looks of my class abandoned thus by me to Mr. Yea and Mr. Nay, as to both Seylla and Charybdis.

"My name, Sir, is Plantagenet Brown," remarked my companion, gathering up the reins of his bays, as I seated myself by his side in his very handsome vehicle.

"And the lady?" asked I.

"Her friends, I should inform you, are very much opposed to our marriage, will probably refuse to be present. Miss Amelia Agnew," replied the solemn bridegroom, in deliberate accents.

Amelia Agnew? And these handsome bays? Yes, I understood the whole thing on the spot, and while Mr. Plantagenet Brown is driving us toward his wedding I will inform you all about it. Plenty of time. Up to that instant every bridegroom who had ever come for me to perform the ceremony had driven at furious pace. Not so in this case. Nothing could be more deliberate and steady than my companion, holding firm hand, in richly embroidered gauntlet gloves, upon his horses all the way.

Amelia Agnew is a blue-eyed blonde of some eighteen years of age. If her own mother had only lived, Amelia would have been a highly intelligent and accomplished girl; even more beautiful, too. Unfortunately for Amelia, a certain December day had seen her, when a little flaxen-haired beauty of eight years old, weeping, beside her father, over the open grave in which is being lowered the mother and the wife.

It would not have been so bad then, even for Amelia, if, two years thereafter, Mr. Agnew could have contented himself with Amelia and Robert, now returned from his distant school, and let well enough alone in the society of his children. Oh, well, you would have done the same; perhaps even I myself, though a person of remarkably strong character, might have, in one case, yielded to the black eyes of Miss Parli, by our own relaxing hands—have, like Joe Keeweenaw, been carried off captive. Whether so Agnew, in spite of the warnings of friends, the entreaties of Robert, the passionate supplications of Amelia, looking enough like her dead mother of Agnew had more influence, marry Miss Parker to have Agnew did. In very little time thereafter Mr. Agnew finds it expedient to board with, as well as Robert, for Mr. Gray, of the firm of Gray and as clerk. If you have ever passed through Pottsb-Jones, you may have noticed the sign, "Gentle-burg Furnishing Establishment"—it is near the men's hotel. By-the-by, if you ever did spend leading day in Pottsburg you can not but have even observed my church there, the one on the court-observ square, as neat a specimen of the Norman house as you could desire to see.

Gothic, however, I rather think it was cowardly in Robert to abandon his sister; he had inherited that defect of character from his father.

Because he might have well known that poor Amelia would henceforth have to endure a double portion of the new Mrs. Agnew. To do Robert justice he did all he could, before being finally compelled to leave, to propitiate his step-mother. If he failed it is only what his father did, owing to the same weakness of character common to them both.

The plain fact is, being pastor of the church where the Agnew family worshiped, I knew all about it; Mrs. Agnew was in church on Sunday in her tasteful dress, and in her parlor with company, as fascinating a lady as you would desire to see; and in the bosom of her own household, at times at least, a very—let us say—Kate, as said Kate was when Petruchio first came upon her. Unfortunately Mr. Joseph Agnew did not possess one fibre of Petruchio in his whole system. Understand me distinctly, I can assert nothing of positive certainty in reference to the lady in question; never saw her strike Amelia—never heard even a bitter word from her lips in reference to Robert, Amelia, or any one else. Yet if Mrs. Agnew could only have been a topic of our Bible-class, her character as a shrew was so well known that on that point there would have been instant and perfect assent even between Messrs. Yea and Nay. She made a hell—I use the word gravely—of Mr. Agnew's house: no Universalist in Pottsburg in reference to that fact.

You observe it was that little Lucy of theirs, by no means an ill-looking child, which was the chain which held Mr. Agnew in his slavery. But that he should permit the only daughter of his dead wife—her living image, in fact, which was, I dare say, the very reason Mrs. Agnew so disliked her—to be so badgered and raided upon and nagged at and worried by his terrible wife is explainable only by the ten million other instances like it.

"But what has all this to do with our Minister to Mexico?"

Exactly. You are right. The condition of the Agnew family annoyed me for so many years that I forget myself when I come to speak about it. We can discipline members in my church when they—should any one of them ever do it, which Heaven forbid!—swear, steal, fight, get drunk; but Mrs. Agnew's case—more richly worthy of discipline than any of that kind—you can not lay hold of; there are no witnesses, no facts in evidence, it is that which irritates me if I ever yielded to irritation! Besides, I am an old man; have known Amelia ever since she was presented for baptism an infant; have read her miserable home-life in her face whenever I have met her for the last several years.

Of course here in Pottsburg we all are perfectly aware of just who and what Elias Lobkin is; yet I agreed when I heard of it, with every body else, that it would be, on the whole, better for Amelia to marry even Elias than to undergo that home martyrdom still. How very strange, by-the-by, that Providence should have taken away from us thoroughly excellent Mr.

Simms, our useful Senior Warden, as it did last week, and have left this Mrs. Agnew! The Latin poet—I can not recall his name—was right in what he said about the—Noverca, what is the adjective going before? How forgetful I am, I fear I am getting old in good earnest.

I mentioned Elias Lobkin. He was by no means our Minister to Mexico, and of him I have little to say. Yet if Elias was a pale, thin, undecided sort of youth, anointing his head and scanty beard with every hair-oil in his shop—Elias is a druggist—and perfuming himself with each and every essence therein, he is a good youth; truthful, and honest, and would have made Amelia an excellent husband. And I am satisfied Amelia has had some idea of marrying even Elias as the alternative—as that druggist would have called it—to her step-mother. Pity he is so awkward and excessively shy. Not two weeks ago I met him walking with Amelia. I am sure he could have seen nothing in my face or manner to have caused it, but the poor young man colored blood-red up to the very rim of his new hat when he saw me; and Amelia had a face in which unhappiness, vexation, and mirth were singularly blended.

All this, you observe, is by way of explanation as we accompany Mr. Brown.

"Did I understand you to say that all the friends of the lady are opposed to the marriage?" I asked of my companion, as he drove steadily along.

"I so understand," he replied, with great deliberation. "She is, as you must know, of age. I have the legal license," he added, after a pause, and, producing that document from his breast-pocket, after a good deal of ungloving of hand and unbuttoning of coat, he handed it to me.

Reading it carefully over, I found it all correct, and fell into serious meditation as to what I ought to do.

"My name is Plantagenet Brown. I am from the State of New York. I am a speculator. I am here looking into the titles of some lands," my companion proceeded in measured accents to inform me, after quite a silence between us, rolling his remarkably large eyes upon me with unspeakable gravity.

"Have you known Amelia for any length of time?" asked I.

"Two weeks to-day," equally grave.

"Is not that rather a brief acquaintance upon which to form a union for life?" I next reasoned.

"I am willing to take her upon it. She is willing to take me," was the sententious rejoinder.

Her step-mother is the propelling cause in chief, I said to myself; but what could the poor thing see in this owl-like stranger? Besides, I knew that Elias is desperately in love with her, and, unless I am very greatly mistaken, there exists some contract of marriage between them. As I said this to myself, my eyes fell on the splendid bays Mr. Plantagenet Brown was driving. Very fine animals they were indeed, groomed till their glossy hides shone like a mirror, every hair of mane and tail as accurately arranged as if by a barber with brush and pomatum. The vehicle, too, was a new and very handsome one, the most brilliant of rugs under our feet; the harness silver plated, the reins of scarlet silk.

The matter began to grow plainer to me. Let me announce it here as a fact worth saying and hearing: There is nothing which has more influence with a woman, at least with a blue-eyed blonde, than a span of fine and thoroughly trained horses. You may be ever so excellent a youth, ever so handsome, ever so well-dressed, and agreeable in manner, but, if you wish to make certain of your blonde, never visit her upon foot. Drive up to her door in a handsome vehicle of some kind, it matters not what, so that it be drawn by a pair of fine horses. I can imagine poor Elias Lobkin reaching the door of Mr. Agnew's house all heated and perspiring from a walk thither, meeting Amelia there in a fever and fluster of hair and collar and dusty boots. And I can imagine, too, this Mr. Plantagenet Brown not guilty of any such folly, but driving deliberately up to the front gate in this neat equipage, deliberately fastening his horses there in full view, not only of all in the house, but of all the neighbors, too—there is much in that also—and gravely marching up the front walk and ringing at the door. When Amelia meets him in the parlor he is cool, collected, powerful. I dare say he has had Amelia out riding with him, too; and these horses—even the red nets on them with their plentiful tassels not without their influence—have settled the question and Elias Lobkin. Perhaps Amelia, poor thing! preferred marrying some one who could and would take her away from Pottsburg and her step-mother.

I am afraid I am making a very long story of all this, but I have to tell the thing in my own way or not at all. As a general rule I do not think I am prosy. The remark to that effect in reference to my sermons which came to my ears as from Robert Agnew I ascribe partly to the extreme heat of the weather, largely to the defective character of that youth. In regard to him, it has lately occurred to me that his step-mother may have had grounds in the dissension between them.

"You are not going to stop here?" I said, as my new acquaintance drew up at the Widow Peterson's front gate.

"Yes. Amelia is here. They refused to permit the ceremony to take place at her father's house," replied my companion.

What very remarkable eyes that man had! The largest and most solemn I ever saw; and his whole heavy bearing in such contradiction to the hasty marriage in view. The fact is, I did not like Mr. Plantagenet Brown at all. Yet, in this, and in every thing else, I have a theory—rather a religion. It is this: when any unwellcome emergency arises, I do all in my power to avert it. If, after full and fair effort, I am powerless to prevent the evil, whatever it may be, I accept it as a blessing. If it be inevitable, it is from a Hand which sends only blessings, even the things seemingly evil being blessings in masks.

A very full conversation I had with the Widow Peterson, one of my communicants, a sensible soul, one who had known the first Mrs. Agnew well, and who had been a second mother to poor Amelia in all her sorrows.

"Her choice is only between this Mr. Brown and Elias Lobkin," she told me finally. "That terrible Mrs. Agnew has frightened away all the rest of our young men from visiting Amelia, although they all agree there is not a prettier or sweeter girl in Pottsburg: the fact that this second wife has her grip upon all the property has its weight, of course. You can not imagine, Sir, how the men dread that Mrs. Agnew!"

Yes I could. I did not tell Mrs. Peterson, or any one else, not even my own maiden sister who keeps house for me, but I was thoroughly satisfied that Mrs. Agnew was fully equal to the part of Mrs. Brownrigg, or Madame Brinvilliers, or Messalina, just as the temptation happened to be.

"If that Elias Lobkin had only a particle of spirit, poor, weak, wishy-washy creature that he is, he could have married Amelia months ago. Hesitating, stammering, blundering, blushing goose of a thing as he is! I have done all I could," said the Widow.

"Suppose I refuse to marry them?" I asked.

"It will do no good, Sir, whatever." They have taken all that, too, into consideration, and intend, if you do refuse, to drive right over to the Methodist preacher. He has had a hint that his services may be wanted, and is waiting at his house, in case they should come over, this moment. No, Sir, I know all about it. Amelia has made up her mind. She thinks nothing on earth can be worse than her present home. Oh, if I only had that Lobkin by the shoulders I could shake him well!" added the Widow, energetically, with extended hands.

Next I saw Amelia in her dressing-room. I found her in traveling dress, bonnet on. I might as well have tried to reason with a statue. The girl was cold, pale, tearless, like a loving creature driven to bay in a stony, trance-like condition. I doubt even whether she heard a word I said.

There was nothing to do but to marry them. I looked over the license again, trying to think as I did so.

"Would it not be well for me at least to see Mr. Agnew?—even Robert Agnew?" I asked of Mrs. Peterson.

"Bless your soul, Sir, I have done nothing else but see them every day these last two weeks. No use at all," said that lady. "Besides, who knows but this Mr. Brown may make her an excellent husband at last. At least, if we know nothing for him, we know nothing against him!"

Very well, thought I, as the stranger stood up before me at last, beside his stony-faced bride—stony-faced as Niobe, but as beautiful; behind your broad face and huge eyes there may be some blessing arrived from heaven in disguise for Amelia!

Only Mrs. Peterson and two or three neighbors, called in for the purpose, stood around as I demanded whether any one knew any reason why this man and this woman should not now be united in marriage. At this juncture, exactly as if it was a scene in a novel or a play, the form of Elias Lobkin burst upon the stage. I do not know, but have always believed that Mrs. Peterson had sent for him in her desperation. Any how, he had suddenly heard of what was going on, and there he was, standing in the door of the parlor, gazing upon us in a state of extreme bewilderment. Evidently he had come in a very great hurry; he was panting for breath, dripping with perspiration, red as morning, though late as evening. But bewilderment was the leading feature of his condition—extreme, unmingled, intense astonishment. While Elias was undoubtedly an excellent youth, most devotedly attached to Amelia, he was weak, painfully weak. His love for her had been steadily consuming what organic vigor he before possessed; and now his very love for Amelia, instead of animating him to action, only ran into and increased the intensity of his horror and amazement at finding her in the very act of being married to somebody else.

I had just consented in mind to the theory that Plantagenet Brown was a blessing in domino; having done all I could in the matter. Now I could not be sure but what Elias, instead, was that blessing. Pausing as long as I decently could, to give Elias time to get through his astonishment—"In proceeding to marry this man to this woman," I repeated, with the greatest possible deliberation and emphasis, "if there be any person here present who knows any reason why they should not be thus u-ni-ted in mar-ri-age, let him now speak, or forever hereafter hold his peace!" and I strung out the words as long as continuity of language permits.

Only amazement, pouring like a river from within—from eyes, from hair, and face, and half-extended hands, on the part of the astounded lover.

If the fool had only the sense to step forward, take Plantagenet Brown by the collar, pitch him out of the door, and marry Amelia instead! I was sure Amelia would have consented to almost any thing in her wretchedness, and I would have risked the matter in regard to the license. Clergyman as I am, I almost made the suggestion aloud. I do believe I would have actually done so in the crisis of the moment. The fact is, even in that rapid instant I thought of the editor of the Pottsburg Scream. Politically hostile to me, I knew well how sure he would be to parade all the circumstances of the case, frightfully distorted, in his columns, with all the adjectives, interjections, italics, and small capitals in his font of type.

To do good Mrs. Peterson justice, she had crossed over to Elias the moment of his arrival, had been whispering energetically in his ear from that time, apparently unheeded by Elias in that amazement in which his entire soul seemed pouring itself away. Now, Elias heeding neither that nor the opportunity I afforded him, that lady gave him a sudden pinch on the arm. "My gracious!" it wrung from his lips; from the shrillness of the tone I know it must have been as severe a pinch as a woman in an emergency could confer; but that was all it accomplished. He did not look toward her to see who or what it was—all his being pouring itself out in unmingled, uninterrupted, and un-interruptible amazement.

The case was hopeless. The man was a fool, and deserved to lose Amelia. I took a species of savage pleasure even in performing the remainder of the service which made them man and wife. Only astonishment, on the part of Elias Lobkin, at his sudden, irreparable, unspeakable loss, even unto the final consummation thereof.

As to poor Amelia, she stood there, looking me full in the eyes, as if she might fall into hysterics every moment. In fact, I had a rapid hope she would, and so give her lover time to recover from his trance. But no; she answered every question promptly, seemed in full possession of her nerves. Having known her from childhood I kissed her in conclusion—altogether too lovely a woman to squander on this large-eyed object standing beside her cool and grave as an Egyptian sphinx.

"I did intend, Sir," he said to me, as he gathered up the red silk reins, his wife beside him, to leave, "to have handed you a twenty-dollar gold piece for your services. After your extraordinary conduct this afternoon I will give you nothing at all, Sir, nothing!" rolling his eyes upon me and adjusting his embroidered gloves as he deliberately said it, and so drove off. After that no particle of doubt remained in my mind that he was a most unprincipled individual. My only regret was that I had not altogether refused to marry him.

I do not know how I came by the impression, but I feel positively certain that, as soon as the ceremony was over, the Widow Peterson—a robust and warm-hearted woman she was—laid hold upon poor Elias and gave him the shaking she spake of. I was glad of it—glad of it! Only, I am satisfied Elias was not at all aware of it at the time.

The whole thing took so short a time, too; on such minute pivots, infinitesimal yet jewels those pivots, does our life turn for good or for evil! Only a short time; for when I got back to my Bible-class Mr. Yea was not half done with Melchizedek—nor Mr. Nay either.

II.

It was just two years after all this, that, one morning as I was seated comfortably to my sermon, my little Harry—a remarkably intelligent nephew of mine—of ten years, came running in to my study exclaiming:

"Oh, uncle! just to think, here is Miss Amelia—Miss Amelia Agnew—don't you remember her?—coming up the front walk!"

With that he whips out again, and in a few moments returns, showing in no other than that lady.

"That will do, Harry," I said, as the visitor in question, holding her handkerchief to her face with her right hand, made a gesture as of dismissal to the boy with her left. Of course, I was curious to know all that had befallen Amelia since her marriage to her mysterious and remarkably large-eyed lover, yet I would gladly have postponed knowing it all until the afternoon.

No alderman more unwilling to be disturbed when seated at a tureen of turtle soup than I am when fairly seated at the composition of a sermon. With the very best sermon-paper which can be obtained from England, thick, smooth, creamy, before me; with a pen which glides smoothly to my thought over the same; with a text which unfolds itself on the paper, as I write, as naturally and as fragrantly as a damask rose in spring-time, I am as happy, seated to write, as men generally get to be in this vain and unsatisfying world. My own people understand this too well to interrupt me in the morning. I only wish they took the pleasure in hearing me read my sermon on Sunday from the pulpit that I take in writing it. Much preferring, had such a thing been feasible, to have put Amelia into the closet, and have locked her in there until I had finished my sermon, I, instead of that, put my sermon, with a sigh, in its drawer, locked the same from all possible contact with Harry, and turned to Amelia, who had sunk into a chair, and was sobbing and weeping—handkerchief to her eyes—as if her heart would break.

"And where have you been all this time? And how have you been?" I asked, gently.

"We have never had a fixed home, Sir," said my visitor, after several ineffectual attempts to speak. "Mr. Brown's business kept us traveling all the time."

Sobs, tears, handkerchief.

"How long since you came to Pottsburg?" I asked at last.

"Only yesterday evening, Sir. I am staying with Robert."

"Yes, Robert has married and settled down to himself since you left. He has forgiven Mr. Brown, I suppose. That is right," I said.

"No, Sir, Mr. Brown is not with me. And that is what I came to Pottsburg to see you about," said my visitor, in an agony of tears.

"Dear me! Is he dead? Ah, yes, I ought to have thought of it! I sympathize sincerely with you in your loss. My dear lady, this is a sinful, sorrowful world. If you had not first lost him he would have lost you—"

"Oh no, Sir, no; he is not dead; it is worse than death!"

And after a fresh burst of tears Mrs. Brown gradually became composed enough to remove her handkerchief and tell me her whole sad story.

She had seen trouble, plenty of it; that was only too evident from her haggard appearance. The last two years had dimmed greatly her beauty. Her very dress showed the cruel, or at least neglectful husband, so threadbare and faded it was. Once, in the abandon of her grief, she permitted a foot to peep out from under her dress as she sat. In its patched condition I read as at a glance her whole history, though she snatched it in again the next moment.

A long story from her lips; a short one from mine. In a heavy, unwieldy manner Mr. Brown had seemed attached to her from the first. He had supplied her with every thing—a good deal of jewelry especially. He had driven her about with him from place to place, until, I dare say, she became sick of the very sight of the bays, with their red and tasseled nets. In a solemn and sepulchral manner he had treated her not unkindly; but had, while purchasing all she desired, frozen her up by an unyielding gravity and deliberation of manner, for which he was no more to blame, I dare say, than an owl is for its huge eyes and imperturbable demeanor.

Who can tell what the man really was! Who shall estimate exactly what his convictions when that letter from Elias Lobkin—mere frantic folly as it was—fell into his hands? The man may have become tired of his wife; or he may have found her an impediment to his plans in traveling; or he may have got out of means and been compelled to it, in his own opinion, as a desperate step; or he may have been—I should not wonder if at last he was—a lunatic: something so super or supra natural in his aspect; or he may have really regarded himself as wedded to a guilty wife, or a wife liable to guilt. Whatever may have been his reason, certain it is that a raving letter from Elias Lobkin to his wife having in some way fallen into his hands, he had deliberately abandoned her. It was in a town some two hundred miles from Pottsburg it happened.

"He came into my room at the hotel, one day just before dinner," poor Amelia told me, "read me a long rigmarole of stuff I never heard of before, with Mr. Lobkin's name at the end of it; read it slowly and carefully, as if it was somebody's speech he was reading from a newspaper. When he got through he folded the letter up, put it back in its envelope, handed it to me; took out his pocket-book and gave me what he said would be enough to take me back to this place; told me I would never see him again; put on his hat and walked out—all as deliberately as if he was doing the most ordinary thing in the world. And that is the last I have seen or heard of him, Sir," said the deserted wife, with a fresh burst of tears.

It seemed that, ashamed of returning to her old home, Amelia had removed to another place from that in which she had been abandoned, and had supported herself, partly by millinery work, but chiefly by the sale of her jewelry.

"It has been just six months since Mr. Brown left me. About four days ago it suddenly came into my mind that you, Sir, should find him and bring him back," she said.

"What!" I exclaimed, with astonishment.

"Oh, Sir, I feel sure you could!" she repeated over and over again, "sure you could, sure you could!"

I could not but smile at the absurdity of the request. Even if I had the least idea as to where the man had gone, what could I write to him that would have the smallest influence upon him? Preposterous as the whole thing seemed the deserted wife insisted upon it. She was just of that temperament, you observe—gentle, trustful, far from possessing a strong mind, and that mind having been left fearfully undisciplined, owing to that most unfortunate second marriage of her foolish father. So positively certain was she that the bringing of her husband back lay altogether in my power that, after being first astonished, then irritated, I at last began to pity, even to respect, the strong and unfortunate faith of the poor girl in her minister.

"I can not imagine what possesses you and Elias Lobkin," I said, at last, hoping to divert her attention, as I would a child's, from her ridiculous idea. "Do you know, Madam, that, after you were married, Elias acted as absurdly toward me as you are now doing? I can not imagine," I added, "how there can be two such nonsensical people in the world. I suppose you never heard of it—how could you? but the very morning after you were married you should come to see me—in the morning too—in the midst of my writing, but Elias Lobkin. And what do you suppose he told me? He sat down, just in that very chair you now occupy, and began a long denunciation of me for having married you to Mr. Brown. 'You must have known,' he said to me, 'that Amelia Agnew was solemnly engaged to be married to me, Sir, and you went—you, a minister of the Gospel, Sir—you went and actually married her to another man! I am astonished at you, Sir!' he said. 'I was so astonished that you, Sir, should do such a thing that I could not believe my own eyes, Sir, when I saw you actually marrying her to that man. No, Sir, I thought so different of her, Sir, and thought, up to that moment, so different of you, Sir, that the double disappointment was too much for me, Sir. Before I could bring myself to believe the thing possible, Sir, the couple were married, married by you, Sir, and got into their buggy and gone, Sir!' And would you believe it, Amelia," I added, "that foolish fellow actually expects me, in some absurd way, to undo all I have done in the matter! 'You have done me a great wrong, Sir,' he tells me whenever we meet, 'a very great wrong—you who should be an example to others; and you must undo it, Sir!'"

"The man is doing extremely well in his drug business," I continued, "and is much graver, very much more respected than I thought would be possible of the weak youth I always regarded him. Yet, absurd to say, he persists in that insanity of his still—that I was guilty of a moral wrong in marrying you away from him, and that I ought, in some way, to repent of it and undo it. He has the most singular way in the world of looking at me in a sorrowful, reproachful manner whenever we meet, as if he was a grossly injured individual, and I a persecutor obstinately refusing to repair the wrong! I do hope," I said, at last, "that you, Mrs. Brown, will, at least, have more sense than poor Elias."

For my part I have long ceased even attempting to understand human nature, especially in the case of a woman. Mrs. Brown had listened to me with interest, but without the least perception of any thing amusing in the course of Elias—listened till I was through, and then reverted immediately to her own request.

I must hasten to a conclusion, as I say toward the close of my discourses, and I imagine that movement of relief on the part of my readers at this which I have observed, with regret, in the case of my congregation at the same.

On coming down to ask Mrs. Brown where she imagined Mr. Brown to be, and how she supposed I could accomplish his return, all she had to offer was a conjecture on her part that he was "either in California or Mexico," and that I was "to write;" and so left me, for the time, on my desperate promise to do what I could; left me with actually a smile of relief on her face as if her mind was at ease; a smile which showed me how easily all and more of her former beauty—an Irish bull, only I am perfectly cognizant of it—would return with the return to her of prosperity.

It was too late for that morning to begin again at my sermon, so I took out of its drawer a quire or so of my very best and largest letter paper; and, from the text supplied me by poor Amelia, proceeded to address what might be called a discourse to three congre—I mean parties, videlicet: The Governor of California, the United States Consul at Vera Cruz, the Minister for the time to Mexico. I flatter myself that it was as concise yet as practical a composition as a man could well prepare on so extremely meagre a theme.

I described the fugitive husband with photographic accuracy—a thing easily done, he being a man who, as the daguerreotypists say, "took" easily. No more possibility of mistaking him for any other man than of mistaking an owl for any other fowl. With terse pathos I also placed at their feet the forsaken wife, making it also as exquisite a specimen of cabinet art as in the compass of my poor ability. In fact, from the outset of my effort, I entered into the matter with as much zest as I ever did into a sermon when I knew my bishop was to be of the audience. Well knowing how very much depends on such things, I was extremely careful to make my communication beautifully legible, so that it would be rather a pleasure than otherwise to the persons receiving it to read it. The fervor, too, with which I appealed to the functionaries to exert, each one, himself and all his employés, to search for, find, and send back home the recreant husband, brought tears of manly emotion to my own eyes as I wrote.

It was not until I had actually mailed the three epistles that the absurdity of the thing smote me—so easily does the heart delude the head. Perhaps the casual glimpse I caught of Elias Lobkin at the counter of his drug store, as I walked by it in returning from the post-office, was not without its effect. He was administering a glassful of some compound over his counter to a ragged, sickly-looking little boy as I rapidly passed the door, and, in the same swift instant, administered to me also that sorrowful, reproachful glance, as who should say, "Ah, Sir, you well know you ought not to have wronged me so cruelly; you well know you are withholding from me the reparation so justly my due!" And, on the instant, I thought, "Well, when Amelia finds that my efforts in her behalf have failed, who knows but she may become Mrs. Elias Lobkin at last! I hope so."

Now this narrative has not the value of a straw apart from its being the simple fact. Unless the writer flatters himself too much, he is sufficiently known to the conductors of this Magazine to hope that, on his positive assertion, they will accept his statements as the truth; you have only, then, to turn to the cover, or to glance at the top of the page, of this periodical to behold his ample indorsement.

Let me tell the entire truth. To me one of the most remarkable parts of the whole affair. The reader will hardly credit me when I state, that up to this moment I have never had a line of reply from either the consul at Vera Cruz or the Governor of California! Gratitude for my letter should have prompted an acknowledgment of its receipt, even if they could report nothing more. But let that pass.

From our Minister to Mexico I did receive a reply, prompt, courteous, assuring me of his deepest interest in the matter in hand; promising, by his own efforts as well as by those of all his attachés, to do his best to find and return to the bosom of the disconsolate wife her flying partner.

I confess I was a good deal surprised at the speedy and satisfactory response I had awakened—this echo, quick and clear, from the slopes of Popocatepetl to poor Amelia's cry through my lips. Yet it shows, not how perfect her woman's trust in me to help her, but how divine are a woman's intuitions; how vastly superior to man's reasonings; as much swifter and superior to man's laborious logic as is the dart of a dove down upon its nest to the crawl of a mole after its worm: this shows all this, that Amelia was not at all surprised at our Minister's letter when I handed it to her, took it entirely as a matter of course.

"Robert has been so kind," she said to me. "He has agreed to be entirely reconciled to him when he comes, thinks he can put him in a way of settling down here in business."

"When who comes?"

"My husband, of course," she replied, looking at me with wondering eyes. The woman had improved amazingly since I had promised to do what I could to get her husband back, was getting positively beautiful again.

"I am making up, don't you think it will be pretty?"—she continued, holding up for my inspection some of womankind's flimsy gear upon which she was at work—"making up one or two new dresses Robert has given me by the time Mr. Brown gets home. I'm almost afraid I will not have them done in time."

As I was leaving she followed me into the yard with such a docile, dependent motion and manner.

"Would you believe it, Doctor? that odious Elias Lobkin actually attempted to call upon me. I would not see him, of course. I am sorry for the poor man; but Robert has told him from me that he must never come near the house. Perfectly crazy he is about me, Robert says. Did you ever hear of such a foolish creature?" she added, with a blush and a smile.

Yes, she was getting to be very pretty; virtuous I never for a moment doubted; too transparent a creature to hide even a thought of guilt. You could have seen the least speck of that in her instantly, had it been there, as you can see any floating mote in a glass of water when held up to the light.

Not six weeks elapsed before I had another letter from our Minister to Mexico.

"I have found your man," he wrote in triumph, "very large-eyed, owlsh featured, deliberate in manner, as you described." The fact is, our Minister had made all his agents in Mexico detectives in the matter; had cast his diplomatic drag-net over that whole republic, and Mr. Plantagenet Brown was too portentous a fish to escape. And my warm-hearted Machiavel proceeded to inform me exactly how and where he had captured Mr. Brown—the solemn lecture he had read him—catching, I feel confident, the inspiration thereof from my communication; in substantial token of which he inclosed in the letter a hundred-dollar bill as earnest that Mr. Brown meant what he said in promising to return to his wife forthwith. Had it been the amount due her from me for, say the making of a new surplice, Mrs. Brown could not have seemed less surprised than she did when I hastened to give her the letter and its inclosure.

"I was only afraid he would be back before I had my dresses done and our room fresh papered for him," she said, innocently.

"Ah, well, it is all very pleasant for you," I remarked, in leaving her at last, "but it will be death to poor Elias. I am almost afraid he will do something rash when he knows it; all sorts of poisons stand so ready to his hand upon his shelves." And I was more than half in earnest in my fears.

"Oh, it will all be right for Elias yet!" she said, with a sunny smile. "Poor fellow! I have no notion how; but I feel, in some way, it will all be right for him at last. And I am sure you feel so, Doctor; now don't you?" she said, as she followed me—there was something like a pet lamb in the woman—to the door and the front gate.

I am a bachelor myself, far too advanced in years now to get married; but I wonder if married men understand any thing more of the female heart than I do!

Just that day seven weeks I stood under that roof again. Amelia was there, but not smiling this time; weeping, silently weeping, weeping copiously too, as if her poor heart would run itself away in tears. For on the bed, in their newly-papered room, lay her husband returned only to die.

It is exceedingly strange—and I have studied it closely for the last forty years—the providence of Heaven. In accordance with his promise to our Minister in Mexico Mr. Plantagenet Brown had closed up his matters there as rapidly as he possibly could, had laden himself with huge trunks of presents for his wife, had made the whole journey in safety until within a mile of his journey's end. At that point the stage horses had taken fright at a child drawing a little wagon beside the road, and run away, frightfully injuring the returning husband. The other passengers had managed to leap out and escape. I suppose it was partly owing to his burly form, largely to his excessive slowness of habit in all he did; but Mr. Brown remained in the stage, was taken out of its fragments, and borne to his waiting wife only to linger a few hours in great suffering and die.

I had no conversation whatever with the dying man. It was too late when I was hurried, singularly enough, from my Bible-class, and from between Mr. Yea and Mr. Nay, again, to the scene of death. Robert Agnew has told me (Mrs. Brown never opened her lips to me on the subject) that the husband had a long conversation in private with his wife before I came. I rather think there was a flash of recognition in his remarkably large eyes rolled upon me as I entered the room; but, even as I began to address myself to the man, the broad, brown face grew ashy, the eyes quivered and glazed, and, with a slow relaxation of the hand clasped in that of the weeping wife, the wanderer was gone, and gone to a land in which our Government has no—Lest there should seem to be even the faintest irreverence let the thought remain unspoken.

I dislike very much this being so hurried toward the close of my remarks—I mean narrative. For two reasons.

First. I wished to have described at length how I married Elias Lobkin to Amelia in just eleven months after her husband's decease.

VOL. XXXIII.—No. 195.—A A

They were by no means as vigorous in intellect, either of them, as I could wish, or they would have postponed the matter for one month longer at least. Though, to do them strict justice, their mutual trials have expanded their characters beyond all I could have expected; deepened and strengthened their characters greatly. However, in the case of Elias especially, I refer the fact of his standing so much higher as a business man than I ever dreamed he would, not only to all his constitutional bewilderment having been literally poured out of him at the marriage of Amelia to her first husband; but also to the fact that, to the surprise of us all—regarding Mr. Brown only as a big and empty bubble as I at least did—there were found papers in his possession establishing him to be a rich, I may even say, a very wealthy, man in bank stock, railway shares, real estate, and the like, as well as a large amount in cash, found on his person after death. It is the control and management of this addition to his means which has gone far to develop Elias Lobkin into the really first-class business man all of us in Pottsburg now regard him as being.

Secondly. I did wish to enlarge a little, by way of application, upon several heads or inferences drawn from the above: as that—

(1.) Government should make it the official duty of its diplomatic agents to restore, on application, delinquent husbands to their wives if found within the nation to which they are accredited. If there exists no extradition treaty to that effect with every people with whom we now hold official relations, the sooner such treaty is negotiated the better. As to the question of delinquent wives I am not so clear.

(2.) I have the greatest possible faith in the Intuitions of Woman as distinguished from the Reasonings of Man. It is very remarkable that, as yet, no work has appeared upon this most philosophical and fruitful and practical theme. I would deprecate, however, the publication by any one, on this suggestion, of any such treatise, as I intend, at my earliest leisure from parochial duties, to prepare and publish one myself.

(3.) And in conclusion. No man has a right to refuse attempting any thing, honorable in itself, when providentially pressed to do it, even if the probabilities of success are of the slightest. We can not tell through what labyrinths and to what glorious outlet even the frailest thread may lead us. I have no reason to think that the sermon I laid reluctantly aside when I wrote that letter to our Minister in Mexico did any body any particular good, while the letter itself was the means of bestowing life-long happiness and wealth upon a most deserving pair; a refuge and home, by-the-by, to Joe Agnew when his black-eyed virago of a wife at last robbed him and eloped with a gambler; most of all, brought a bad man to repentance, even though that repentance occasioned his death, in good time, perhaps, before he was tempted again to sin in the same way.

AN INQUIRY INTO ONE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL RESTRICTIONS ON THE REVENUE POWERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS.

AN inquiry into the constitutional restrictions upon the Revenue Powers of the United States will be forced upon us sooner or later, as a matter of the gravest concern to the whole country; and such an inquiry can not be unwelcome, if conducted with a love of truth and a sincere desire to discover what those restrictions are.

It is not to be presumed that any enlightened administration of the government will rest satisfied with the mere procurement of means sufficient to meet its current expenses and the interest on its debts, regardless of the fact that the legislation of the day may be drawing vast sums into the Treasury by methods not warranted by the Constitution. A great government like that of the United States, bound by definite rules in its fundamental law, can not afford to live from hand to mouth, at the risk of merely changing its creditors; and if statutes of limitations are interposed, as a means of protecting the Treasury to some extent against the reclamations of those who may suppose themselves to be unconstitutionally taxed, the signs of the times admonish us that acquiescence can not always be expected, and that questions which will touch very large sources of our present or proposed revenues are extremely likely to arise.

If it is true that a system of revenue has been arranged with an altogether insufficient attention to the constitutional limits of the revenue powers, a decision by the judicial department adverse to some important branches of that system would obviously cause a serious embarrassment to the government, and possibly a derangement of its credit. Such decisions must in all probability be sought; for the pressure of Federal taxation upon the property and industry of the country, narrowing as it does the resources for the support of State and municipal governments, and placing heavy burdens upon individuals and corporations, will inevitably give rise to questions of the most serious nature respecting some parts of the Federal revenue system.

In what manner the details of an internal revenue system can be best arranged is, as a question of revenue and public economy, one that I am incompetent to discuss. But if I presume to think that my studies have not unfitted me to explore the origin and limitation of Constitutional Powers, or to suggest the great reasons why an entirely unrestricted revenue power was not conferred upon the General Government, I shall not be thought by candid men to be stepping beyond my sphere, when I endeavor to contribute something to the right understanding of a subject which involves interests, both public and private, of incalculable importance. I propose, therefore, to invite attention to the rules under which the Constitution requires the Federal Government to exercise its revenue powers.

That there is occasion for such an inquiry can not be doubted. Notwithstanding the Constitution bears upon its face two special rules for exercising the revenue powers, an examination of the existing system of internal taxation will show that while we are raising from four hundred and fifty to five hundred millions of internal revenue, the whole, or nearly the whole, of this vast sum is levied without any apportionment between the States, according to the census. It is levied, in other words, as if it ought not to be assessed as a "direct tax," but as if it were all rightfully classed under the constitutional heads of "Duties, Imposts, and Excises."

The practical construction of the Constitution, under which we have been acting since 1861, seems to proceed upon the idea that the "direct taxes" of the Constitution embrace only capitation or poll taxes and taxes upon lands, and that every other species of governmental assessment that can be devised by the ingenuity of those who are solicitous (and rightfully so) to obtain money for the uses of the government is either a "duty," an "impost," or an "excise." Either this is the assumption, or else it is supposed that there may be taxes which Congress is not required by the Constitution to lay according either to the rule of apportionment or the rule of uniformity, but which it may lay under either of those rules, or under any other rule, at pleasure. For, it is to be remembered, that the Constitution, after having granted the general power of laying Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises, has directed that capitation and all other direct taxes shall be laid by apportionment among the States according to the census; and that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be laid by the rule of uniformity; that is to say, so that the rule of assessment shall be the same in all parts of the Union, however various may be the total amounts which are collected in different States.

Now it is apparent that unless these two rules were intended to embrace and exhaust the whole taxing power of the Constitution, there may be taxes which can be laid by Congress that do not fall under either of these rules, and can be laid by any rule which Congress may see fit to adopt. If, on the other hand, we suppose that the two constitutional rules were intended to embrace and exhaust the whole taxing power, the present internal revenue system would appear to be founded on the supposition that the rule of apportionment comprehends only capitation or poll taxes, and taxes upon lands; and that all the other internal taxes which we are now levying belong to the class of "duties," "imposts," or "excises." Thus we have, for example, a tax on Incomes, a tax on the gross receipts of Railroad and Express Companies, a tax on Occupations or Professions, a tax on the gross receipts of Insurance Companies, Telegraph Companies, and Theatres; a tax on the average deposits and the capitals of Banks; a tax on Legacies and Successions to real estate—and many others, which, although they are called “Duties” in the laws which impose them, are essentially assessments upon persons or corporations in respect of some mass of property or money of which they are possessed at a given time. All these are laid without any regard to the rule of apportionment, and as if they were rightfully laid by the rule of uniformity; and it is obvious that if this legislation is constitutionally correct, it is so either because the “direct taxes” of the Constitution comprehend nothing but poll-taxes and taxes upon lands, or because there are taxes which are neither direct taxes nor duties, imposts or excises, within the meaning of the Constitution, but which Congress may lay by any rule that it sees fit to adopt, and which it does lay by the rule of uniformity, for convenience only.

Certainly it would be difficult to conceive of any tax, or legislative assessment, more direct in its operation and nature than a tax on a man's income, or a tax on the gross annual receipts of a corporation: and if these are not “direct taxes” in the sense of the Constitution, it must be because that term is confined exclusively to poll-taxes and taxes on lands, or because there are taxes which, however direct in their operation and nature, are still nothing but duties, imposts, or excises, or which, being neither the “direct taxes” of the Constitution, nor the “duties, imposts, or excises” of the Constitution, may be laid by Congress at pleasure.

No further illustrations, therefore, it is presumed, are needful in order to show the importance of the inquiry which I propose to make. That inquiry, reduced to its simplest form, is this: WHAT IS THE MEANING OF THE TERM “DIRECT TAXES” IN THE CONSTITUTION?

In any attempt to answer this question it will be necessary to state all the provisions of the Constitution which grant and which regulate or restrain the Revenue Power. For this purpose they may be grouped together as follows:

“ART. I. § 8.—The Congress shall have Power—To lay and collect Taxes, Duties Imposts and Excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.”

“ART. I. § 9.—No Capitation, or other Direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the Census or Enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

“No Tax or Duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.”

“ART. I. § 2.—Representatives and Direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined,” etc.

In examining the meaning of the term “Direct Tax,” as it is used in these clauses of the Constitution, I propose to consider—

First, Whether there has been any Judicial construction which fixes the meaning of this term?

Second, Whether there has been any Congressional construction, so uniform, full, and clear, since the adoption of the Constitution, that it ought to be considered to have settled the meaning of this term?

Third, What appears to have been the understanding of the framers of the Constitution and of those who ratified it, when they established the rule relating to Direct Taxes?

Fourth, What is the construction which the provisions and purposes of the Constitution appear, on principle, to demand?

I.—THE JUDICIAL CONSTRUCTION.

Under this branch of the inquiry it will be necessary to notice the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject of the carriage tax, which was held not to be a direct tax. I refer, of course, to the case of Hylton v. the United States, decided in 1796.* As usual, it is necessary to discriminate between the point actually decided in this case and the arguments and reasonings of the judges. At that time there were six judges in the Court: Ellsworth, Chief Justice; Chase, Paterson, Ireland, Wilson, and Cushing, Associate Justices. The Chief Justice and Judge Cushing did not sit at the argument of this case, and took no part in the decision. The decision was therefore made by four judges. The leading opinion was delivered by Judge Chase, but the other three judges also delivered opinions. Their reasonings were various, but all the four concurred in holding that a tax on carriages is an indirect tax, because it is indirectly a tax on expense or consumption. A carriage, said Judge Chase, is a consumable commodity, and an annual tax on it is on the expense of the owner. He classed it, therefore, among the “duties” of the Constitution. Such is the precise point decided in this case.

Among the suggestions made by Judge Chase and some of the other judges, on this occasion, in the course of their reasoning, but not involved in the point judicially decided, was this: that as the Constitution embraces a general power to lay “taxes” as one power, and a power to lay “duties, imposts, and excises” as another, and as it applies the rule of apportionment to direct taxes only, and the rule of uniformity to “duties, imposts, and excises,” if there are any species of taxes that are not direct, and not included within the words “duties, imposts, and excises,” they may be laid by the rule of uniformity or not, as Congress shall think proper. But the case did not call for a decision of the question whether the Constitution did in truth contemplate taxes which are neither “direct taxes” nor “duties, imposts, or excises;” and Judge Chase did not suggest what would be such a tax. All that the Court had to decide was, whether a tax on carriages is a “duty;” and they held it to be so, because it is an indirect tax falling on consumption or expense.

This decision, therefore, when we keep in view the point decided, will always be regarded as a precedent of considerable importance, because, so far as it extends, it shows the quality that makes a tax indirect, and e converso the quality that makes a tax direct. It shows that directness of assessment on the thing that is the subject of assessment, while it may be one element of discrimination, is not of the essence of the distinction; for a tax on a carriage, so far as the directness of assessment is regarded, is no less direct than a tax on an acre of land. Some other element of discrimination is therefore to be sought; and it is found by regarding the tax on a carriage as a tax on consumption, or expense, while a tax on land is not a tax on a thing that is undergoing consumption, and is not laid with any reference to the fact whether the owner is expending the value of the land, or with any presumption that he is so doing. The tax on land is an assessment upon a mass of property in the hands of the owner, and is imposed, not because he is consuming or wearing out the land, and therefore that he ought to pay tribute to the public in some proportion to the expenditure at which he lives, but because the land is a portion of fixed capital, on which an assessment can be easily levied, and is levied whether the owner is consuming that capital or preserving it, increasing or diminishing it, or leaving it as it is. The tax on a carriage, on the other hand, according to the theory of this decision, is levied upon the ground that the owner is consuming the capital invested in it, and the public levies upon him a tribute in some degree proportioned to the rate of expenditure at which he lives, and levies that tribute upon the article which he is consuming.

There is no other sense in which this decision can be understood. If it is to be regarded as sound law, it must be accepted as having established, in our constitutional law, as one of the grounds of distinction between a direct and an indirect tax, that the latter is of such a quality that it reaches to consumption or expense, while the former has no relation to consumption or expense. If this distinction will fit such taxes as those imposed on manufactures, it must be upon the ground that the article is made for consumption, and will be consumed by somebody; and as the tax will ultimately fall on the consumer, it becomes indirectly a tax on consumption or expense.

Some of the reasoning of Judge Chase on this subject, which has often been quoted since, strikes me as fallacious. He thought that an application of the rule of apportionment to the taxation of a specific article would evidently create great inequality and injustice, and therefore that it was unreasonable to say that the Constitution intended such a tax should be laid by that rule. In support of this reasoning he employed the following illustration, which has been thought famous, not to say conclusive:

"It appears to me that a tax on carriages can not be laid by the rule of apportionment without very great inequality and injustice. For example, suppose two States equal in census to pay eighty thousand dollars each by a tax on carriages of eight dollars on every carriage; and in one State there are one hundred carriages and in the other one thousand. The owners of carriages in one State would pay ten times the tax of owners in the other. A, in one State, would pay for his carriage eight dollars; but B, in the other State, would pay for his carriage eighty dollars."

But if a tax on carriages, laid by the rule of apportionment, would work this result, is it not plain that Congress has nothing to do but to assess the tax on whatever property the people of a State possess? But this, says Judge Chase, would not be a tax on carriages. Certainly it would not; but it does not follow that the Constitution, when it established the rule of apportionment, meant that the effect of that rule on the taxation of specific articles should be the criterion of a direct tax. The rule is simply this: that when Congress means to raise money by direct taxation, they must determine the amount that is to be so raised and apportion it among the States according to the census. Having done this they may levy it on any articles they may see fit to select. If they select a subject of specific taxation that does not exist at all in one State, or exists in such small relative quantities that great inequalities would be produced, the general power of taxation is no more abridged by the operation of the rule of apportionment than it is when an ad valorem tax is resorted to, and the inequalities of wealth as between the States produce inequalities in bearing the public burdens under a rule which makes the relative numbers of the people the measure of the proportionate sum total which each State has to pay. It is conceded, for example, that a tax on land is a direct tax; and that when Congress mean to tax land they must apportion the sum that is to be raised among the States according to the numbers of their inhabitants. But there is not only much less land in a very small State than there is in a very large one; but the average value of an acre in the former may be much greater than in the latter, while the populations of the two States might be so nearly the same as to make the total taxation on each State equal or nearly so. An inhabitant of the small State would thus pay a larger tax on his acre than an inhabitant of the large State would pay on his. This is the same kind of inequality that appears so glaring in Judge Chase's illustration of an apportioned carriage tax; but it is an inequality produced in both cases by the operation of a rule which assigns the sum to be paid by a State to the relative numbers of its people; and if the operation of this rule abridges the general taxing power by making it necessary to attain a proximate equality by selecting the subjects of taxation, the abridgment of the taxing power is the same whether the article is to be taxed specifically or upon a valuation. I shall have occasion to consider hereafter whether, and how far, the Constitution intended to abridge the general taxing power.

There is but one other decision of the Supreme Court in which this subject has been touched at all. It is the case of Loughboro v. Blake, decided in 1820, in the time of Chief Justice Marshall.* The only point involved in this decision, that is material to the present inquiry, related to the question whether Congress has a general power of taxation, which extends to the District of Columbia and the Territories, and is constitutionally unrestrained, as to the District and the Territories, by the rule of apportionment. It was held that Congress has such a power, and may levy a direct tax on the District of Columbia, and may elect as the rule for levying it the standard of apportionment furnished by the census. But this decision did not touch the question of what is a direct tax, which must be apportioned among the States; nor did it decide that, in taxing the people of the States, the general power of taxation is not abridged by the operation of the rule of apportionment when direct taxes are to be laid.

The result is, therefore, that the judicial interpretation of the Constitution, thus far, has given us, as the definition of an indirect tax, when one is levied specifically on a consumable commodity, that it is a tax on consumption or expense. This has some bearing upon the question what is a "direct tax;" but there is no judicial decision which fully answers this inquiry.

II.—CONGRESSIONAL CONSTRUCTION PRIOR TO THE YEAR 1861.

When the Government of the United States first went into operation under the Constitution, with Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury, the revenues were so arranged that it did not become necessary to ask for authority to levy a direct tax. That great minister was of opinion that this resource should be reserved for extraordinary occasions which would more immediately interest the sensibility of the whole community and more directly affect the public safety.† Accordingly, he so arranged his system of internal taxation as to make it chiefly fall on articles of consumption. Hence it was that no act of Congress was passed until the year 1798, which undertook expressly to procure the necessary statistics and make the necessary enactments for levying a direct tax. A period of nearly ten years, therefore, had elapsed before there was any thing that can be regarded as a legislative definition or application of the constitutional phrase "Direct Taxes." But in 1798 two acts were passed with the express intent to make what was supposed to be a direct tax. The first was an act which by its title disclosed its purpose; namely, "To provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves within the United States."‡ This was preparatory to the laying of a direct tax. The slaves were enumerated under it for the purpose of laying a capitation tax on that class of persons, and the lands and dwelling-houses were valued for the purpose of levying a direct tax upon their owners in respect to this description of property. It was followed in a few days by an act "To lay and collect a direct tax within the United States."* This act laid a tax of two millions of dollars upon the United States, apportioned it to the respective States according to the census, and assessed it upon dwelling-houses, lands, and slaves according to the valuations and enumerations to be made pursuant to the former act. The slaves were taxed specifically at $2 per head. The lands and houses were taxed by valuation. These two acts therefore undoubtedly show, that, in the judgment of that Congress, a capitation tax and a tax on lands are "direct taxes," which are to be laid by the constitutional rule of apportionment of the gross amount among the several States. But whether they have any tendency to show, that, in the judgment of that Congress, there are, or can be, no other taxes which are "direct taxes," depends in some degree upon the other parts of the contemporaneous internal revenues. If there were at the same time laws in operation which levied taxes upon personal property in the same direct manner of assessing the holder upon a valuation of that property, and these taxes were still not laid by previous apportionment of a gross sum among the States, but were laid by the rule of uniformity only, they would afford ground for the inference that Congress did not understand them as included within the "direct taxes" of the Constitution. Further, if it appears that there were such taxes, so laid, there may have been other circumstances of discrimination which, notwithstanding the direct manner of the assessment, distinguished them in the judgment of Congress from a tax on land, and made them referable to the class of indirect taxes.

Now it so happens that from the origin of the Government down to the year 1798, when the first "direct tax" was laid, eo nomine, and for a period long subsequent thereto, there were no other internal taxes or duties that could not be referred, as to their subjects, to the heads of consumption or expense, or the manufacture of articles of consumption. In all that period there was not a single tax on personalty which operated in the same manner as a tax on land, and differed from it only by not being a tax on land, and at the same time was laid without apportionment. There were duties on distilled spirits, on stills, on licenses, on carriages, on the manufacture of snuff and refined sugar, on some sales at auction, and stamp duties. These were all referable to consumption or expense, or manufacture and production of articles of consumption, etc.; and it is probable that this character of the taxation was but the continuance of a long established habit of regarding such taxes as indirect taxes, in contradistinction to those which can not be so referred, but which are levied in respect of a mass of property or money without reference to its being consumed or expended, increased or diminished, by the owner or any one else. At all events there are no taxes of the latter description to be found on the statute book within the period of which I now speak, and therefore the legislation of that period has very little tendency, if any, to show that in the judgment of Congress such taxes, if resorted to, would not be "direct taxes," the gross amount of which must be apportioned among the States before they can be levied.

The same observations apply to the legislation of 1813-15, when another direct tax on land was laid, and when the other parts of the contemporaneous internal revenues were of such a character that their being levied by the rule of uniformity, without an apportionment among the States of the gross sum to be levied, has very little tendency to show that Congress regarded a tax on land, or a capitation tax, as the only "direct taxes" contemplated by the Constitution when it established the rule of apportionment.

But there is one feature of the legislation of 1813-15 which has a very important bearing upon the present inquiry. We have seen that in 1798 Congress laid a capitation tax on slaves, and of course it was laid by the rule of apportionment. But in 1813—notwithstanding the dicta of the judges in the case of Hylton v. The United States, strongly expressing the opinion that the only direct taxes are land, and house, and capitation taxes—Congress ruled that an ad valorem tax on slaves is a direct tax, and they provided for the valuation of all slaves with a view to having them taxed whenever a direct tax should be laid.* In 1815 Congress laid an ad valorem tax on slaves as a direct tax, by expressly denominating it a direct tax, and laid it by the rule of apportionment.† The same Congress of 1813 renewed the specific carriage tax, and did not lay it by the rule of apportionment, but laid it by the rule of uniformity. They doubtless felt themselves bound, or authorized, by the judicial decision of 1796, to treat a specific tax on carriages as an indirect tax; but they did not feel themselves bound or authorized, by the extra-judicial opinions of the judges, to treat an ad valorem tax on slaves as any thing but a direct tax. This occurrence does not appear to have attracted the attention of either Chancellor Kent or Mr. Justice Story. Both of those great jurists, in their Commentaries, have referred to the opinions expressed by the judges in the case of Hylton v. The United States, and both seem to incline to attach some importance to the suggestion that direct taxes include only taxes on lands and houses and capitation taxes. But it is clear that this doctrine was not accepted in Congress in 1813-15, while the point judicially involved and decided in Hylton's case, in relation to the carriage tax, was accepted and acted upon.

Upon the whole, therefore, it may be said that, prior to 1861, the Congressional construction of the Constitution has been as follows: First, that a tax on lands and houses and a capitation tax are direct; Second, that taxes on specific articles of consumption or expense are indirect; Third, that an ad valorem tax on personal property, without reference to consumption, is of the same character as an ad valorem tax on land, both being direct. This course of legislation seems to conform to what the Court judicially decided in 1796, but it does not conform to the extra-judicial opinions expressed by the judges.

* Act of July 22, 1813.

† Act of Jan. 9, 1815.

III.—THE VIEWS OF THOSE WHO FRAMED AND THOSE WHO RATIFIED THE CONSTITUTION.

One of the greatest defects of the Union that existed before the Constitution was, that Congress possessed no revenues whatever, in any proper sense of that term. Each State possessed a full revenue power, both external and internal. When Congress wanted money it determined the quota which it would require from each State, and the State exercised such branch of its revenue power as it saw fit in order to raise the money; and paid its quota to the Federal Government, or left it unpaid, very much as it pleased. In order to remedy this great evil the framers of the Constitution undertook to obtain for the General Government, which they proposed to make, the same revenue power which was possessed by each State. But in bringing this about, and in adjusting it to the double character of the political system that was to exist after the Constitution had gone into operation, several difficulties presented themselves. On the one hand, if all the subjects of taxation were placed under the exclusive power of Congress, the States could have no means of maintaining their local governments. On the other hand, if the imposts were left in the hands of the States, and not placed exclusively under the control of Congress, there could be no uniformity of duties on foreign merchandise. Again, if the General Government could draw no revenues from any source but the imposts, its resources might be insufficient to meet its wants. It was therefore perceived that the imposts must be vested exclusively in Congress, and that while Congress must have the power, by internal taxation, to reach all the other possible subjects of taxation that are within the reach of the States, those same subjects of taxation must be left equally open to the States. What we call the external revenue was thus to be given exclusively to Congress, and the power to raise internal revenue was to be given also to Congress, but was to remain a concurrent power in the States. This last arrangement subjected all the property within the country to two independent taxing powers, capable of operating upon the same subjects. But in adjusting this branch of the revenue power a further difficulty arose. The General Government was to extend over States differing greatly in numbers and wealth, jealous of what they were to surrender, and fearing injustice and oppression through powerful combinations in the national legislature. The idea of proposing to the States to make this

Federal power of internal taxation a purely consolidated power, to be exercised without any limitation, was simply out of the question. They had never been accustomed within their own limits to have a direct tax imposed without apportionment among the local subdivisions of the State, by some rule, although they had been accustomed to the operation of excise laws, which are regulated by the rule of uniformity only. Every member of the Federal Convention knew, therefore, that if Congress was to have granted to it a power of both direct and indirect taxation, his State would insist that the former branch of this power should be regulated by some rule of apportionment that would have some tendency to equalize the burdens, and to prevent combinations among one class of States to oppress another. The difficult problem was to find such a rule. It was found in the numbers of inhabitants of the respective States, upon the ground that this is the best criterion of ability to pay taxes that can, under such circumstances, be resorted to. Whether this was theoretically true or false is nothing to the present purpose. The rule was adopted and applied.

Now whoever will attend to the mode in which this rule was brought forward and incorporated into the Constitution by its framers, will see that their understanding must have been that it did not need to be applied to those subjects of taxation which in that day were understood to be embraced in the terms, "duties, imposts, and excises." These terms were descriptive of certain kinds of taxes which the States had been accustomed to lay themselves, in the exercise of both their external and internal revenue powers. They all belonged to the class of indirect taxes, and were so understood in every colony of the whole thirteen before the Revolution, and had been so understood in every State after the Revolution. "Neither the Stamp Act," said Chief Justice Marshall, "nor the duty on tea, were direct taxes;"* yet the one was an external and the other an internal tax, and both belonged to a general power of taxation, wherever that power resided. Inasmuch, then, as the rule of apportionment did not need to be applied to the "duties, imposts, and excises," of the Constitution, about the operation of which no special jealousy was to be apprehended from the States, since they could be regulated by no rule except that of uniformity; and as all the remainder of the taxing power was likely to excite great apprehension in the States, and could be regulated, so as to quiet that apprehension, solely by the rule of apportionment—the structure of the Constitution is easily accounted for. That structure, when viewed in the light of the reasons which actuated those who made it, shows that whatever was not comprehended under the terms "duties, imposts, and excises," was understood by them to fall under the head of "Direct Taxes."

If we follow the Constitution into the conventions which ratified it, we shall find that it was understood there in the same sense. In those bodies was displayed in full force the jealousy which the framers expected to encounter, and for the satisfaction of which they meant to provide. So far as the revenue powers were concerned, this jealousy expended itself almost entirely upon the power of direct taxation. Against this Patrick Henry exerted all the strength of his burning eloquence and his passionate invective. The objections were the same in Massachusetts, in Virginia, in New York, in Pennsylvania, to a very striking degree. "We are called upon," said the opponents of the Constitution, "first, to give up our custom-houses exclusively to the National Government; next, to surrender to it a concurrent power to lay the same indirect taxes which we ourselves lay as duties and excises upon our own people; and, finally, we are asked for a concurrent power of direct taxation, to operate on the same people and the same property which we ourselves tax, and to operate in the same way. This is monstrous; for it is a solecism in government to have the same property subjected to two independent powers of taxation." Now the answer that was made by the supporters of the Constitution shows that both sides understood this matter of direct taxation in the same sense. Those who contended for the Constitution had no desire to deceive any body, and they were contending with men whom they could not have blindfolded, if they had attempted it. They admitted at once that the internal direct taxation asked for would operate on the same property on which the corresponding power of the State would operate; but they said, that however new such a system of government might be, it must be established and tried. They admitted too that direct taxes are of two kinds, general and specific; the latter operating upon particular things, the former upon all property—but they said that the General Government must have this plenary power of direct taxation, and Congress must do the best it can in exercising it, and as Congress will contain a representation from every State, it will have all the needful information as to the situation and habits of the people. These arguments were made to prevail by reason of the rule that the power of direct taxation could not be exercised without an apportionment among the States; and in all the discussions that I have seen, from New Hampshire to Georgia, I do not remember that it was once suggested that there could be such a thing as a tax that was neither a "direct tax," nor a "duty, an impost, or an excise." Whenever an indirect tax was spoken of, it was assumed that it was bottomed on expense or consumption of some kind. Oliver Ellsworth, who certainly understood this subject, if any man in that age understood it, when arguing that an impost is the best way of raising a national revenue, thus expressed the essential, practical contrast between a direct and an indirect tax:

* All nations have found it so. Direct taxation can go but little way toward raising a revenue. To raise money in this way, people must be provident; they must constantly be laying up money to answer the demands of the collector. But you can not make people thus provident. If you would do any thing to the purpose, you must come in when they are spending, and take a part with them. This does not take away the tools of a man's business, or the necessary utensils of his family, it only comes in when he is taking his pleasure and feels generous; while he is laying out a shilling for superfluities, it takes two pence of it for public use, and the remainder will do him as much good as the whole."^{*}

In short, I believe if the idea had been popularly broached, when the Constitution was before the State Conventions, that Congress would have power to lay a description of taxes that would be neither direct taxes nor duties, imposts, or excises, as the people then understood those terms, we should not now be living under that instrument. I can find no contemporaneous evidence which shows that the people did not understand the two restraining rules as intended to exhaust the whole taxing power in its application to the States.

IV.—HOW SHOULD THE CONSTITUTION BE REGARDED, ON PRINCIPLE?

By principle, as used in this connection, I mean no reference to theoretical ideas of how the taxing power of a Government should be arranged; but I include all that reference to terms used, to the known character and purposes of the Government actually established, and to the circumstances on which the Constitution was to operate, that enters into a sound canon of interpretation. With respect, then, to the terms employed to describe the subjects of the revenue powers, we shall find very little profit in resorting to the aid of lexicographers, contemporaneous or subsequent. The Constitution was not made to be ratified by a people who would be likely to look into dictionaries for the meaning and scope of the terms in which it was expressed. It was a great instrument of fundamental legislation; and the safest rule for its interpretation is to regard the enacting power—the PEOPLE—as using terms in the sense in which they had been accustomed to use them, if they were borrowed from surrounding legislation, or in the sense which the surrounding circumstances show to have been that in which they must have used them for the purpose which they meant to accomplish. This is especially true of the terms which describe the powers conferred upon Congress. Take, for example, the term "Commerce," which Congress was to have the power to "regulate," as between the States and foreign nations, and among the States. One might look into forty dictionaries, without finding that meaning of the term "Commerce" which we know from the surrounding circumstances and the historical purpose was intended to be given to this subject of legislative power, and without finding that scope of the term "regulate" which we know from the same sources was intended to be given to this legislative authority. In the same way, if we would know the meaning in which the people of the United States used the terms "Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises," we must go to the sense in which they were accustomed to use these terms for purposes corresponding to those for which they must have used them in this Constitution; and in this inquiry lexicons, however good, will help us very little, and the definitions of economists as little.

I assume, then, that when the people of the United States used the terms "Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises," they used these terms as they had been accustomed to use them; that they described by them the branches of revenue power which they meant to confer on Congress, in order to enable it to pay the debts and provide for the general welfare of the United States under the Constitution; and that they could have understood no other way of doing this, but to confer on Congress the same kinds of power which their State governments exercised in paying the debts and providing for the general welfare of the States under their local Constitutions. This was what they were asked to grant, subject to certain restrictions as to the mode of exercising the power, and what they did grant. It is historically notorious that the people of the States were told that Congress must have the same sources of revenue which the States had hitherto enjoyed; that as to some of these sources the Federal power must be exclusive, that as to all the others it must be concurrent; and that the sole compensations or safeguards that could be given for this vast surrender were to consist in two restraining rules, by which Congress were to be bound in their revenue legislation. As the revenue powers of Congress, therefore, were to be the same as those previously held and exercised by the States, subject to the two restraining rules, it is a just and reasonable inference that the terms of the grant described the subjects of the powers as the people of the States had been accustomed to describe them in their own governments. In that usage the term "Taxes" had undoubtedly embraced those exactions for public use which the State governments had always assessed upon the citizen, either in respect of his person or of his property without any reference to his consumption or diminution or expenditure of the fund from which the assessment was drawn; and the terms Duties, Imposts, and Excises, described those impositions for public use, which they had been accustomed to lay on articles of consumption, and by the operation of which the public takes, and means to take to itself, a part of that which is being consumed. Any one who will look into the legislation and habits of the States, prior to the Federal Constitution, will see that these terms were used in these senses; and that "Taxes" was not understood to include "Duties, Imposts, and Excises," although in a lexicographical or general sense all public assessments, demanded under authority of law, are Taxes.

The superstructure of the whole argument, which supposes that the term "Taxes," in the grant of the power, comprehends more than the ^{*} Debates in the Convention of Connecticut.

"Direct Taxes" of the restraining rule, is built upon the assumption that "Capitation and all other Direct Taxes" do not describe so much as "Taxes" describes. But if we regard the term "Taxes," in the grant, as describing what it certainly did describe in the legislative and popular usage of that time, namely, those public exactions which were not understood in legislative and popular usage as Duties, Imposts, and Excises, the argument falls: for in these meanings the two kinds of public exactions stand opposed to each other, and the one comprehends all direct taxes, including polls, and the other comprehends all indirect taxes. There is strong reason for regarding this as the true interpretation; because if the words of the grant provide for all direct taxes and for all indirect taxes, the revenue power, as to the grant, is complete, and is as large and of the same nature as that previously held and exercised by the States. If we suppose the terms of the grant to read thus—"To lay and collect all Direct Taxes, and also Duties, Imposts, and Excises," we have as full and ample a revenue power, with all its branches, as the States ever possessed. We may safely conclude that the States did not intend to grant more power than they ever possessed themselves, and we know that they did grant as much, because they were told that they must, and all the history of the times shows that they intended, however reluctantly, to comply with the demand that was made upon them.

On the other hand, we can not find the power of direct internal taxation in the grant, so clearly and unequivocally as we ought to find it, if we do not suppose it to be implied in the word "Taxes," and do not insert it in the construction: for if we suppose the term "Taxes" to be in any way synonymous with "Duties, Imposts, and Excises," we are at once involved in tautologies, and must resort to our lexicons to help us to the power of direct taxation, which we know was demanded for Congress, was discussed in every one of the State Conventions, and was understood there to reside in the word "Taxes," while the whole power of indirect taxation, external and internal, was understood to reside in the words "Duties, Imposts, and Excises." On this subject there are two passages in the Federalist which have a very important tendency to show the understanding of the whole country. From one of them we learn what the advocates of the Constitution supposed that they were demanding: "As theory and practice conspire to prove that the power of procuring revenue is unavailing, when exercised over the States in their collective capacities, the Federal Government must of necessity be invested with an unqualified power of taxation in the ordinary modes."—(No. 31.) The unqualified power and the ordinary modes are described by the terms of the grant. The other passage discloses to us how the opponents of the Constitution understood the power of internal taxation to be divided, on which branch the stress of their objections was expended, and what was the character of the indirect internal taxation that was supposed to be comprehended in the proposed grant: "The taxes intended to be comprised under the general denomination of internal taxes may be subdivided into those of the direct and the indirect kind. Though the objection be made to both, yet the reasoning upon it seems to be confined to the former branch. And indeed, as to the latter, by which must be understood duties and excises on articles of consumption, one is at a loss to conceive what can be the nature of the difficulties apprehended."—(No. 36.)

These and many other reasons, on which the limits of this paper will not permit me to enlarge, strongly incline me to believe that the restraining rule of apportionment affects all the revenues of Congress which are levied upon persons in respect of a mass of property or money without reference to its present or prospective consumption, and which are imposed as a mere assessment on account of the present existence of that property or money. These were the kinds of taxes which in the time of the establishment of the Constitution were regarded as direct taxes, and which were so much feared and avoided because they had not the alleviation that attends an assessment falling indirectly upon expense, consumption, and luxury. As the term direct Taxes is introduced in the restraining rule of apportionment, we may now look to see whether the purposes of that rule will afford any aid in determining what a direct tax is.

I have already suggested the reasons why the rule of apportionment was not applied to the indirect taxation. To this branch of the revenue power that rule was incapable of being applied. Congress could never know beforehand what gross sum a duty on foreign goods or an excise on domestic manufactures would yield, although they could estimate what a given rate might probably yield. Nor was the jealousy felt in regard to this power the same as that felt in regard to the power of direct taxation. "We know," the opponents of the Constitution reasoned, "that Congress may with more propriety be intrusted with a power of taxing what men choose to consume and expend; but we object to giving them power to stretch forth their hands into the pockets of our citizens and to take from them what they are not consuming or expending. At all events, if they are to have this latter power, they shall have it only under the restraint of a rule that will oblige them to fix the whole sum which they intend to raise in this way, and to apportion that sum among the several States; for in no other way can we know how far the accumulations of our people will bear to be diminished, and in no other way can we prevent oppressive combinations in the National Legislature to favor one class of States at the expense of another."

Such, then, being the purposes of the rule of apportionment, what reason can be assigned, in the nature of things, for confining its operation to taxes upon land and capitation taxes? The terms of the rule do not so confine it, for they declare that "no capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census." Is there, then, any thing in the nature of a tax on a sum of money, that can distinguish it from a tax on land, in respect of this quality of directness? The owner is taxed in respect of his land, upon no theory that he is consuming it, or expending its value, but because it is an object of assessment on which the Government can conveniently act. This is what makes it a direct tax. If he is taxed in respect of his money, the operation is precisely the same, and the tax is not bottomed upon any presumption that he is consuming or expending his money, but it is a simple diminution of what he has accumulated, or what he now holds. If you say that he may make a profit by the use of his money, and so that the tax operates indirectly on his profit, and may be thus discriminated, the same thing is precisely true of his land, and thus the tax on the latter, which is conceded to be direct, becomes an indirect tax. This would realize the notion of Judge Chase, that "some taxes may be both direct and indirect at the same time;" an idea which Hamilton pronounced "absurd," and which, it may be added, probably did not present itself to either the friends or the opponents of the Constitution at the time it was established. Both sides appear to have understood that this power of direct action on the accumulations of the citizen was to be given to Congress; and this, I think, was what they meant by direct taxation, and what they designed to restrain by the rule of apportionment.

Among the law briefs published in the works of Hamilton there is a short one on this subject, which appears from its date (1795) to have been hastily sketched for the use of some one who was to act on the carriage tax in Congress, or possibly to be used in the argument of the case of Hylton.* It bears the marks of his profound insight into such subjects, but it is not a full discussion, and it does not develop clearly the point on which the Court actually held the carriage tax to be an indirect tax. But there is one view taken in it which exhibits his great sagacity and soundness as an interpreter of the Constitution. He refers to the doctrine of the French Economists and other speculative writers, that all taxes, on whatever things they are levied, fall ultimately upon land, and are paid out of its proceeds; hence that taxes on lands are direct, and those on all other articles are indirect. But this, he says, can not be applied to our Constitution, which certainly contemplated other taxes as direct than those on lands; and when he comes to suggest what he supposes are direct taxes under our Constitution, the classification which he makes shows how quickly he always perceived, and how intuitively he followed what may be called the historical canon of construction—that canon which looks to the admitted purpose for which the people understood a given rule to be introduced, and for which it must have been introduced. Thus he classes as direct taxes, under the Constitution:

"Capitation or Poll Taxes.

"Taxes on Lands and Buildings.

"General Assessments, whether on the whole property of individuals, or on their whole real or personal estate."

He deduces this classification from the rationale of the rule of apportionment; and this seems to me to have been a method of interpretation in every way worthy of his great intellect. But if a general assessment on the whole personal property of an individual is a direct tax, by reason of the known purpose of the rule of apportionment among the States, it would be very difficult to show why an assessment upon particular portions of the personal property of all individuals who have that kind of personal property does not belong to the same category. In order to reach any distinction, it would seem to be necessary to do what the Supreme Court did with the carriage tax—namely, to follow it into the class of assessments on what is being consumed, and to connect it with the idea of expense. There is no other way of reaching a distinction between a specific tax on a carriage and an ad valorem tax on a slave; a distinction which was reached and acted upon by Congress in 1813–15.

Before dismissing the subject, perhaps I ought to guard against the possibility of being misunderstood. I have no idea that it is necessary for Congress, before laying a particular tax, to find a precedent of the same tax in the practice of the States before the adoption of the Constitution. This is not the position suggested. But what is suggested is, that in the practice of the States, before the Constitution, will be found enough to show what the people of the States regarded as direct taxes, in contradistinction to the taxes which they had always considered as indirect; that they had this line of division in view when they insisted on the rule of apportionment for direct taxes; and that if this distinction is applied and followed out, it will be found that all the taxes that have been subsequently devised will fall on the one or the other side of it.

It has not been my intention in this paper to bring under discussion the validity of any particular tax that is now levied. My sole purpose has been to indicate the sources of investigation which must be resorted to, and to suggest some of the grounds on which it will probably be found that the distinction between direct and indirect taxes will be ultimately rested. The public debt of the United States ought to be an object of solicitude, as it is a burden, to every citizen in the land. That it will ever be seriously menaced by calling in question the objects for which it was incurred, I do not believe. It would be impossible for any man, or any party, to discriminate what parts of it are open to the complaint that they were incurred for unconstitutional objects; nor is there the remotest probability that the people would listen to any attempt to make such a discrimination. But if it is true that in legislating the modes in which the people are to be assessed, in order to maintain this debt in the position in which every patriot must desire to see it maintained, Congress are bound by definite Constitutional rules, the time is not remote when they must regard those rules, if they have not regarded them heretofore. Whatever may have occurred or been justified in a period of war and confusion, the signs of the times show plainly that the Constitution is finally to resume its supremacy, and that discussions of its meaning and purpose are to have their rightful influence over our affairs.

THE BURNING OF COLUMBIA.

IF Mr. Wade Hampton is ambitious to add a deeper shame to a dishonored name, he has attained that end by his renewed attempts to hold General Sherman responsible for the burning of Columbia and its terrible consequences. And it is furthermore one of the striking evidences of the peculiar characteristics of Hampton and those like him, that from the fall of Sumter until the day of the occupation of Columbia by the Union army, they should have boasted daily that they would burn their cities, bridges, and barns before the Yankee invader; that they would immolate themselves upon the ruins of their homes, etc., etc. Yet when the Federal army did appear, these personages were as eager to preserve their homes and household lares as any Jew or Scotchman among them, and when their property was sacrificed by confiscation or the destruction which is an inevitable incident in war, they crouch among the ashes and waste the days in fruitless complaints.

At this time, when the people of other portions of the South are honestly striving to rehabilitate themselves socially and politically, it is not pleasant to say these things; but Hampton and certain others insist upon reopening the discussion by most absurd misrepresentation, and it is not out of place for those of us who took part in the capture of Columbia to relate what we saw.

Columbia was burned because of Hampton's recklessness in firing the thousands of bales of cotton which he had placed in all the public streets of the city. And it may be said here that the labored persistency with which the Confederates destroyed cotton in preference to other property can only be accounted for upon the supposition that they believed that Sherman did not intend marching farther north than Columbia, or perhaps they had so long vaunted the royalty of cotton that they had come to the belief that, like the fetich of their slaves, it really possessed some marvelous magic power for good or evil.

At noon of February 17, 1865, as our party entered the city of Columbia and rode down the main street, we saw here and there squads of the Federal soldiers. In truth there were but a few hundred in the city, and these were the skirmish line of Logan's advance, who, early in the morning, had crossed the Broad River in boats. The first person who passed over the pontoon bridge when it was completed was General Sherman, who was followed by General Howard and officers of their staffs.

It had been no easy task that day to build one thousand feet of canvas bridge, for even in this sheltered valley the wind blew with great force, bending the tree-tops, whipping the surface of the water into foaming waves, tossing rudely about the cloth boats, partially filling them with water, and altogether severely trying the patience of Engineer Captain Reese and his brave pontooniers.

When we mounted the hills and passed out upon the ridge which is crowned by the city of Columbia, it seemed to me I had never experienced a more powerful gale of wind, even in view of vivid recollection of storms on the ocean and storms on the plains. It was a dry, southern wind which filled the air this afternoon with dust and twigs and smoking flakes of cotton, and as I saw this incendiary matter flying over our heads, catching in the branches of the trees already white with cotton, or falling upon the shingled roofs of the houses, I thought to myself, and said to a companion, "That cotton is as dangerous as so much powder." There was no evidence of unusual disorder in the city. The soldiers in the street seemed rather hilarious than otherwise. Some of them had evidently been drinking, and as we passed along I noticed a citizen who came out from his house and gave one of them a pail from which he took a longer draught than was prudent if it was, as I suppose, spirituous liquor. The soldiers, as I have said, were in a jolly mood, but were not more enthusiastic than would be natural for Yankees who had just taken possession of the capital of the State of South Carolina.

Mr. Goodwin, the Mayor of Columbia, met General Sherman near the City Hall. He made no complaint of ill treatment, but asked that the usual protection should be given to the citizens and private property. General Sherman answered:

"Here is General Howard, who commands the troops who will occupy the city. The people and their houses will be respected, but we shall take any supplies which can be used for the army."

Just at this moment a throng of escaped prisoners surrounded the General, who rode in advance of his officers. They were a strange, uncouth crowd of men which gathered about him, ragged, barefooted, and hatless, most of them, with unkempt hair and beards, with glassy eyes and livid lips and sunken cheeks. Their eyes filled with tears, their lips trembled as he halted among them and took their thin hands in his, and said gentle words of welcome.

"Thank God, and you, General Sherman, our misery is over!" cried one, in delirious tones.

Said another, with a wild look in his eyes, "We knew you would come to liberate us from the power of these infernal fiends. Curse them!" "Yes, curse them! curse them!" was muttered by more than one of the group.

General Sherman gave them directions to come to his head-quarters, and passed on to the Charleston railroad station, where there were several large warehouses filled with commissary stores. It was his habit to see for himself the character and quantity of supplies which fell into our hands. After this investigation he went to an unoccupied house in the eastern part of the city, where he established his head-quarters.

Although the wind had increased in violence, and it was extremely uncomfortable out of doors, yet I passed three hours of the afternoon walking through the town. Guards were being stationed at the houses and about the streets. There was order and quiet in every direction so far as I could see. On two occasions women called from their houses, asking me to expel some intruder who was investigating the contents of their out-buildings, but upon no occasion did I see or hear any other rudeness or violence.

"Who broke into this store?" I asked of a citizen standing in front of a clothing shop whose doors and windows had been smashed to pieces.

"Wheeler's Cavalry," was the answer.

"I am glad it was not done by our soldiers."

"It was not," replied the man. He continued, in a bitter tone, "You haven't in all your army such thieves and cut-throats as this Wheeler's Cavalry. They are the terror of the whole country, and would have sacked every house in the town if your army hadn't driven them away."

As I left this man, who seemed to have more fear of Wheeler's Cavalry than of the Federal soldiers, I passed through the main business street of the city, and observed that the smoke still ascended from Wade Hampton's cotton bales.

It must have been somewhere near nine o'clock in the evening of this day that my servant rushed into the room where I was writing, shouting, with great terror:

"De city am on fire, Sah! We'll all burn up, Sah! God bress my soul!"

Giving him directions in regard to the horses in the event of the fire coming too near, accompanied by Mr. Davis, an artist for Harper's Weekly, I hurried out and down the street in the direction of the conflagration. It was the grandest, most awful sight I had ever seen. The northern and western sky was not only all aflame, but the air was filled with myriad sparks and burning brands. They fell upon the wooden house-tops; they dashed against the window panes, lurid with reflected light; they fell in showers into the garden and among the trees; they mingled with the eddying dust which whirled along the street. It was the rain of fire which is so sublimely expressed in music in that grand oratorio, Israel in Egypt.

Until we came near the burning district we saw very few of the inhabitants of the city.

Paralyzed with fear they sought the shelter of their houses, barring the doors. Turning the corner of a street where stood a church, which I had noticed during the afternoon as one of the finest in the city, we came in front of a house which had just caught fire. On a sidewalk in front of the church stood a middle-aged lady. Near her were several articles of household furniture.

"Is that your house, Madam?" I asked.

"Yes, Sir; and this," pointing to the table and trunks, "is all I could save from it."

"Have you no male friend to assist you? Where are your friends?"

"My brother, Sir, is in the Confederate army, but my negro servant is doing all he can. But it is too late. The house caught fire in several places from falling brands."

"Can I assist you, Madam?"

"No, I thank you. I shall go to my sister's house near by. Look, Sir," she continued, forgetting her own misfortune, "the church-yard is on fire!"

We then saw to our dismay that the fire, which had caught in the tall dry grass, was sweeping rapidly toward the church. Mr. Davis and myself jumped over the fence, cut branches from the cedar-trees, and for half an hour we fought fire, and, though scorched and blackened by the flame and smoke, we succeeded in stifling it and saved the church.

Leaving the lady gazing piteously at the ruins of her house, we penetrated yet further into the burning district. A terrible, heart-rending sight it was to see. Groups of men, women, and children huddled about the few articles of clothing and household wares which were saved from their ruined homes. Officers who had taken comfortable quarters were suddenly turned out of doors with the loss of their camp equipage. Patrols of soldiers were marching about the streets arresting stragglers who without orders had come into the city from their camps. Some of these men were intoxicated, and may have pillaged the burning houses, although I saw nothing of the kind. It has been said that soldiers of Sherman's army, who were Eastern men, entered the city and robbed the inhabitants. This is a gratuitous falsehood; for the only Eastern troops in the army were in the Twentieth Corps, in the left wing, which had not yet crossed the Broad River, and were miles away.

About midnight the fire had obtained full possession of the business portion of the city, and swept forward with a fury which defied the efforts of an entire division of the Fifteenth Corps which had been ordered out to contrall it. I saw Sherman, Howard, Logan, Woods, and other general officers with their staffs working with heart and hand to stay the progress of the flames. Now and then tremendous explosions took place from buildings containing powder and shell, driving back the squads of men, and then the flames burst forth with increased fury. The City Hall, printing-offices, all the public buildings used by the Confederate Government for printing treasury notes, handsome warehouses, elegant mansions filled with costly works of art, and rare libraries; all these were rapidly consumed by the flames.

All the southwestern portion of the city was destroyed. The fire swept into and across the square where the work-shops surrounded the new capitol building, and which contained all the figures which Brown the sculptor had modeled for the capitol. Mr. Brown has since told me that he does not regret that loss. The old capitol building, which was situated a few yards beyond, became so rapidly ignited that the provost guard which was stationed there was unable to remove its equipments. It was a brick and wooden structure, containing the archives of the State and a valuable library. In fifteen minutes it was one column of flame; in half an hour, a bed of coal.

It was after one o'clock in the morning before the wind shifted and died away, and then the efforts of the soldiers were successful in saving the remainder of the city from destruction. During the progress of the fire, and afterward, while the army was in the city, every effort was made for the relief of the sufferers. They were furnished with bedding and food, and were quartered in the houses which had been deserted by their owners who had fled the city the day before.

General Sherman gave up his own quarters to a family of ladies with their children, who were fed from his table; and I know from personal observation, that he and the officers and men of his army could not have made greater exertions to alleviate the sufferings of these homeless ones if they had been their own kith and kin. It is worthy of note that the army has failed to receive any marked expression of gratitude from these people.

There were exceptions, however. The morning after the night of the fire General Sherman, in answer to a request of the Superior of a convent which had fallen in the track of the flames, went over to a church where, with the sisters, she had taken shelter. She was a lady of rather imposing appearance, who accepted the misfortune which had befallen her with calm dignity and resignation. She thanked the General for his kindness, and expressed especial gratitude for the efforts in their behalf of Colonel Ewing, a brother-in-law of General Sherman, and one of his staff. Before the General returned to his quarters he visited the arsenal, which was situated upon a hill in the northern outskirts of the city. As he rode along past a large house near the arsenal he was accosted by a man who ran out into the street to meet him.

"Is this General Sherman?"

"Yes, I am General Sherman."

"I am told you intend to destroy the arsenal; I don't care so much for my house, Sir, but my wife lies there, and so ill that she can not be removed. I know it is a great favor to ask, but can not this property be destroyed in some other way? If you blow up the arsenal with all that powder and shell in it, my wife will certainly be killed."

The General hesitated a moment, and then replied, "We can destroy the arsenal without blowing it up, and some other way must be found to destroy the ammunition."

"Thank you, General. God bless you, Sir!"

The arsenal afterward was hurled to the ground by battering rams, but the ammunition! It can be imagined what were the feelings of the man who never, even in battle, sacrificed the life of a single soldier that it did not give him pain, when he heard that twenty-seven of his brave men were killed and wounded by the explosion of that same ammunition while they were throwing it into the river.

Among others to whom I was sent to give assistance was Mr. Huger, a well-known citizen of South Carolina. He said to me,

"I hope, Sir, a strong force of your troops is to be left in the city."

"I can not tell whether or not we shall garrison Columbia."

"For God sake, Sir," said the old man, while he placed his hand on my shoulder and looked me earnestly in the face, "do not leave us here without a guard. I am too old a man to dissemble in this matter; but the truth is, if you do not leave a guard, Wheeler's Cavalry will return after you go, and they will rob us of what little is left."

I replied, "We have heard of the outrages which Wheeler's men have committed in the country, and we know that Governor Brown, of Georgia, issued a proclamation calling upon the people to defend themselves against these plunderers by force of arms, but we never imagined they dared pillage a city like this."

"But they did though," replied Mr. Huger, with indignation; "they not only broke into the stores and houses, but they robbed citizens on the public streets."

As I parted from Mr. Huger I seriously regretted that I could not assure him that a guard would be left in the city; but I was not surprised to hear his story, for several of the principal citizens of Savannah had said to me that until our occupation of that city they did not dare go out upon the streets after nightfall with any article of value about their persons for fear of robbery by their own soldiers.

When the citizens of Columbia begin their investigations of the burning of that city, and the pillaging of houses and robbing of citizens, let them not forget to take the evidence of Mr. Huger.

Perhaps it would be too much to expect of the people of the South that they should take pains to publish the atrocities which were committed upon them by their own soldiers, yet it is rather hard to saddle the Union army with their crimes. All of Sherman's sixty thousand men were not angels, and unquestionably there were wrongs perpetrated by wicked men who wandered from the ranks for which their leader and his officers ought not to be held responsible.

Reconciliation at this day when conciliation should be the rule of action is useless. Heaven knows there is material enough, should we desire to enter into that discussion. One instance will answer for our purpose here. The history of the conduct of the war by the Union armies does not furnish a parallel to the destruction by order of an entire city as in the case of the city of Chambersburg by the Confederate commander.

Sherman pressed with a hand of fire and of iron wherever he marched. He cauterized the States of Georgia and the Carolinas; but in his greatest deeds and lightest words he was governed solely by a profound reverence for the Government of the United States; and so far as he might, with full respect for the laws of war and the dictates of humanity, he sought to impress traitors with the enormity of their crime. This generation may not know how terrible were the conditions of his success; but in the disaster at Columbia he had no thought nor part. There is one striking consideration which suggests itself in view of this subject. If the Union soldiers had been in actual occupation of the cities of Charleston and Richmond at the time of the conflagration which followed the evacuation of those cities by the rebel troops, would not those shocking disasters have been charged upon them? In these and other instances where the enemy applied the torch they seemed to have been actuated by fear or petty spite, but never with the wisdom of military foresight or in a spirit of self-sacrifice. In every instance there was exhibited a strange, incomprehensible recklessness and indifference to the welfare and lives of their own people. The costly railroad bridges on the Charleston, Florence, Wilmington, and Weldon Railroad which spanned the Santee, Little and Great Pedee, and the Roanoke, were destroyed when there was not a Yankee soldier within fifty and one hundred miles of them; while at the cities of Winnsborough, Orangeburg, and Cheraw our troops followed so quickly the retreating rebels—a distance of some one or two hundred yards—that we were able to save those cities from destruction from the fires which had already been ignited. In the latter place, not one hundred yards from the railroad dépôt, which was burning when our troops reached the spot, there was stored in a wooden building several thousand pounds of powder. It seemed to us, who saw this means of horrible death lying there within reach of the sparks from the burning building, that the people of Cheraw were saved as by a direct interposition of Divine Providence.

While the army rested at Columbia I strove most faithfully to ascertain the origin of the fire which had destroyed nearly one half that city. All my inquiries from white people and black, from soldiers and citizens, led to one result, that the first and principal cause was the burning of the cotton. Two persons, citizens, told me that they saw men with lighted brands set fire to the stoops of their houses; and it was reported that others were fired in the same way.

It is possible that some of the escaped prisoners, with their minds as well as their bodies diseased from their prolonged torture in their mud prisons on the other side of the river, may have sought vengeance by fire upon their tormentors, and often when the memory of those tragic events comes up before me I see, as if it had been a weird prophetic vision, that group of ragged men with their glaring eyes and pallid faces, and I again hear that terrible cry: "Curse them! curse them! curse them!"

The verdict which history will render of this eventful episode of the war will be made up from the statement of General Sherman in his well-considered, remarkable report of the Campaign of the Carolinas: "And without hesitation I charge General Wade Hampton with having burned his own city of Columbia, not with malicious intent, nor as a manifestation of 'Roman stoicism,' but from folly, and want of sense."

NEWSPAPERIANA.

THE most interesting departments of a newspaper to many individuals include the births, marriages, and deaths, which a humorous editor in the West classifies under the headings of "Hatched," "Matched," and "Dispatched;" while yet another places marriages under the line "Noose of the Weak." In olden times these were more notable as literary curiosities than in the present. The first heading is but little used in this country, being almost confined to Europe, although much might be said in favor of its adoption every where. The second, perhaps, is of the most general use, but its contents have been sadly reduced. In the childhood of newspapers they gave us fuller information of the bride and bridegroom than now commonly published, and therefore saved many inquiries. For example, take a batch of marriages from a Scotch newspaper of 1730:

"Mr. Baskett to Miss Pell, with £5000.

"Mr. Davis to Mrs. Wyld, with £400 per annum.

"The Lord Bishop of St. Asaph to Miss Orell, with £30,000.

"J. Whitcombe, Esq., to Miss Allen, with £40,000.

"Mr. Will Hurfer to Miss Sally Mitchener, with £3000."

These, at least, showed in part the worth of the women who had changed their state. Of similar import are some contained in the Salisbury Journal, January 29, 1738. As we read them we can not but think that the matrimonial announcements now published must yield the palm of interest to those contained in the early provincial papers. It is something to hear about the person of the bride, her figure, and her fortune:

"Married, at St. George's, Hanover Square, — A yves, of the county of Northampton, Esq., to Miss Ann Sampson, only daughter of John Sampson, of the county of Leicester, Esq., a young lady of £10,000 fortune.

"Mr. Henry Murray, Esq., a young gentleman possessed of a plentiful estate in the county of Wilts, at St. George's, Bloomsbury, to Mrs. Wicks, relict of Simon Wicks, Esq., a fortune of £12,000 and £400 per annum.

"Lientenant Cotton Dent, of the Royal Navy, son of Digby Dent, Esq., late Commodore in the West Indies, to Miss Kitty Bowerbank, daughter of Thomas Bowerbank, Esq., barrack-master of Portsmouth, a lady of merit and fortune.

"Villiers Fitz Gerald, Esq., to Miss Newcomen, eldest daughter to Colonel Newcomen, in Ireland, a most agreeable young lady, with a large fortune."

Sometimes our American editors travel beyond the record and add to the customary announcement. Occasionally they are known to indulge in a little pleasantry, in the form of an epithalamium, thereby showing their ready wit and acknowledging the slice of cake. A single example, for which the Boston Post is responsible, must suffice:

"Married—Thomas Hawk, of Mansfield, to Miss Sarah J. Dove.

"It isn't often that you see
So queer a kind of love,
Oh, what a savage he must be,
To Tommy Hawk a Dove!"

But the unctuous way in which a bachelor editor, lately married, talks of his bliss is really tantalizing to the inexperienced. Writing of his newly-found happiness, he says:

"A pair of sweet lips, a pressure or two of delicate hands, and a pink waist-ribbon, will do as much to unhinge a man as three fevers, the measles, a large-sized whooping-cough, a pair of lock-jaws, several hydrophobias, and the doctor's bill."

It may appear to be almost sacrilegious even to smile at obituary notices, but it can not always be resisted. A certain Philadelphia daily gives more reason in its obituary column for eachinnation than all the rest of the paper. It is but fair, however, to state that its notices are paid for. Some of their verses are apparently stereotyped and appear in almost every paper. Others are unique and confessedly original. Such is the following on the death of a child, and is a fine specimen of bathos:

"So sweet a flower to bloom on earth,
The rose that crowned our little plot
Has withered here to blossom forth
In a superior flower-pot.
His body lies in the Union ground,
His soul has gone to Him who gave it;
And shall we never hear again
The prattling of our little Jacob?"

The above, as Weller would say, "goes from bad to verse." I opine that the editor who announced that he would not publish poetical obituaries unless paid for, while he "would be happy at any time to publish a simple announcement of the death of any of his friends," must have been now and then troubled with such visitations as the above.

Of course, none other but a Western paper could have given us the following in a notice of the death of a prominent citizen:

"He was the father of eleven sons, five of whom married five sisters. He had one hundred and eighty-nine grandchildren; and at his funeral, two weeks ago last Sabbath, two horses were stung to death by bees, and another came very near losing his life by the same."

Another paper in the same locality gives, as below, a wholesome specimen of an honest obituary—something really uncommon:

"He came to his death by too frequently nibbling at the essence of the still-worm, which soon placed him in a non-traveling condition. He lay out the night previous to his death near a cotton gin in this place, and was found too late on the following morning for medical aid to be of much importance in staying his breath. He has been a regular tippler for the last half century."

A paragraph published in the Foxtown Fusilier betrays, perhaps, a little professional jealousy, but serves as an obituary and advertisement:

"POSTSCRIPT.—We stop the press, with pleasure, to announce the decease of our cotemporary, Mr. Snaggs, editor of the Foxtown Flash. He has now gone to another and a better world. Success to him. Persons who have taken the Flash will find the Fusilier a good paper."

A fictitious notice of death sent to the editor of the Worcester (Mass.) Spy, is thus served up quite daintily, and made to answer a double purpose:

"If Pratt was really dead, we should be very happy to write his obituary for nothing; but as we are quite certain he is alive, and may see these lines, we would respectfully suggest to him that he has an unsettled account at this office, and that if he has any serious intention of dying, it may ease his conscience a little, in the last hour, to know that he has paid the printer."

Obituary notices may be occasionally gratifying to survivors, but I have rarely known them to have been of much consequence to the subjects themselves. The Circleville (Ohio) Journal, however, thought otherwise when, as an inducement to certain of its friends, it stated that "all subscribers paying in advance will be entitled to a first-rate obituary notice in case of death."

Another Western paper chronicling the lamentable occurrence of a staging, attached to a church, being blown down and "fatally injuring" a workman, very feelingly said:

"We are happy to state that over twenty persons were suddenly brought to the ground safe, and one man, Mr. Wilkins, had his neck broke. Mr. W. was an estimable young man, and the father of a good many children, besides a large farm well stocked. He was fatally injured."

Upon yet another paper the pressure of death appears to have been heavy, the editor printing the notice in one of his issues, "Several deaths unavoidably deferred."

The last to be now cited is a most graceful notice in a Southern paper of a brother of the quill, lately deceased, under the caption, "An Editor in Heaven," the first of all places, next to the printing-office, which he deserves to inherit, for there "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." The obituary closes with these words:

"Are we not also glad that such an editor is in heaven? There the cry of 'more copy' shall never again fall upon distracted ears. There he shall never be abused any more by his political opponents, with lies and detractions that should shame a demon to promulgate. There he shall never be used as a ladder for the aspiring to kick down as soon as they reach the desired height and need him no more. There he shall be able to see the immense masses of mind he has moved, all unknowing and unknown as he has been during his weary pilgrimage on earth. There he will find all articles credited—not a clap of his thunder stolen—and there shall be no horrid typographical errors to set him in a fever."

The labors and therefore difficulties of an editor are multifarious. If he should happen to be merely a "local" he must prove himself a man not only of incredible industry, but should or at least pretend to be thoroughly posted on all subjects, from the sublime to the ridiculous. Several months since a member of the corps thus capably epitomized the necessary qualifications of a successful local editor, all of which representation may be regarded as correct, and therefore fitting for the information of certain ambitious young men:

"A good local must combine the loquacity of a magician with the impudence of the d—l. He must know how to time a race-horse, gaff a cock, teach a Sunday-school, preach a charity sermon, run a saw-mill, keep a hotel, turn a double somersault, and brew whisky. He must be up to a thing or two in political economy, and au fait in the matter of cooking beans. On the trail of mysterious items he must be a veritable greyhound. His hide must be like that of the rhinoceros. He must be insensible to the crudest snubs, and manifest no sense of anger when he is kicked down stairs. He must throw modesty to the dogs. But, above all, he must be an adept at the art of puffing. The nearer he approaches to the blacksmith's bellows the better he will succeed. He must be ready at all times to say something funny in regard to Smith's grocery, or to surround Miss Flounce's millinery establishment with a halo of glowing adjectives. He must be enthusiastic on the subject of hams, verbose in extolling hardware, and highly imaginative in the matter of dry-goods. He must look pleased when invited to walk sixteen squares in the broiling sun to write a six-line puff for a labor-saving churn or a patent washing machine. He must feel grateful when invited to dine at the Dogsnose Hotel, and write a glowing account of the excellence of the hash and the durability of the beef-steak. If he feels any sense of humiliation in sitting down to a festal gathering, on the occasion of the presentation of a sword to Captain Sankopanzky, or a set of silver service to a horse inspector, he must smother it, and revenge himself on the Champagne and cigars. He must affect to believe that he is invited in a purely social way, and not for the sake of having him write a good account of the ceremonies, with three columns of speeches in full, for the next morning's paper. If he flags in his description of Hodge's premium bull, or 'let's down' in winding up the oil indications of Shovedyke's farm, he must take it kindly for being reproved for his shortcomings. In the matter of show, the local must always be brilliant. He must talk learnedly of panoramas, with a liberal admixture of knowing words, such as 'warmth,' 'tone,' 'foreshortening,' 'high lights,' 'fore-ground,' 'perspective,' etc.; he must be heavy on concerts, with a capacity to appreciate Miss Squawk's execution of difficult feats in the 'upper register'; he must be ecstatic in praise of double-headed calves, and eloquent in behalf of fat women and living skeletons. All this, and more, it takes to be a 'local.'"

The onerousness of the work of one occupying such a position is best illustrated, perhaps, by the journal of an employé of a French paper, who although he might not have been strictly a local, his duties were very similar. An extract:

"To-day I have been a journalist collector of news for sixteen years. I have not been ill a single day, and, excepting on the five great festivals of the year, I have not failed to make up and distribute my correspondence to the journals of Paris and the Departments every day.

"As my working year is thus 360 days, to-day makes 5760 days that I have worked on the daily press. Consequently, I have made up 5760 budgets of news. As each budget contained, on the average, 20 facts or different pieces of news, it follows that I have sent into the world 115,200 articles of intelligence.

"Every day, to collect and distribute these news, I have traveled on the average 10 leagues, which amounts to 3600 leagues a year, and in sixteen years to 57,600 leagues. The circuit of the terrestrial globe being about 9000 leagues, it follows that in sixteen years, to find my 115,200 pieces of news, I have traveled as much as six and one-third times the circuit of the globe.

"I affirm, on my honor, that I have never suffered the least attack of that cruel malady called the gout. From this I conclude that those citizens who shall, like me, travel ten leagues a day, will not have to suffer any further from that terrible malady.

"Finally, to sum up the results: On the average I have honestly gained 1800 francs a year. Consequently, through the publishers and editors of the journals, I have made 28,800 francs, of which there remain to-day 12 francs 50c. [about $2 25], which I hope will carry me through to the 30th of the present month."

Arduous, however, as are his duties, which are scarcely exaggerated in the above, they have their jests and fun like common people. As the various insurance companies, savings'-banks, State officials, and missionary societies are making their annual reports, and publishing long columns of figures which are of the most intense interest to the reading public generally, the local reporter of the Memphis Bulletin gives his also for the year:

The poor fellow refers to having "whipped the other fellow" but four times, which scarcely speaks well for his "science" or independence. Of a very different character was a sharp fellow named Doolittle, of whom I have an anecdote but little known. He was a Connecticut "exotic." About twenty years ago he was transplanted from Harvard University to one of the Southern States, for the purpose of assuming the editorial control of a violent party paper, where no one ever labored with advantage for the party, simply because an infinite quantity of pistols and a multiplicity of bowie-knives prevented the strenuous advocacy of certain principles, and fettered the freedom of speech in elegant style of efficacy. Doolittle was highly educated, was impetuous, brave, yet—with the characteristic cunning of his tribe—careful of his own interests. He took hold of the paper with a determination to make it "serviceable to the cause," and serviceable he did make it. The opposing candidate was a bad fellow—a duelist, a dram-drinker, a lover of "poker," and a decided votary of Venus. Doolittle dared what no other editor had dared—he said so. The day on which his article appeared the candidate entered the editorial chamber.

"You are Doolittle, the editor of this paper?" holding a copy of the sheet in his hand.

"I am."

"You have libeled and insulted me, and"—(drawing a large knife)—"I have come for your ears."

"I beg your pardon," said Doolittle. "I am a stranger to your customs, and perhaps have taken a license which, in this part of the country, is inexcusable. Such is, I think, the fact. Suppose we compromise the matter?"

"Very well," said the bluff Southerner; "I'll kick you, and you shall make a full retraction."

"You'll what?" said Doolittle, quietly.

"Kick you."

"You insist upon that little privilege?"

"I am unalterably fixed in my determination!"

"So am I"—said Doolittle, firing a horse-pistol, as big as a blunderbuss, and shattering the Southerner's right leg—"not to be kicked!"

He held his situation six months; was stabbed twice, shot three times, belabored with a bludgeon once, thrown into a pond once, but he was never kicked. During his six months' experience he killed two of his adversaries. All of these are absolute facts.

That editors are frequently independent can not be doubted by those who read the metropolitan press. One of the smallest but most amusing instances, perhaps, occurred in New York in 1849. A man in that city, wishing to obtain a certain office under the Government, sent to the New York Courier and Enquirer a puff of himself, with a promise of fifty dollars in case he succeeded in his aim. The editors published both the puff and the promise, thus killing the candidate politically.

Turning away from the metropolis to the village, a country paper furnishes the following example of "glorious independence," well worthy of imitation:

"We do not belong to our 'patrons,'
Our paper is wholly our own;
Whoever may like it can take it,
Who don't can just let it alone."

There are but few, however, who can afford to take so noble a stand. I cite the above, therefore, as a most remarkable, nay, as an almost isolated instance of independence on the part of a country editor.

The experiences of the country editor are divers. He is not only editor-in-chief but every thing else—even occasionally playing the very "devil." He frequently sets his own type, handles his roller, works his press, keeps his books, writes his editorials, and does work generally, besides sometimes sawing and splitting his own wood, dangling the baby, and carrying water. He is, however, often in difficulty when obliged to leave his home in search of delinquent subscribers, or to attend to other equally momentous and unprofitable business. Then it is that the paper is frequently handed over to the care of the loving wife or diligent "devil."

An amusing circumstance occurred, not very long since, in the history of the Green Bay (Wisconsin) Advocate. The editor, during an absence, left the management of the paper in the hands of his wife, who, being a good Republican, took the Democratic ticket down from its columns, and wrote some energetic Republican editorials. The editor, it appears, was soon afterward again obliged to leave his home, when his substitute announced as follows:

"Our editor has gone to Madison, and in order to make a sure thing of it, and prevent the appearance of any more Republican editorials, has taken his wife with him."

The "devil," however, plays more innocent pranks, but never forbears to inform the public "who's who" in the temporary management. And never does he fail to display his native pride. Thus, the editor of a Vermont paper being absent from his post, his sub poctically exclaimed:

"The editor's absent; his scissors and quill
Are left with the 'devil' to handle at will;
This item is given, kind reader, that you
May for once, as you read, 'give the devil his due.'"

In another case, that of the Newcastle (Pennsylvania) Courant, the "devil," a young man of parts, and evidently on his way to fame, thus writes:

"The improvement in the general appearance of this number of the Courant is owing to the absence of the editor!"

"N.B.—When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for us to forsake, for a brief period, the 'ink-keg' and 'roller,' and take our place in the chair, editorially, a due respect for our vanity makes it incumbent on us to give the following notice, to wit: viz.: as follows: During this week all editorial favors, such as wedding-cake, bouquets, cigars, specimen whisky, and other summer drinks, Thanksgiving turkeys, and all the et ceteras that are part of the emoluments of our new position, should be sent to the DEVIL."

Here is another instance of a courageous editress which I have under the date Jan. 2, 1855. Mrs. Prewett, who, after the death of her husband, edited the Yazoo (Mississippi) Whig, having received an offensive note, published a slightly severe rebuke couched in the following language:

"If the biped that sent us the anonymous letter from Jackson, signed 'Cherubusco,' will come to Yazoo city, and call at the Whig office, two noble little boys, one eight and the other six years old, shall tie a leather medal around his neck, as a due-bill for a flogging they owe him, payable some ten years hence, with compound interest."

We sometimes find, again, that country editors are occasionally short of editorial and other reading matter, for the absence of which their excuses are of "all sorts." For instance, a Hoosier editor thus writes:

"A little 'circumstance' in our domestic affairs, which is not likely to occur often than once in a year or two, must apologize for any deficiency in our editorial department."

Another. Hooper, the witty editor of the Lafayette (Alabama) Tribune thus gives vent to a little bad humor arising from lack of "matter:"

"OFF OUR FOOT.—We can't help it, and we wouldn't if we could. For the life of us we can't make up a decent paper this week. We have had a little cold for several days—we have fretted about little money matters—the hands in the office are all half sick and out of humor—the weather is nasty—and our whole editorial machine-box is as intractable as a stubborn mule in a mud-hole. We promised to 'do' one of the 'Montgomery Characters' for this Number; but we sha'n't! 'It's no use knockin' at the door,' we are off our foot, sick, mad, and ready to fight any one of our subscribers who doesn't like our remarks, provided he doesn't weigh more than one hundred and fifteen pounds."

A Down-East quill-driver modestly apologizes as follows. Perhaps his reasons are sufficient:

"Yesterday, we had a note to pay, a libel-suit to look after, and a new telegraph arrangement to negotiate. If any one thinks that he could attend to all these things and write editorials too, we should like to employ him as an assistant."

The editor of the Asheville (North Carolina) Messenger would seem to be a thorough "man of all work," judging by the following substantial reasons he gave for his homeopathic dose of editorial in a late Number:

"Our editor (fortunately for our readers) is short this week. We have no apology to make, only that we are an editor, a squire, county-registrar, house and sign painter, tavern-keeper, singing-master, fiddler, 'daddy' of two children, and a first-rate boot-black and whitewasher. Having our professional engagements sometimes pretty well divided, it is out of our power to 'do equal and exact justice' to all, without cracking a brain or splitting our cabbage head."

Another editor, and a Western one at that, expresses the hope that his subscribers will excuse the scarcity of original matter in a certain Number of his paper, for he has "had the headache, the gout, a fit of the ague and fever, and an increase of one to his family, besides, he hasn't been very well himself." He, of course, under such circumstances, ought to be excused.

But about the coolest thing on record is the advice of the editor of the Madison Courier, who, in the absence of reading matter from his paper, remarked, that if reading the news alone was the object of his subscribers, "they will find enough that is new to them in the Bible, and it is good reading too."

Of the many trials of the country editor those arising from poverty, mainly caused by delinquent subscribers, are probably the most abundant, but amidst them all the poor fellow seems to carry a merry heart. At any rate, he strives to drive dull care away from the end of his pen. Seldom is this better seen than in the "dunning" paragraphs, in which the writer sometimes discloses family secrets, the lightest word of which is designed to harrow up the soul of the debtor. It would sometimes seem as if the writer, like the renowned King Richard, could smile while he murdered. Yet, how pitiful are many of these, especially when we know how, for the most part, true they are!

As a matter of history, before referring to cases of less note, and perhaps better illustrative of this point, I would refer to that of Samuel Keimer, whose name so often occurs in the history of Benjamin Franklin. In 1723 a paper was issued from the Friends' Monthly Meeting, setting forth that Samuel Keimer, who had then lately arrived from Europe, had printed divers papers, particularly one styled "The Parable," wherein he assumes the language of Friends; wherefore they certify that he is not of their society, nor countenanced by them. This proved to be rather an awkward introduction to the public. In 1728 he started The Pennsylvania Gazette in opposition to Bradford's Weekly Mercury. It was announced in a strange braggadocia style, and in one year failed and fell into the hands of Franklin, who conducted it with success for many years, while poor Keimer got into prison. In 1734 he set up an establishment as a printer and publisher at Barbadoes. In his poetical appeal to his patrons there he gives some facts as to the compensation of American colonial printers:

"What a pity it is that some modern bravadoes
Who dub themselves gentlemen here in Barbadoes,
Should time after time run in debt to their printer,
And care not to pay him in summer or winter!
In Penn's wooden country Type feels no disaster,
The printers grow rich—one is made their postmaster."

In farther pursuing his subject he shows that Mr. William Bradford, of New York, had £60 a year from the king. In Maryland and Virginia each province allowed the "established" editors £200 a year; for, he added, "by law he is paid 50,000 pounds' weight country produce"—meaning tobacco.

"But, alas! your poor Type prints no figure like mullo;
Cursed, cheated, abused by each pitiful fellow—
Though working like a slave, with zeal and true courage,
He can scarce get as yet even salt to his partridge!"

He was, however, able to continue his paper, as two octavo volumes of extracts from it were published in London.

Modern instances will show that the times have not much improved. The unfortunate editor of an Indiana journal thus addresses his delinquent subscribers:

"HARD UP.—It is but seldom we trouble our patrons by asking them to fork over the small balance due us; but we think if they only knew how difficult a task it is for us to make provisions to protect Sally and the children from the cold chilling blast of winter that is now coming upon us like an avalanche, it would hardly be necessary to say pay more than once, for they would come to our rescue instantler."

"One more unfortunate" in Kentucky speaks to his patrons in these touching words:

"Friends, we are almost penniless—Job's turkey was almost a millionaire compared with our present depressed treasury. To-day, if the price of salt was two cents a barrel, we couldn't buy enough to pickle a jay-bird."

Another appeals thus to the sympathies of his readers :

"We can not help thinking how much easier an editor's life might be made if his generous patrons could only hear his 'better half' scraping the bottom of the flour-barrel! A man that can write editorials with such music sounding in his ears, can easily walk the telegraph wires and turn somersaults in the branches of a thorn bush."

Another writes on the subject more philosophically, but not the less points his moral :

"Every man ought to pay his debts, if he can. Every man ought to get married, if he can. Every man should do his work to suit his customers, if he can. Every wife should sometimes hold her tongue, if she can. Every lawyer should occasionally tell the truth, if he can. Every man ought to mind his own business, and let other people's alone, if he can. Every man should take a newspaper and guy for it ANY NOW."

The Louisville Times has a fair "take off" on the expression "in a few days," so commonly used by poor debtors, and applies it to serve a good purpose. He who can not see its wit is to be pitied :

"You present a man a small account, he will pay you 'in a few days;' pretty girls expect to marry 'in a few days;' we expect to give our readers some interesting local news 'in a few days.' And we are hoping that a great many of our subscribers will send the amount of their dues 'in a few days.' In fact, we know they will, for some of them have been promising to 'do that little thing' every few days for a year or two. We expect them to be 'in funds in a few days.'"

The following "dun" of a poetical stripe is worthy of preservation in these columns, if only as a good parody on the popular song, "Then you'll remember me," in Balfé's opera entitled the "Bohemian Girl:"

"When other bills and other duns
Their tale of woe shall tell,
Of notes in bank, 'without the funds,'
And cotton hard to sell;
There may, perhaps, in such a scene
Some recollection be
Of bills that longer due have been,
And you'll remember me!

"When 'hard up' customers shall wring
Your hearts with hopes in vain,
And deem it but a trifling thing
To tell you 'call again,'
When calling proves a useless task,
Without the lawyer's fee,
In such a moment I but ask
That you'll remember me!"

Two other representative instances of the poverty of this class may yet be given. The first is that of a Western editor who lately called his "devil" to him, and told him that he could not afford to hire his services any longer, unless he would agree either to take nine-pence a week for them, or share equally the profits of his paper. The boy concluded to stay, but unhesitatingly chose the nine-pence a week for his wages.

The other is of a more melancholy character, and refers to a New Hampshire editor who, while recently traveling, had his wallet abstracted from his pocket by some adroit thief. The pickpocket was so disgusted with the result of his exploit that he returned the plunder by express to the address written inside the wallet, with the following note :

"You miserabil skunk, hears yure pocket-book. Fur a man dressed as well as you was to go round with a wellit with nuthin in it but a lot of noospapur scraps, a ivory tuthecom, too noospapur stamps, and a pas from a rale-rode directur, is a contempterbul impursion on the public. As I hear yure a edditur I return yure trash. I never robs any only gentlemen."

The editor of the Alabama Argus, published at Demopolis, seems to have been thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Mark Tapley, when, after the following fashion, he showed himself "jolly" under what most people would consider a serious circumstance :

"We see that the sheriff, during our absence, has advertised the Argus for sale. We hope the bidders will have a merry time of it. If the sheriff can sell it he will do more than we ever could. Like a damp percussion-cap we think it will fail to 'go off.'"

But, verily, we must have fallen on the "last days" in which St. Peter declared that "scoffers" should come. For are not these men scoffers of poverty? And not only of poverty, but also of riches; for should once an editor become fortuitously wealthy, he is regarded as a rara avis, and his name emblazoned in full caps in every paper in the country. Read how the editor of the Horicon (Wisconsin) Argus discourses :

"An exchange says that editors are, as a general thing, not overstocked with worldly goods. Humbug! Here are we, editor of a country paper, fairly rolling in wealth. We have a good office, a double-barreled rifle, seven suits of clothes, three kittens, a Newfoundland pup, two gold watches, thirteen day and two night shirts, carpets on our floor, a pretty wife, own one corner lot, have ninety-three cents in cash, are out of debt, and have no rich relatives. If we are not wealthy it is a pity."

Here now is a small batch which reminds one of an editor who wrote his editorials on the soles of his boots and went barefoot while his boy set up the manuscript—so making himself rich by saving paper :

"There is a rich editor in New Hampshire who has made his money by always practicing economy. He always writes his editorials on a slate."—Mail.

"There is another who saves the expense of his slate and steals his editorials from us."—Concord Recorder.

"But you don't mean to say that he gets rich off such stealings? Should think he'd starve for want of subscribers."—Mail.

"What a rumpus a rich editor always does kick up!" spitefully adds a Western contemporary.

Alas, alas! it is that so many of these creators and conservators of public opinion are doomed to travel in the walks of poverty, and that while so few of them are bred to the profession, in the majority of cases the business is not bred to the editor. Hence many a burning and shining light of literature is obscured by the withdrawal of editors to private life. The valedictories of such are among the most curious specimens of pathos to be found in our language. Two or three of these are now quoted to be immortalized by a place in these pages.

Mr. Edward Willett, one of the editors and proprietors of the Cairo Times and Delta, takes farewell of his readers in the following expressive language :

"I know well that I need not offer a word of justification for the course. I have struggled and starved long enough for Cairo; have wasted nearly three years of active, vigorous, youthful life, the end of which shows a beggarly account of nothing at all, except much friendship and a little reputation; and as Scripture bids us to rejoice in the days of our youth, I desire, before that halcyon period is quite ended, to obey its precepts in some measure. I leave Cairo with deep affection for my friends, of contempt for my enemies, if any I have, and of infinite disgust for that abominable old nuisance, the Cairo Company."

I give another, which approaches almost to the sublime notwithstanding its free and easy style. R. S. Goelet, of the Pass Christian (La.) Times, on retiring from the editorial charge of that paper, was safely delivered of the following:

"VALEDICTORY—STAND FROM UNDER.

"Fare thee well, thus disunited,
Torn from every nearer tie,
Scared in heart, and lone and blighted,
More than this I scarce can die."

"Although we have been engaged in the editorial business for several years, yet we never wrote a valedictory, under such circumstances, in the whole course of our life; nor did we expect so soon to be called upon to do so; but as it is, we do the best we can.

"We retire from the chair editorial of the Times with the full conviction that all is vanity. In general we have found our patrons to be upright and honorable personages, but in part we have been dealing with a set of scoundrels and villains, and as evil communications are apt to corrupt good morals, we retire in disgust from the present scene of our labors. We have been solicited to lie upon every subject; to insert said lies free gratis; to send our paper to those who are able but too mean to pay what they owe; to puff into notoriety all business, without a faint hope of remuneration or reward. We have endeavored to build up the 'Pass,' and are pleased to see that our labors have been crowned with success; notwithstanding all this two bob-tail-would-be S. P.'s ('Some Pumpkins') have done all in their power against us; but we beg to assure them that their labors are duly appreciated and kindly remembered.

"As for the ladies (Heaven bless them!), we have found a few true ones among the many, but who they are we feel not called upon to say. But as for the girls—by girls we mean all the single members of the softer sex under the age of thirty—these lines picture them:

"The girls are all a fleeting show
For man's delusion given;
Their smiles of joy, their tears of woe,
Deceitful shine, deceitful flow;
There's not one true in seven."

"But the parting hour is at hand when we are called upon to bid adieu to you, dear reader, perhaps forever. The chain that has bound us together has been broken by circumstances over which we have no control, and we must depart on the road pointed out by destiny. But go where we will, we will ever cherish fond remembrances of the past and hope for the future—what the future will be we know not, but we hope we may all meet again in that bright heavenly home where we are never called upon to say 'good-by.'

"ROBERT S. GOELET, EX-ED."

But I must quote one other, the reason given for withdrawal from "the chair" being so unusual and praiseworthy that every reader will naturally desire the speedy restoration of the health of the writer:

"The undersigned retires from the editorial chair with the conviction that all is vanity. From the hour he started this paper to the present time he has been solicited to lie upon every given subject, and can't remember having told a wholesome truth without diminishing his subscription list or making an enemy. Under these circumstances of trial, having a thorough contempt for himself, he retires in order to recruit his moral constitution."

I can not refrain from inserting in this paper some rich morceaux of editorial humor on "things in general," with two or more instances of ludicrous blundering. Thus, for instance, does an editor puff his own class:

"A newspaper may be destroyed at night, it may light a cigar, it may curl a lady's hair. Ah! only think of that, girls! An editor's thoughts completely, sweetly, exquisitely wreathed in your rich tresses, and—yes, nestling down with you in your midnight slumbers, to gently guard and peacefully keep watch over your happy dreams! Who would not be an editor?"

Another goes to work to display his scholarship, and hunts after the root of the name Canistota. Our Western friend gives its derivation thus:

"Canis, dog; and totas, whole; that is, dog (whole). Some of the Canistotans may growl at this, but, on the whole, we think the game not worth even a growl."

Another, who would depreciate and write down a contemporary, writes that "his mind is so small that it might dance a hornpipe in a mosquito's watch-fob."

A California paper, attempting to be witty and severe at the expense of a new-born contemporary, spoke of it, saying—what may truly be said of too many journals—"It only lacks ability and character to be influential."

Another, in striving to be just to a rival contemporary, magnanimously wrote:

"He was formerly a member of Congress, but rapidly rose until he obtained a respectable position as an editor—a noble example of perseverance under depressing circumstances."

The last, however, is decidedly less complimentary when speaking of a quill-driving friend:

"His intellect is so dense that it would take the augur of common-sense longer to penetrate it than to bore through Mont Blanc with a boiled carrot."

But how queerly and carelessly do some of them strain at metaphors and mix up hyperbole! The following fearful announcement lately appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Star; and while it is a curious conglomeration of horticulture, fire, and water, is a pretty fair specimen of stellar literature:

"It is evident from this that the apple of discord has been thrown into our midst, and, unless nipped in the bud, it threatens to burst forth into a conflagration that will deluge the whole land."

This is almost paralleled by the remark of the Boston Pilot, some years ago, while congratulating the Whig party upon its non-alliance with Know-Nothingism, that it had refused to be bound to "the chariot-wheels of this mushroom."

The following "splendiferous" sentence is from the pen of a Down-East editor, who, speaking of a literary contemporary, spreads himself thus:

"The raft on which he was fast pulling himself into the Federal eddy has been suddenly brought up against the wreck of that party, so that, by certain feats of lofty tumbling, he is on his face before the passing simoom of fanaticism, bigotry, and proscription."

A Western editor also "cuts it rather fat" in speaking of a man who had been bitten by a mad dog, which he brilliantly lengthened out by saying: "He was attacked by a canine quadruped while laboring under cerebral excitement."

But for a "blazing burst" of eloquence commend me to a worthy writer in the "Nutmeg State," who some time ago, in describing the burning of a barn, the property of a man who had been active in prosecuting the vendors of ardent spirits, indulged in the following:

"There can be little doubt but that this blazing barn with its contents, valued at about $350, with the cow belching in agony from which she could not be relieved, should be hung on the northern branch of the Connecticut rum tree as its legitimate fruit."

The violations of syntax are sometimes fairly excruciating, but nevertheless apt to cause a bursting of buttons. A New Orleans editor, recording the career of a mad dog, says:

"We are grieved to say that a rabid animal, before it could be killed, severely bit Dr. Hart and several other dogs."

A New York paper, announcing the arrival of a vessel near the Narrows, says:

"The only passengers were T. B. Nathan, who owned three-fourths of the cargo and the captain's wife."

The editors of a Western paper observe:

"The poem which we publish in this week's Herald was written by an esteemed friend, who has lain many years in the grave for his own amusement."

The editor of an Eastern newspaper expresses great indignation at the manner in which a woman, who had committed suicide, was buried:

"She was buried like a dog with her clothes on."

But here I must close my chapter of elegant extracts, selected from my huge pile, illustrative of many matters pertaining to newspaper life. And this I can not do better than by an extract from the Printer's Prayer, first published in Peter Edes's journal in 1816:

"Protect and bless us, and keep us from the evils of the night, and when we lay down may we ask ourselves what we have done for the good and instruction of mankind; if not much, and we have leisure to do it, may we repent, and by the next number get out a rich and fertile sheet."

So mote it be!

THE ST. LEONS.

I WAS a Northern woman, and my husband was an Englishman by birth. We were dwelling in a Southern State, and keeping house; so, of course, we needed servants, and as there were no white servants we were obliged to hire those who were colored, and who were held as slaves. It was now Christmas week, when all such arrangements were made for the next twelve months, and to a housekeeper situated as I was it was a time of some anxiety.

I was in a deep meditation. I was not much of a housekeeper, and I had been very desirous that my husband should not discover my ignorance—certainly that he should never suffer by it. His profession called him away from home most of the first year of our married life. The following, which was our first year of housekeeping, I was less alone than was desirable for a person addicted to store-room experiments, and tied to weights and measures. It cost me great labor and some tact to cover up my occupation; not that I was ashamed of it, held as it was in such esteem, especially in that part of the country, but I was so far from being the expert I desired to be considered that I dreaded exposure and mortification. Of course only my successes found their way to the dining-room, and I tried to take the praise for these as if I was used to the delicate flattery.

At last the secret was out. Reginald happened to come upon me in the pastry-room in the midst of a hopeless failure in a grand culinary exploit; when the flour was bestowed upon my perplexed brow with less care than pearl-powder, and the red of the heated cheek was quite too deep to be becoming. My unfitness to be the mistress of an aspiring establishment, unless with the best of servants, had to be confessed.

I was too young a wife, and felt the mortification of the disclosure too much to be very severely reproached for my little deception as to my accomplishments; so, leaving behind us the débris of my failure, and commending various half-finished dishes to the good intentions of honest and ignorant Crecy, who served as cook, Reginald drew me to my dressing-room to repair my toilet and to discuss an improvement in our domestic establishment.

"Don't pity me Regi—pray don't," said I, looking up from the cool bath I was giving my heated face; "I could not bear that at all. Haven't I done well before this? Was not that a delightful curry yesterday? Does any one have better pilaws than we have? Whose boiled custards are best, Mrs. Clayton's or mine, and she the best housekeeper in Middle Georgia? What jellies I can make! You wished for an artist once to paint my dessert, my dear Sir, and haven't I heard you say that the pickles and sweetmeats of our table spoiled you for all others? Oh, Regi, I can tell you every word of praise you ever gave me!"

"I don't wonder, my water-nymph, when you had toiled so hard to earn the praise. I confess to your unparalleled excellence—but Nee-lic—"

"Oh, you don't like cabbage-rose cheeks, and you have the plebeian taste to object to powdered hair."

"No, these are endurable. You could bear even such an abuse of your good looks without losing them."

"Well, what then, pray? Are you going to take to giving dinner-parties every week before you get to be Judge? What bad taste again! Do you want game suppers as often? What is the reason poor Crecy and I are to be dethroned?"

Reginald's face appeared above mine in the mirror, before which I was trying to arrange some stray curls. He laid his finger on my forehead and said:

"A little line is coming between your brows that will grow into a wrinkle, and the gray of these curls will be less easily removed than the powder which you have just brushed away, if I let you worry over your housekeeping at this rate. I only propose getting you a good cook, my wife, when with your present knowledge of the cuisine you could issue your orders grandiloquently."

"But good servants are not hired out, Reginald. It is an extraordinary circumstance for really accomplished servants to be found out of the families where they are owned. They are too much prized to be parted with."

"On that score be at rest. This very morning I chanced to hear of an excellent woman, a most skillful cook, whom the Scrantons are going to hire out for the coming year."

"Why do they part with her?"

"I don't know. I believe they have another."

"I want to know something about this woman before you hire her, Reginald."

"Know what? They ask a tremendous price for her—no less than ten dollars a month, and she has two little children who must go with her. But Mr. Scranton told Harry Lee this morning that she was well worth the price."

And so I meditated: "We have already Crecy, the cook—pains-taking, honest, respectful and incompetent Crecy; Maria, her daughter, who is chamber-maid; Celia, the laundress; Louis, the waiter; and 'old Harry,' the gardener—a large enough complement of servants, one would think, for a family of three persons! Then those children! But there are rooms enough in the servants' quarters of this old house for twenty people. The children will cost us nothing. Crecy can be installed as a kind of housekeeper—oh, if she were only as competent as she is willing and honest! Well, I confess it will be an immense relief; especially if the Odeons stop on their way from the Springs, and the Maxwells come up to Commencement, and Hal marries and brings out his bride here for a wedding trip." My meditation ended with this conclusion, and I said:

"Well, you are such a good, thoughtful fellow, Regi, and I know you only want to save me trouble, so if you really think we had better have this woman, and if you will find out why the Scrantons hire her out and keep that old crone at home who almost poisoned us with her miserable cooking the day we dined there, why I will not say a word against it, and you shall have as many game suppers as you want; and I—I will not say I will keep my beauty, that would be too absurd—but I will delight you with such charming toilets as will pay you for being so very, very good, you dear old fellow!"

"Bless me, what gratitude! And you have been trying all this time to make me believe that you liked housekeeping! Well, Neelie, we will have this accomplished Therese, and you shall have a respite from the pastry-room. You could even trust Crecy 'to give out' for you, and so be saved all trouble."

"I don't know about trusting Crecy 'to give out.' No, I mean about putting one servant over another."

"Nonsense! it's the commonest thing in the world to have a colored housekeeper, and Crecy can be trusted with untold gold."

I was having an audience with the new cook, the "accomplished Therese." She was a French mulatto, and it was evident at a glance that she was a woman of strong passions, of much force of character, altogether of uncommon mould. She was large and well-built; a little stout, without losing the symmetry for which any one would have remarked her. Certainly she was a very beautiful woman. I had to acknowledge that. Her magnificent black hair lay in heavy waves under the folds of the bright handkerchief which was arranged on her head with as much elegance as an Eastern turban. Her large eyes looked forth at her new mistress without a droop of the heavy lid, commanding, full of fire, and with anything but the expression a young and inexperienced mistress would like to see in them. I took it all in as she stood before me; the queenly head, the fine falling shoulders, the well-formed hands folded as if in mock-humility as she stood before me: all this I saw, and I turned an imploring look toward my husband who was standing behind me. His eyes were fixed on Therese, who looked to him as I did. The look was stern, and she saw she had a master even though she did not entertain a high opinion of me as a mistress. But her eyelids did not fall even before him, only the expression in them gave place to one of defiance.

I summoned what courage and dignity I could, asked her a few questions, and gave my order for dinner for the day. Then I said, as carelessly as I could,

"Why do you not stay in Mr. Scranton's kitchen, Therese? He tells Mr. Hamilton that you are a much better cook than old Aunt Cely."

"That is little to say, Madame," she replied, in the rich tones which were as remarkable as her looks. "Mrs. Scranton sent for the Marshal one day when Mr. Scranton was away, and had me whipped."

I fairly shivered as I pictured in my mind the lash descending on the being before me. "Why did your mistress do this?"

"I struck her; I threatened to poison her."

"Therese!"

"Madame, she said my children were whiter than I; that their father had been a white man."

"Where is their father?"

"My husband was sold when my master's estate was divided. Do they sell white men?" bitterly, and with her shut teeth.

"You have not always lived in this country, Therese?"

"No, Madame. I was brought here from the West Indies; but I have not lived there always either."

I had no time for further questioning then, so I dismissed her and went out to the yard into which the laundry opened, and where, under a great spreading mimosa-tree, I found Therese's children. The little one, Ettie, was asleep, pillowed on the lap of the boy Philippe, a lad of ten, perhaps. The little girl was plump, and had a rosy tinge on her soft olive cheek; Philippe was wonderfully handsome, with large, sad eyes and a grace evident in his position.

I took the little girl up, saying that the day was too cool for her to be asleep out of doors, and carried her myself to the comfortable cottage separated from the house, as were all the servants' rooms, where I had decided to place the mother and children. I had given Therese two rooms, intending one to be used as a play-room for the children in bad weather. A little bed had been made up for the boy, which delighted him. On this I placed Ettie without waking her, and Philippe took his attentive station beside her.

This done, I returned to the house and entered the library where my husband was writing. I stood by the table till he looked up, a little impatiently.

"I am busy just now, dear."

"But I can not wait to know who this singular creature is, with her lovely and refined children. The mother uses as good language as I do, and I am actually awed by her queenly manner. It is a very uncomfortable impression to receive from one's cook, Reginald. Did you know why Mr. Scranton would not keep her in his kitchen?"

"I heard something of the story this morning, but it did not deter me from hiring her. Mrs. Scranton is a woman of violent temper. Therese has not been well treated. She had more ladyhood than her mistress, who doubtless was coarse and abusive, and roused all the evil passions of a woman of high, strong feeling. I knew you would treat her far otherwise; that she would have a different nature called out here; that you could soften her and make her a good woman, as she certainly is a remarkable woman. But I was stern with her, for I do not know but she might presume, and she must feel that it will never be allowed here, however gentle you are. And now go, dear wife! I am very busy. By-and-by you can win her story from her own lips. I have heard it only in part."

I departed not half satisfied. Reginald was going away from home soon, to be gone some weeks, and then, and indeed at any time, I must be supreme in my house and over my family. I was a young and inexperienced woman. I hardly knew whether I was courageous or not. I certainly did not like the looks of my new cook any better than I should have fancied a lioness for a household pet. Yet something attracted me to her; the magnetism which one strong womanly nature has over another, no matter how they are related.

The dinner was superb; no less significant word would describe it. The same materials that poor Crecy would have jumbled up and made barely eatable furnished us with the most elegant dishes, and the dessert would have done credit to a confectioner. When Louis had withdrawn, I said:

"Well, Reginald;" and he replied,

"Well, Cornelia."

"I want to know if we are at home or at the St. Charles?"

"We are under Therese's administration. Are you satisfied?"

"It would be hard to be otherwise. But I dread to call her to the store-room."

"Let Crecy give out breakfast and supper."

"What, put Crecy over this woman! She would annihilate the humble creature with a look."

So I summoned Therese to the store-room myself—directed her to the meal and hominy bins, to the spice-boxes, tea-chest, coffee-bag, and unlocked the great closet where the pickles, mangoes, and jellies were stored. Then I told her at what hour I would come to the store-room with her in the evening for supper and breakfast, and in the morning for dinner.

"When I can not come myself I will send Crecy," I said, as carelessly as I could.

A smile of bitter meaning curved her lip.

"You heard that I was a thief, also, Madame?"

"It has been my custom to trust the keys to no one but Crecy," I said, coldly—"she is of proven honesty."

"And I am—whatever you please to think me," she said, in an under-tone. "Is this the barrel of brown sugar?"

"No. That is sweet crackers, and the next is rice; the sugars are on the other side;" and so we came out of the store-room after she had filled her measures.

In the morning Crecy said to me:

"Miss Nelia, did you gib Therese sweet crackers for the children yesterday?"

"No, I did not."

"There was a dozen or so at the bottom of the meal measure. She said the mistress gib 'em for the children."

I watched her the day following, but could not discover that she took any thing—not ordered. The same report reached me about the crackers.

"Reginald," I said, "this 'grand creature,' as you call her—well, she is superb—but she steals, before my eyes even. I really believe she does it because she saw I would not trust her."

"You are doubtless right. She steals to revenge herself on you for your suspicions of her. I believe if she were trusted she would prove trust-worthy. Have you asked her more about herself yet?"

"Yes, I asked many questions. I find she was born in a French West Indian island, that she went to France with her young mistress, where the young lady went to complete her education. Afterward they went to England, where the young lady married. Finally the family returned to the island, but in embarrassed circumstances, and Therese passed into the possession of the uncle of the young lady whom she had served as maid. In this household she acquired her wonderful skill in the cuisine from an old French cook still in possession of his office, though too feeble for the full performance of its duties. There, too, she married the confidential servant of the master, a quadroon, who had traveled a great deal in Europe, and who acted now as the planter's man of business. Therese's children were born here, with two others who died. The family ruin came to this household also, and broke the old man's heart. After his death the estate was divided, the negroes sold; a trader purchased Therese and her children, and brought them to this country, where she in time became the property of Mr. Scranton. The husband was carried off to some other island, St. Thomas, I believe. And this is the story which you and I can fill up as we study her peculiarities."

"This accounts for her accomplishments. I have heard that she can read and write; that she can embroider, and do all kinds of fine sewing, and that she has even something of musical talent and cultivation. She is as good a lady's maid, as good a child's nurse—"

"Oh, she could never be intended by nature for that!" I said, hastily, and my heart sank within me, remembering the dainty care I had given personally, and always, to the little child whom I had laid in the grave after a few months of beautiful life.

Weeks went by. There was not a jar in my household arrangements; guests came and went with little more care on my part than if I were entertaining them at a hotel. Then my husband, fully satisfied with the ménage, went off on his contemplated journey: his sister, too, was absent on a visit, and I was quite alone. My dressing-room window opened into a garden, separated only by a kind of hedge made of peach-trees, cut off low, and kept broad and flat, for drying and bleaching clothes from the large laundry yard of which I have spoken. Into this the pastry-room opened, with a door on the opposite side opening toward the cool spring house. I walked out near to this hedge, apparently examining some fine hyacinths, but in reality more interested in watching through openings in the thicket the play of Philippe and Ettie. The boy was as graceful, and as well-bred even, in the abandon of his sport as a gentleman's son. Well might the mother of such children cling to them with the idolatry which poor Therese showed.

Suddenly loud tones arrested my attention, and, looking up, I saw Harry, who was an old, perverse, and opinionated man, standing by the pastry table, one hand on the slab, and one used menacingly near the face of Therese. As I looked she stepped back with her arm raised, a gesture equal to that with which Grisi reproaches and threatens her false Roman lord in "Norma."

The old man made a dextrous retreat into the yard. A torrent of invective in French and English followed him, and then I saw Therese turn toward a door that led through a corridor into the house. Before she could reach my room

I was in it and had locked the door. I had no fancy for the scene which might follow, or for facing such a woman in her rage, though I felt obliged to hear what she had to say.

She came through the hall stepping heavily, as if with the might of her passion, and knocked at my door.

"Well, what is wanted?"

"I would like to speak to you, Madame."

"Say now what you have to say, Therese. I don't wish to open my door."

"I must speak to you of Harry, Madame. The miserable old man has offered insult to me. I can not take his contumely. In his ignorance he calls me a witch, talks of my "evil-eye," and accuses me of trying to poison him. He swears he will eat nothing more in the kitchen, and calls me thief, murderer, worse—"

"What is worse, pray?"

"I can not tell you, Madame."

"What did he say, Therese?"

"It was the same lie that Mrs. Scranton flung at me. Oh, for God's sake, Madame, let me into your room!"

Her voice had lost its fierce tone, and sounded as if tears were falling. The softened mood touched me. I opened the door and retreated to my couch again. She stood before me so changed that she was not the same woman whom I had seen with uplifted hand and stormy brow. Tears were streaming down her face, her bosom heaved tumultuously, and her hands worked nervously as she strove to clasp them before her.

"Therese, you are in greater trouble than Harry can bring you," I said, kindly.

At first she could not speak. Then with a great effort at self-control, she said:

"Madame, Mr. Scranton was here this morning. He told me that he was going to sell me away from the children. He will keep them himself. His wife wants to bring them up in the house. Philippe will be a waiter, and Ettie a maid for her daughter. A man was with him, a trader, who wanted to take me west at Christmas."

The voice was low but intense with the tone of subdued passion; before she ceased speaking it sunk to a monotone of helpless misery. A shock went through me as I listened. There were some "peculiarities of the institution" to which I could never become accustomed. In the community in which I was living there was very little buying or selling. Most of the families had inherited their negroes, and never sold unless under great pecuniary pressure. A "negro broker" was regarded with contempt, with utter abhorrence, and treated as a social pariah. Mr. Scranton was a new man. He had made his money, and consequently had to buy his negroes as he did other possessions. His wife, unused to her position, was haughty or condescending as the case might be, her want of breeding evident in either demonstration, while her loud tones and harsh words showed what those who lived with her might be called upon to endure. Her husband, a kind-hearted man, possessed some qualities which gave him a respectable position in society and commanded some tolerance for his wife, though social circles opened very charily to them, notwithstanding his great wealth and public spirit. I could easily understand why Therese felt the added sting of leaving the children to the tender mercies of this inferior and insolent woman. I had no drop of comfort to give to the poor mother, except to say:

"Poor Therese! If this must be done I will try to have some oversight of the children. How much better it would be for them if you could control yourself more!"

"That is true; they will owe it to me," she said, humbly.

"And now let them owe to you one year of happy life," I added. "Harry is always kind to them. I have often seen him stop his work to fix a toy for them; to help Philippe in his play, or lift Ettie over a rough place. Would it not be better not to mind the old man's folly and idle words, but for their sakes return good for evil?"

"It is very hard, Madame, to keep my temper. He said this morning, when he had driven me beside myself with his lies, that he 'could make a peaceable bargain with Satan himself than with me,' and I told him I would give him a chance to do so any time he wished to change company."

I smiled inwardly and said, "Now go, Therese. I will see Mr. Scranton myself, and use any influence I may have for you. And, Therese," as she was going out of the door, "if you would like it, you may take the store-room keys and get the children some sweet crackers, and at the same time get some gelatine. I do not think I gave you enough yesterday."

She turned and looked up into my face as I handed her the chatelaine. "Madame, you are too good. I have not merited this kindness. I thought, perhaps, you were like Mrs. Scranton, and when I saw that you preferred not to trust me with the keys I took from you what my children wanted. I have often taken crackers and a cup of jelly when Ettie was sick."

"No matter, Therese; I do not think you will do so again without my permission. You will find me too good a friend to want to deceive me."

She tried to speak, but the words would not come; there was a convulsive movement of the throat, and after standing a moment in silence she turned and slowly walked back to her domain, disarmed and overcome.

I threw my arm up over my head, and meditated how I could best compass my wishes and my strong purpose in behalf of the children. I knew this was Mrs. Scranton's revenge, for which she would say she had ample justification in the violence of the mother. I knew kind-hearted Mr. Scranton, who sacrificed a great deal for a quiet life, was very apt to do as his wife desired, or, rather, to let her rule. But I had a long time before Christmas in which to work, and I determined to pay a court I never otherwise should have dreamed of to the purse-proud Mrs. Scranton. I fell asleep with my plans playing through my mind, mingling with visions of the lost husband and father, whom, however, I could not include in any possible future that I could picture for Therese.

The post that day brought me a letter from my husband, who was in Savannah. He gave me an account of his social life there, consisting of such little "asides" as a lawyer could find time for, told me of old friends, and spoke enthusiastically of a Creole family he had met at the Telfairs', where he had dined the previous evening. "They are originally from St. Thomas, where they still own large sugar plantations; but they have resided in Europe for some years, and are personally acquainted with every artist or musical composer of note in Southern Europe. Under great bonhomie Señor Rosas carries a warm heart and much artistic culture and appreciation. His wife is a delicious exécutante on the piano and harp. There is a member of the family whom they treat as friend and equal, though his position has been that of a courier, I think, while they were traveling. Every thing is referred—I might almost say deferred—to Leon. He is in New Orleans now, so I have not seen him, but they are talking of coming to the 'up-country' for the summer, which they will spend at Madison Springs and traveling in the upper part of the State with the Bryan County Maxwells, who are relatives on Mrs. Maxwell's side; and Leon will be with them then, I hope. You know Mrs. Maxwell was a Gindrat. I have promised that we will join them at the Springs, and explore the beautiful region above with them, if they will stop in O—— and pay us a visit on their return. And the Odeons are coming in September, and the Laws will be here at Commencement; the old house will be gay. How delightful! and how thankful I am for Therese—" And I went down stairs to see if the luncheon I had ordered for the friends who were to pass the day with me "socially" was all I could desire.

Only a painter could have done justice to it. If Therese had brought in the bloom of the peach orchard, and trailed the golden jasmine which covered our roof with its glory, and hung in festoons of beauty from the balustrade over the portico, about the walls, and shed over all the emerald light which made our carriage drive dim at noonday, she could not have surprised me more than the magic of her taste and skill did now. It was a dainty little feast, with flowers and vines in profusion about the room. Crecy stood by in dumb amazement and delight watching Therese, who was bringing to order a wayward myrtle branch which depended from a tall vase in the centre of the table. Her face flushed as she saw my look of surprise and pleasure, and in reply to my exclamation, "Oh, how lovely! how perfect!" she only said, quietly, "It was very little to do for you, Madame."

To my friends I confided my interest in Therese, and wished, oh, how vainly! that I could retain always in my service the skill and taste of this admirable cook. But I knew my English husband's principles too well to think of persuading him to purchase her, so I only listened to her praises with a sigh for the change my dining-room would suffer with any other person controlling its interests.

As for teaching Louis or Crecy, I know she would willingly undertake it if I requested it. But her art is not transferable; her taste amounts to an inspiration. No teaching could have produced the artistic effect you see in this room. Well, I must make the best I can of her, and—do my best for her.

I saw Mr. Scranton as soon as possible. Avoiding all reference to his wife and Therese's troubles with her, I inquired if it would not be possible to keep mother and children together. I felt at liberty to do this, because his intention to sell was becoming known, and some in town, who were aware of the woman's skill, were considering whether they could not secure such invaluable services. He began at once to tell me of the woman's conduct toward Mrs. Scranton, and how only that morning on which he last saw her she had uttered under-breath fresh threats against his wife.

"She was not a responsible person, her whole nature tortured by the prospect of separation from her children."

"I don't want her to stay in this part of the country," said Mr. Scranton, "and I can not persuade my wife to give up the children. She says such a fierce-tempered creature will be their ruin, and for their sakes, if not for other reasons, they ought to be parted. They are very promising children."

As delicately as I could, taking all care to avoid reflecting on Mrs. Scranton, I gave him my opinion of Therese.

"I have proved her honesty, tested her honor, and I am sure that when she considers herself treated with the respect she thinks she deserves as a capable, not to say gifted, human being; when she feels trusted and cared-for she is not only tame and submissive but devoted and exerts herself to the utmost to give satisfaction. When roused, especially through her children, she is a lioness for wrath, and yet through her children she might be almost regenerated. Pray make no definite arrangement yet for her sale. I feel sure something will occur in her behalf."

"I am afraid you do not know Therese yet;" and so we parted. As I approached the house I shortened the walk by going into the lane which led to the kitchen. It was bordered by hedges of the luxuriant Cherokee rose and overhung by tall Pride of Indias, now in full foliage. The lane ended in an open space near the house, where the hedge, "rounding greenly," made room for the well-house which stood on a green bank where the sward was always rich and soft and very pleasant to Northern eyes.

On this bank was now seated the woman Therese with Ettie in her lap, while Philippe was running and jumping at them to amuse the little girl, who was shouting with laughter. The gay head-handkerchief, always worn while engaged in the kitchen, was laid aside, and the imperial head was only graced by a shining coil of rich wavy hair. The contour and posé would have made a study for an artist. I stood a moment unseen, watching them. There was the refinement in the mother's manner of sporting with her children which we consider the result of birth or breeding. I marked the well-formed, taper hands, the elegant curve of her arms, and noted her rich, musical voice as she caressed her children with pretty French phrases uttered half unconsciously. I could not believe that all that fascinated me in this scene was subject to the possibilities of slavery, and might be dispelled by its tyranny. I stood still and prayed, God knows how fervently, that He would interpose and save the mother and the children from the terrible fate which seemed to await them.

As I passed the group Therese arose with a respectful salutation and the inquiry, "Shall I send in tea, Madame?"

"Yes; I will take it in my dressing-room, however, for I am too tired to go to the dining-room. This will be my last evening alone, Therese. To-morrow my husband will be with me."

The color forsook her face, and the light went out of her eyes, as the words too surely reminded her of one who would not come back to her. The very currents of her being seemed checked for a moment; then she said, simply,

"I am glad for Madame that her husband will be with her again;" and she followed me to the house, leading a child by each hand.

Delicious spring flew by. In the wealth of its flowers and under the blue of its skies Eden seemed renewed on earth, and I looked about vaguely, fearing that some tempting fruit might beguile me into evil. But the tempter was not so visible, though, doubtless, he was busy enough weaving his spells even there. The happy are seldom on guard, and I almost forgot that I was mortal under the witcheries of the beauty around me. June growing fervid recalled me to my summer plans, and by July we started for the Springs, Old Madison, then in all the glory of its popularity. Here we were to meet the "low-country" families who had engaged us to spend the hot months in the upper part of the State with them.

We drove up to the piazza of the great hotel just before sundown. The Laws and the Rosas, the Creoles of whom my husband had written me, were already there, and the first person we saw was M. Rosas, advancing to greet us. He was a stoutly-built, merry-eyed man, whose very countenance would put one in good humor with the world at once, it was so free from cark and line of care.

"We reached here only yesterday; but Leon, who will insist on being courier still if he stays with us, preceded us some time, and after engaging the best quarters for us, he has devoted his time to his quest. We have rooms reserved for you also in our cottage. There we are behind that cypress-vine pyramid, the prettiest cottage between the hotel and the spring—two rooms communicating across the hall from yours most devotedly”—M. Rosas ran on as he led us to our quarters.

“Excellent Rosas!” said Reginald, “so you were fortunate enough to prevail on Leon to accompany you!”

“Oh, yes! I dread to think of parting with him. He is our friend, Hamilton—our brother. He is not a mercenary fellow, but you know he has large uses for his money. He intends opening a broker’s office in New Orleans in the winter, but for the summer he devotes himself once more to us. I don’t know but I shall apply for the post of office-boy next winter rather than be parted from him. Here is Madame. Our friends the Hamiltons, Angelique”—and I really felt almost as much at home with these strangers as Reginald seemed to be. There was more than French warmth under all this French vivacity. I felt the heart in the hand.

A tall and very elegant man approached us as we left our rooms after the refreshment of a bath. Standing by M. Rosas was small advantage to that gentleman. The stranger was clad in the white linen which is the luxury of the climate and the season, and removed his broad-brimmed hat, which worn by him was only properly named a sombrero, and held out his hand in response to my husband’s gesture of greeting.

“This is Leon, my best of courriers, and my good friend,” said M. Rosas, gayly.

There was a shade of color in his face, but no suspicion could attach to it of its being negro blood. The countenance was noble; the whole expression of the man intellectual and refined. The grasp of hand which Reginald gave him told me that he knew his worth, and made me eager to know more of him.

Our time at the Springs went by most charmingly. We drove and sauntered when it was cool enough, drank the waters, chatted, rolled ten-pins, and played billiards. All this idleness was infused with spirit or sentiment as best suited the temper of the individual. I watched some flirtations going on briskly, and made acquaintance with pretty children. Leon seemed strangely busy, and devoted himself to each new-comer, or to his suite, as the case might be, with a pertinacity which puzzled me. In the evening we danced in the great ball-room or promenaded the galleries. The Rosas, Odeons, Laws, and Maxwells, with a dozen families less intimate, made a delightful coterie.

Sitting in the gallery one evening it occurred to me to ask of my companion, the genial Rosas, the history of Leon. “A slave who has bought his freedom, and who is now seeking his wife and children to buy them. But Madame,” said he, with emotion, “Leon is our friend! You who see the distinctions of caste to which I was born in thrall can understand how much must underlie such an expression. He has proved a devotion, which only friendship can repay, in a thousand ways. He is as worthy as any man living of the position. He saved the lives of our whole party in an emergency when we were in Europe, and at a cost which might have been his own life, but a good God interposed for him. The time will come when we shall forget that Leon was a slave. Ah, if the poor fellow could only find his family!”

“Has he no idea where they are? What separated them?”

“Ruin came to the estate—all were sold, the children with their mother; and they to a trader, while it was my good fortune to buy Leon. I said he bought his freedom—he did so when at the peril of his life he saved ours. It was a small recompense.”

“What was his wife’s position?”

“She is probably a cook. Leon thinks she is; though she was brought up as lady’s maid and went to Europe with her young mistress, who was sent to France to be educated. She was beautiful, Leon tells me, and a great favorite with her young lady, who made her share her lessons with her even to learning music and embroidery. It is to facilitate Leon’s search for her that he has consented to come to the Springs with us. It is this that makes him attach himself to all new-comers, hoping to hear of his family, to get some clew.”

I could hardly steady my voice as I asked—“Had they children? yes, you say his family. How many were there?”

“Two, I believe. One born just as they were torn apart; he does not know if it is living.”

“M. Rosas, I know Leon’s wife. She is my cook. His children are at our home.”

“Good God!”

“Hush; don’t let me be overheard: but I am persuaded this is so.”

“Why not tell him?”

“There is the least chance of a mistake. He shall ‘prove property,’ as people say when things are found. I would not for the world raise false hopes in the poor fellow.”

We were just leaving the Springs, and a short journey of two days’ travel brought us to Clarks-ville, the threshold of the picturesque “up-country of Georgia.” Toccoa, Tallulah, Nancocchie, and other places of noted interest, were only short drives from the town where we established ourselves. One fresh morning, soon after our arrival, we drove over to Nancocchie, the beautiful valley through which run the head waters of the Chattanooga, there a clear little stream whose waters we could ford at any point. This morning our object was the ascent of Yarrah, the tallest mountain in Georgia and one of the last spurs of the Blue Ridge. The carriages were left below, and for some distance the ascent was made on horseback by the ladies, by the gentlemen on foot. Then as the difficulties of the ascent increased the horses were tied and all proceeded to walk.

The top was gained, and we overlooked a country that was the veritable promised land for luxuriant beauty. Some of the party made excursions for the best resting-places. One of them found his own name on the rough trunk of a neighboring tree, where it had been cut with those of all his college class twenty years before, the letters so huge and rugged that they were almost unreadable. In its shade we disposed ourselves, and combining bodily with spiritual refreshment we satisfied our intense thirst with the fresh and delicious penches which had been brought for that purpose.

Time went by too speedily. We did not know that we were losing all the morning hours till noon announced itself by the shortened shadows. We at once began the descent, but it was made intolerable by the heat. As a turn in the path brought us, when about half-way down, to a huge rock forming the precipitous side of much of the peak in whose deep, cool shadow stretched out another rocky platform as solid as that towering above us, we halted it with such acclamation as our parched lips could utter. We remembered how in other days the weary had given thanks "for the shadow of a great rock," and we sat down to await the coolness of evening. The sides of the rock above us dripped with moisture, and we leaned our heated faces against it and pulled the damp mosses from their beds.

There was a great fissure in the rock upon which we sat, not more than a foot wide at the top, but thirty or more feet in depth. The sides of this fissure were covered plentifully with mosses, and far below us, out of all possible reach, we heard the sipping and purring of a stream of water. We leaned over the fissure, and realized the fable of Tunnalus as we inhaled the fresh coolness which the water sent up. I raised my face, burning and fevered, and found Leon standing beside me with a peach peeled and presented on the point of a fruit knife; in the other hand he held a little basket of sandwiches. I was most grateful for both, and the more so that I knew he had made his way down the mountain while we reclined there so indolently to the carriages, and brought up a supply of refreshments left behind us on the supposition that our mid-day lunch would be taken in the valley.

"Why, Leon," I exclaimed on trying the sandwiches, "these are made just as we have them at home! Did you make them yourself?"

"Yes, Madame. I delayed at the hotel this morning for their preparation, knowing how much more acceptable they would be than the cakes and insipidities the landlady was ordering for the party."

"Salad sandwiches, by all means! They are delightful. I never saw them made except by my cook, Therese."

I felt rather than saw that the man started.

"If Madame pleases," he began, after a moment's pause. I looked up. Every vestige of color had forsaken his face, and his voice was hollow as if articulation was painful. "Did I hear rightly? Your cook Therese, Madame?"

"That's her name, Leon. She is a beautiful woman. Her face not darker than that of Madame Kossar, her soul as white as mine."

"And she has two children, Philippe, and a little girl, Etie, perhaps?"

"The same, Leon," I said, trembling myself in the excess of my sympathy. "You know Therese?"

"It is my wife and children of whom you speak, Madame. God is good!" he said, removing his hat and reverently looking up. "I have sought them those six years, since Etie was born, from whom I was parted before her mother was able to hold the baby in her arms. She wished to name her for her dear young mistress, Mademoiselle Henriette."

"Yes, Leon, it is your wife and children whom I left in my quiet, happy home. They are well. They love you. Therese lives only for them and in the hope of yet meeting you."

"I know that, Madame. I know my glorious wife!" and the poor fellow put his face down on his hands, and I honored him the more as I saw the tears steal through those shapely fingers.

The little party had kept aloof from us during this conversation. Many of them knew what I knew, and the emotion of Leon betrayed the revelation that had been made to him. A hush had fallen on all as they sat on the great rock in the cool shadow. One of the party, my good English husband, who was nearest me, and who had heard and seen what I had, was busy with his knife cutting something into the rock. The old English letter kept him very busy and very much absorbed; it was easier looking down than up when one's heart is so near the surface. As we rose to go down the mountain later in the day, I read the inscription:

Death to Slavery and Casts.

Early in September our faces were turned southward. It was arranged by the gentlemen of the party that Leon should not only delay till we all departed, but that he should not arrive in our town till a few days after our arrival, and should first call on Mr Seranton and inquire about the woman he had for sale. That I should prepare Therese for the meeting, lest a suspicion of their relationship might confirm the opposition of the woman, determined to be revenged on her slave—and so defeat their purpose of purchasing Therese and children, no matter at what price their owner held them.

Never was Southern home livelier by Nature's bounty or in better keeping than was ours when we reached it. The hall door was opened for us by Therese herself, to poor Crecy's discontent and Leon's dismay; but the woman's superiority had given her her own way with the servants, and no ideas of precedence or condition were allowed by her to come between her beloved mistress, the poor creature's "only friend," and herself.

Did I say "the poor creature?" Surely I did not mean to apply the words to the queenly woman, radiant with pleasure, who stands beside the door as we enter. With affectionate and grateful respect she carried my hand to her lips, and then stood with downcast eyes while my guests passed in. She did not meet the curious glances that no good-breeding could restrain, which were cast on her as the party entered, or hear the murmured words of admiration when the drawing-room door closed on the group of servants assembled to welcome their master and mistress.

I accompanied my friends to their rooms to see if honor was done them in the arrangements for their reception. The neatness and taste were beyond praise. Therese had been ubiquitous. Orange leaves floated in the finger-glasses on the toilet-tables; roses lay on the pillows; bouquets were on every bracket and mantle; and even the curtains were looped back with flowers, their folds artistically arranged. The cool matting, the snowy beds, the floating muslin, the fragrant and lovely flowers, the tempting balconies, and the easy-chairs beside the open doors leading to them—the tempered light and air, the cool drops beading the goblets and pitchers—what more could guest or even hostess ask?

After a little time spent in arranging their dress, removing the soil of travel and cooling heated faces, we met in the shady dining-room where most evidently only Therese could have presided. What a spell of beauty that one woman's taste diffused over my house! How could I endure housekeeping without her! Louis and Crecy were both in attendance.

"The half has not been told us," said lively and irrepressible Tallulah Odeon. "But where are the children?"

To the astonished faces of the servants no less than to the question of my vivacious guest I replied:

"The only children on the place, Tallu, belong to my cook. I am sorry not to be better provided for such baby-lovers as you are."

The cue was taken, and we were silent on the engrossing subject till the servants had retired, then leaving the gentlemen to their sherry and their cigars, I took my friends to the window of my dressing-room and called "Philippe!" In a moment the hedge parted, and the boy bounded into the garden all aglow with pleasure.

"Where is Ettie?"

"Here she is, Missis," and the little creature—she was small for her six years of age—crept through the opening. Never had they looked lovelier. Ettie was always the picture of mother, and Philippe had grown ruddy and more robust. I asked them some trifling questions, gave them each a little money, and told them that when my trunks were opened they should have some toys.

"If you please, Miss Nelia," said the boy.

"Oh yes, I understand, Philippe. Well, something for you much better than a toy." I knew the boy had been learning to read, and understood his pleading look.

That evening I summoned Therese for an account of her stewardship; for to her, in place of Crecy, with her duller sense, I had confided my house, the keys of the store-room, the silver closet, and every responsibility to an extent that would have convinced poor Mrs. Scranton of my insanity. Therese came in with the same soft, brilliant expression on her face that had greeted my return. She stood, as usual, with folded hands to hear me speak.

"It has all been very satisfactory, my good Therese. I can not prize you enough for all you have done—for your watch, care, and your preparation for our return."

"I have done more, Madame, I have done more—for I have made friends with Harry," she said, smiling.

I replied to her smile as much as her words: "And you are much happier for this ruling of your own spirit?"

"Oh yes. Poor old man—ignorant and superstitious. My anger was bringing me to his level, I fear. He is always good to the children, and would serve me in any way now. Madame, every thing was conspiring to my degradation when you saved me by your kindness."

"Poor Therese! But I have such a large reward for you. I have news from Leon!"

"My husband, Madame! Great God! I have not trusted Thee for this!" was the devout confession of the excited and trembling woman. Then for a moment neither of us spoke. Tears were readier than words. I was glad to see them gather in those large eyes, softening their expression into a tender yearning.

"Sit down, Therese. Was it not good news? And he is near you. He has money enough to pay all that Mr. Scranton will dare to ask for you or for the children. God has so prospered him and given him such good friends that you have every thing to hope."

Not even the falling tears relieved the throng of emotions which these words called up. I saw the growing pallor of her lovely face, and the fall of the listless hand, and flew to her with restoratives. She did not quite lose consciousness, but she could not repress the fear which overcame her, or summon courage to speak it—however, it struggled up. At last she said:

"Mrs. Scranton will never give up those children. I knew this would be her revenge. Oh, my God, pity me! I have brought this on myself. How can I meet Leon with this on my soul?"

In every way I soothed her and bade her hope. There were so many interested; Leon's friends were powerful; no money would be spared—and so I comforted the poor mother. I told her, moreover, the plan for Leon to come to Mr. Scranton as a gentleman wishing to purchase her and her children—for the Rosas and others to assist if there were any obstacles to be overcome; especially if Mrs. Scranton's determination was persisted in. I told her of the service it had been in Leon's power to render to M. Rosas, and how gladly he would in some way repay the man he called his friend; and so, at last, with a renewed charge that she should not betray the relationship by any recognition of her husband, I sent her away.

In less than a week "M. St. Leon," as his eard announced him, presented himself to Mr. Scranton to purchase the famous cook Therese. He came with all the showy appurtenances of a man of the world and of fashion; his horses, his valet, his letters of credit and of introduction, were very imposing. My husband and his friends were all delighted, as they told me, of the ruse, and of its effect upon Mr. Scranton. But it had one result less desirable. It increased the value of Therese in the eyes of her owner, who determined that his new customer should pay a round sum for the valuable servant.

"I hear she has two children," said the purchaser.

"Yes, but they are not to be sold."

"I can not purchase the mother then—not that I care for the children so much, but the mother will pine for them. If she is what you tell me she will be of much diminished value without them. I will pay as large a price as your conscience will allow you to ask, Sir, for the mother, if the children may be sold with her."

"My wife—"

"Ah, there is the difficulty! Could I see Madame myself?"

"It will be of no use; though it will give me great pleasure to have you dine with us to-day."

"Thank you. Nothing could be more agreeable," said St. Leon, with a courtly courtesy; and with this courtesy he plied Mrs. Scranton.

"The dinner was perfect." "Therese must have left her mantle in departing; or, perhaps it had been Mrs. Scranton's own skill that had perfected the cook whose reputation was so extensive. He was just going to housekeeping himself. He had been married several years, but had not yet set up a private establishment, having spent some years since his marriage in Europe. He was desirous that his wife should begin with every advantage, but he could not allow himself to contemplate purchasing this woman without her children. She might even make way with herself or with one of us"—bowing blandly to Mrs. Scranton at the allusion to Therese's threats regarding herself. "He could appreciate Mrs. Scranton's desire to part with her, and yet he had a kind of blind confidence in undertaking the ownership of her. He did not fear any trouble provided the children came with her."

And then he offered such a sum of money for the family that even Mrs. Scranton, with her habitual greed, was tempted to let go her hold on the children—and on her revenge. Not quite decided was the hard Mrs. Scranton, and the matter was left under consideration till M. St. Leon had seen Therese.

Mr. Scranton came up to the house with him that evening, and after the gentlemen had partaken of a superb supper, which Therese had prepared, she answered in person the summons to the dining-room. I did not see the meeting. I knew I could not trust myself, and I was fearful that by my irrepressible feminine sympathy I might unnerve the poor woman put to so severe a test. At last Reginald came to find me.

"Would I be willing to see M. St. Leon, and to say to Mr. Scranton myself what I thought of canceling our engagement for the year, and letting Therese go at once?"

There was just enough selfishness stirred to keep me steady. Not that I would hesitate for a moment—oh, not for the world! but I began to consider our dining-room handed over to the crudities and the commonplaces that had characterized our ménage before the administration of Therese. I went in dutifully, was presented to M. St. Leon with ceremony, and greeted Mr. Scranton. I did not dare to look at Therese, who was standing a little in the shadow. Every thing seemed to swim before me, and I scarcely noted what was said to me until the silence struck my ear, and I began to comprehend that I was expected to reply to some question or remark. Then a glance at the husband and wife, confronting each other in such strange circumstances, restored my poor faculties to my control, and I said, what I supposed was expected of me, "that however much I might regret losing a cook whom I considered unequaled in her department, I would yield to my husband's decision"—a piece of wifeliness that I hoped Mrs. Scranton would hear of, if need be, and be the better for.

At last the whole scene grew clear before my dazed eyes. Most of the gentlemen were still sitting around the table, leaning on it as if they had been engaged in some interesting discussion. Mr. Scranton had risen and was standing, unsupported and ungainly, opposite Therese. Near him was M. St. Leon, leaning against the mantle. His attitude indicated the utmost ease and self-possession. One hand toyed negligently with a spray of roses falling from a vase, and as the leaves scattered from one of the clusters he carefully brushed them back from the edge of the marble that they might not fall upon the carpet. He was pale, but never handsomer nor his tone steadier, as he discussed with her owner the merits of his wife.

Therese was in her usual attitude, her hands folded and her eyes downcast, but once or twice I saw her lift them luminous with her love and flash their brilliancy on Leon as Mr. Scranton turned from her to him. How the man bore it I can not tell, but not even an eyelash quivered, and his voice did not lose half a tone.

"She has been well since she has been with you, Mrs. Hamilton?" said the master.

"Invariably."

"Do you think her health would be as good separated from the children?" St. Leon asked.

"She would die," I answered. "She lives only for them."

I felt a beam of gratitude from the beautiful eyes of Therese resting upon me. The talk went on like this for a while and she was dismissed.

I followed her out and called her to my room; it was well I did so. She lay fainting on my couch for an hour, and then I heard Mr. Scranton bowed out at the hall-door and I hastened to the dining-room. With his departure went all of Leon's coolness. Flashing eyes, and glowing face, and eager voice were asking for his wife as I entered to conduct him to her. The door of my room stood open, and I indicated that he was to enter; then I went into the dressing-room, where the two children were lying asleep. I roused Philippe and told him to take his sister to their mother, opened the door for them, closed it hastily, and made my escape with the tears which would come hysterically after the long repression.

How the gentlemen talked in the dining-room, and how the ladies talked in the drawing-room, and how the reunited family talked up stairs I can not tell. I know no more about the one than the other. I only remembered that all seemed sure, and that the obstacle of Mrs. Scranton's will was so puny before her large inducements to yield it that it did not once disturb our hopes.

And so it proved. I would not dare to tell the sum that Leon paid for those whom God had given to him so long before, nor could I tell you of the pretty wardrobe that was privately made up for Therese and her children, and how elegant she looked when we tried her in her new attire, nor of the good wishes and the blessings showered upon them as they went away as happy people as ever the sun shone upon, despite the incongruous relation which they had to preserve before those who knew Therese only as a slave and Leon as her master. We heard from them when they had reached Baltimore. Leon wrote that he had not yet decided where to make a home. Of course he had not much money left after the large transaction I have described. But he had no fears for the future. To Him who had been so faithful to him in the past he trusted for time to come.

Years went by, adding another and yet another to the little graves where we had buried our first-born. A fourth child sickened in its second summer, and our physician told us plainly that a change of climate might save him—nothing else could. We came to a Northern city, where we had relatives, and where a skillful physician awaited our sick baby.

For a week or two we thought of little but our charge; but at length the child revived, and we became interested in the world around us. The first of May was at hand, and with it those changes that make it the dread of Northern housekeepers.

"The brown stone house next to us has been bought by some one who is going to fix it up a great deal," said my young cousin one morning.

"Who has bought it, Charlie?" said his sister.

"I don't know. Foreigners, I believe. Workmen are there making alterations in the drawing-room. The doors are to be arched, and a niche widened to make room for a grand piano.

The dining-room is to be paneled and frescoed, and I don't know what all."

"You are very good to inventory your neighbors' business," said his mother, a woman who most emphatically attended only to her own affairs.

"Well, there are two children in the family—one a boy a little larger than I am, and one your age, Nellie—a girl, too. Now who is interested, I wonder?"

The sound of hammers ceased at length, and furniture was brought in. Then came the quiet which characterizes a well-bred family, and we forgot that we had neighbors, except that as the warm weather came on we heard through the open windows the sound of music and pretty French songs; and Sunday evenings grand masses were played and fine church music.

"Bridget, where is the baby?" I said one afternoon to my nurse, who sat sewing on the stairs. The child had been playing in the hall, but it was vacant now, and the vestibule door was open.

"I don't know, ma'am," said the girl, starting up from her engrossing work with a suddenly returning consciousness of her charge.

Even while she spoke a scream came from without the door. We reached it just in time to see an elegant woman coming up the stone steps with the boy in her arms, while the blood was already running from his forehead over her dress. There was little time then for civilities—the incident had made us all acquainted. The lady was without her hat, and it was to be presumed that she was our neighbor. Finding the cut not very dangerous, I turned to the stranger standing in silence before me to express my thanks.

As I looked up I encountered eyes swimming with tears, and those earnest, loving eyes belonged to Therese!

"To meet you again, Madame! to meet you again! And you are the mother of the dear child we have watched on the street and in the garden!" She bent over and kissed the baby, and raised my hand to her lips with the old habit of deference. I would not allow the humble gesture, but pressed her hand with unaffected joy at the meeting.

"Madame St. Leon," I said to my relative, presenting her—and then to herself, "Oh, Therese! I shall be long learning to call you any thing else."

"To you always the grateful Therese," she said, as her tears fell fast.

And so we met at last, and I heard the story of their wanderings in search of a home; of St. Leon's wonderful prosperity when he entered into business again; of his determination to live where a social position would be accorded to his family. Both parents had spared no pains to fit themselves for this position; both began with many previous advantages to assist them. Therese was elegant, and soon renewed the graceful accomplishments acquired in the days when her young mistress made her her companion in all her studies. Her natural aptitude for music made her skill at the piano, and even the harp, more than such as is commonly found in private circles. St. Leon, as he continued to call himself, had his large knowledge of the world, of foreign languages, and rare financial ability upon which to base his fortunes and his ambition.

To my generous-minded friend I told the story. Others only heard from me that they were West Indians whom I had known when they were living at the South. There was nothing about them to call their pretensions into question. The children were all that the children of such parents should be, except that neither of them were their equals in presence, and Therese could never be equaled in her remarkable beauty.

Many an evening we passed in the house which they had made so attractive, where the fine taste of Therese had dictated every arrangement and adornment, listening to her rich voice perfected by skillful training. Many a dinner we sat down to, in a room on which taste and art had exhausted themselves, to Therese's incomparable dinners. They almost worshiped Reginald and myself, visiting on us much superfluous gratitude. They are courted now in the elegant coteries which they all are fitted to grace, my good Therese and her husband, and this owre true story could only have been possible before the war, thank God!

A MAJOR OF THE OLD SCHOOL.

IN the army, as in other classes of society, may be found representatives of all types and varieties of human character.

Many years since it was my fortune to serve with an officer who, during the war of 1812, enlisted as a private soldier, and for his gallant and meritorious conduct had been rewarded with a commission. He had served in the Creek War and at New Orleans under General Jackson, and had performed much faithful service elsewhere. Although I do not mention his name here, his contemporaries will doubtless have no difficulty in identifying him after reading the following.

This officer had risen to the rank of Major when I first met him, and was then well advanced in life; but he still retained an exceedingly youthful and social disposition, and never seemed more happy than when "fighting his battles over again," and relating the prominent incidents of his life to an attentive audience by the fireside or at the mess-table. He was a man who, I verily believe, would not for his right hand have made a deliberate misrepresentation of facts in regard to persons or business. At the same time his imagination was exceedingly fertile and vivid, and his memory did not always seem to be reliable; indeed, the marvelous appeared to predominate in his composition almost to as great an extent as it did in that of Baron Munchausen. He was invariably the hero of his own stories, which seemed to be stereotyped upon the tablets of his brain, and were narrated to every one who felt inclined to listen to them.

As may be imagined, these tales lost none of their romance by repetition. On the contrary, it was quietly whispered about by the officers that, like the old frigate Constitution, they had been so much amended and changed that but little, if any thing, of the original structures remained. He always maintained a most grave and dignified cast of countenance when giving an account of his exploits, and no one in his presence, with the exception of his "better half," ever presumed to throw the slightest shadow of incredulity upon the truth of the narrations. His wife, however, often assumed the privilege of expressing her opinions in the rather abrupt form of "Now, you know you lie." He was one of those imperturbable persons who never manifested surprise at the narration of the most startling facts by others, and always had at his tongue's end an apropos incident in his own experience which threw all others far into the shade.

He informed me that, while he was doing duty at New Orleans in 1814, having a desire to gain as much knowledge as possible regarding the peculiar habits of the people, he upon one occasion paid a visit to a quadrone ball, where he met with a large concourse of people of all classes, and among them were quite a number of Spanish Creole young men, who exhibited rather an unfriendly disposition toward the officers generally, and were particularly pointed in their deportment toward him. He endeavored to avoid them for some time, but they seemed determined to draw him into a quarrel, and at length their insults became so apparent that, to repeat his own language,

"I was obliged to break three or four chairs over their heads. I then drew a pair of Derringers that I had in my vest pockets and fired them into the crowd; but as this did not settle the difficulty, I happened to think that I had a pair of holster pistols in my coat pockets, and discharged them also."

We asked him if the police did not arrest him. He said no, that in the mêlée which ensued the lights were extinguished, and this gave him an opportunity to make his escape to his quarters. He added:

"I have nothing to say about the sequel of this affair, gentlemen, excepting that I was informed that dead Spaniards were found in the ball-room on the following morning."

During the time the Major served in New Orleans the pay of the army was so small, and the paymaster so seldom was in funds, that the officers were for the most part obliged to depend upon the slender fare derived from the commissary's store. They rarely had an opportunity of indulging in the expensive luxuries that the market afforded, unless perchance (which did not often occur) they received an invitation to dine out with some friend who was so fortunate as to possess means aside of his pay.
